And of all places, a great historical building like this seems most vividly and touchingly to bring before us this fleeting, this fading character of all that belongs to individuals, of all that belongs to generations, of all that belongs to souls of men. These walls have witnessed the fervid teaching of Anselm, the fierce anathemas and fiercer death-scene of Becket, and the crowdings of the pilgrims of Christendom to his gorgeous shrine: these same enclosures have heard the wild tumult of the day when shrines and images were torn down, and have listened to the voices of whole ages of teachers pleading for the purer faith once for all delivered to the saints. Of all this no traces remain, save what are discerned in books and read of in history. All the echoes have passed away. The long-drawn sounds which follow the musical note uttered in the empty nave at night, dying out amidst the aisles and distant chapels, are but emblems of other and longer sounds, uttered by the passing ages, dying one after another as generations pass away, till all is silence save the tread of them that live, and the voice of him who speaks now, but shall soon be silent as the rest.

Nor can I abstain, in thinking of recent changes, from bringing to your mind other scenes, which they forcibly recall to us. Those venerable and tottering arches, which the demolition of modern dwellings* has restored to us in their ruin—strange, indeed, is it to call up the images of those who once inhabited them: the sick ranged in their beds along the vaulted hall which those columns supported—the sick, and those who ministered to them; and the graceful traceries and yet glowing colours in the hospital-chapel, telling of the rites and celebrations of long-forgotten days. This new beginning, as it were, of that which had come to its end, this second journey to decay of that which had already accomplished its course, reminds us not only that even the solid stones are frail like those that raise them,—but that there is no permanence even in decay, no repose even in ruin. Fire did its work, and the ancient walls were thrust dishonoured into oblivion—and now they are brought forth and honoured, for time to do its work,—and oblivion again the end.

* Within the last few months some houses have been pulled down at the north-east of the cathedral, into which had been built the arches of the south side of the old hall of the hospital of the monastery, and the chapel belonging to the same. The result has been the opening of a most imposing and venerable ruin, never before seen by the present generation.

All is beginning—ever thrusting itself up, ever intruding: the new with its change invading the old, unwelcome even in its necessity: all is ending—something ever crumbling down, some bright colour fading away, some sweet sound dying out, some familiar thing being removed: health and strength ending, feebleness and disease beginning: love and familiarity ending, coldness and alienation beginning: faith and certainty ending, doubt and questioning beginning. Where, my brothers and sisters, where shall we stand and hold fast? Where may any one thing be found, fixed amidst the flux of all other things? Where shall we hear any voice, speaking alike to the babe and to the aged—not too stern for our first childhood, not too fresh and startling for our second?

One, and but One there is, and His voice speaks to us to-day:—"I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last." One, and one only. But who is it that thus speaks? Is it the Eternal Unseen God? We know that He is all this, that He must be all this: that He cannot change nor pass away. But what is that to us, to us who are changing and passing away? Can darkness gather comfort by thinking on the blaze of noon? To us His light is unapproachable, His changeless Being unimaginable.

No, my brethren: we need for our resting-place one who has trodden our world: one who has passed through our changes: one upon whose history the wounds of our spirits have written their scars. We need one who is unchangeable in the midst of change: purest light amidst gathering and whelming darkness; everlasting joy amidst sorrow passing our sorrow.

And such an One is now before us: the babe of Bethlehem—the subject youth of Nazareth—the wonder-worker of Capernaum—the teacher by the shore and in the temple—the agonised in Gethsemane—the crucified of Calvary—the ascended from Olivet—the Intercessor on the throne of God—the man Christ Jesus. Not in vain do these eight days of Christmas-tide bring Him before us at the end of each fleeting year. All is passing away—we, our generation, our nation, our world: but He passeth not away, nor one word that He hath ever uttered. He is Alpha, the first letter taught to the child on its mother's knee: with Him begins all Christian lore:—the Babe in the Manger, the first lesson to every babe in every home in Christendom. He is Omega, the last completed thought of the wisdom of the wisest: in Him are the unsearchable riches of all knowledge: He alone, and his work alone, can interpret the evil in the world, and the good in the world: for Him, as well as by Him, were all things created, and in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. He is the beginning. Before all the works of God—in the beginning, further back than human imagining can reach, He took not his beginning, but He was with God, and He was God: He is the beginning, for with Him begun the going forth of God to his universe, and with Him must begin all that would come to worthy issue in that universe: He is the beginning, for only by Him is there access to God, and through Him, as the Door, must every pilgrim to bliss enter on his life's journey. And He is the end: for in Him are all things that are in heaven and earth summed up, and these fleeting years of ours are but the steps of putting all things under his feet: He is the end, for to Him, and for the love of Him, must every worthy course of human action find its completion: He is the end, for the Christian course which begun through Him and is continued in Him, shall find Him at its close, as He was at its outset, and pass at last into his presence, and be made glad with the joy of his countenance. He is the First:—First in the counsel, First in the love, First in the glory of his Father: First in esteem of every one who knows Him, First in his claim for obedience, One whom none other may rival, none other pass before, none other supplant. And He is the Last: we cannot pass beyond Him to any thing new: there will never come a time when He shall be exhausted: as none can supplant Him, so shall none supersede Him: only when all things shall have been put under Him, and gathered unto Him, shall He pass into the glory of the Father, subject unto Him that put all things under Him, and God, but still God in Christ, be all in all.

With this enduring One, with this stedfast and abiding One, let us connect our fleeting years, that we may be abiding like Him. Would we, who have but begun the rudiments of knowledge, go on to know the wisdom of God? He of whom are the first steps, the Alpha, is the Omega also, and will make us wise unto salvation, and in salvation wise up to the measure of our renewed faculties. Would we who have begun our course, carry it on to that eternity which will be its only end? He is the beginning and the end: He will not cut short his work in his Church, but will pursue it unto the consummation of the days.

And how shall we bind on our weakness to his strength, our decay to his permanence, our mortal to his incorruptible? Simply, my brethren, by thinking and speaking and living as members of Him: by living our lives in humble following of his: by love, by purity, by gentleness, by prayer for the Holy Spirit, by spending and being spent for Him and for the brethren.

Then, though our years pass on, and we with and in them—though our outward man decay—we shall have a sure hold and a firm abiding-place; though this earthly temple know us no longer, we shall be worshippers in one which shall then be most glorious and most crowded, when all earthly temples have passed away; then, though here on earth our names may be written in water, and our remembrance be but for a day, our names shall be known in heaven, and our reward be on high.

May thoughts and prayers like these end the year which is going and begin that which is coming: thus may all our endings and all our beginnings be bound unto and bound up in Him who is the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the end, the First and the Last.

A FUNERAL.

"What now dost thou bury so softly and still?
Oh! this is the grave of my own proud will.
I bid it sleep softly in Death's little room,
And my hopes too I bury with it in the tomb."
De la Motte Fouqué.

BETWIXT the light of the rising sun
And the light of the waning moon,
Along the grassy forest path,
Fair Knight, thou speedest soon.
A chill, faint dawn is on the sky,
And through the wood a breath
Runs fresh, yet cold, as is the sigh
That comes 'twixt life and death.

The forest paths are green and lone,
The forest shade is deep;
The secrets on its stillness thrown
It knoweth well to keep;
And some will seek the forest glade,
A deadly strife to end;
And some there are will seek its shade
To meet a gentle friend.

Yet on this brow I read no frown
Of foeman's vengeful ire;
And in this quiet eye cast down,
No light of soft desire:
Not thus they look who meet by night
Beneath the blossomed thorn,
And cry, when breaks the eastern light,
"How quickly comes the morn!"

The forest lies like one that sleeps,
With tearful, half-shut lid;
A touch, a stir, a rustling creeps,
And all the flow'rets hid
'Mid tangled grasses, drenched with dew
And dreams, are holding up
To heaven each silver starry eye,
To heaven each golden cup;
A light is on each leaf, the light
And sweetness of the morn;
The glory of the summer day,
In summer woodlands born.

A little bird upon the bough
Sang clear; a light breeze stirred
The thick, dark summer leaves, but now
I know not if he heard
The whisper of the summer leaves,
The carol of the bird.

A little brook beside his way
Ran chafing, chiding long;
I know not if he marked its play,
Or heard its ceaseless song;
At length he neared a green, smooth place,
Within the thickest shade,
A still, fair, solitary place,
For quiet spirits made.

And in that solitary place
He knelt and prayed to God;
I saw no mound beneath his knees,
No heaving of the sod:
Unstirred I saw the grasses lie,
Unstirred the daisies wave;
A pleasant spot, and yet I knew
He knelt upon a grave.

He lifted up his steel-clad hands:
"I bring to Thee the first,
I bring to Thee," he said, "the last
Fond hope that I have nursed;
The wish that strengthened with my strength,
And with my being grew;
And the last sweet silent dream that crept
Close to my heart and drew
So soft a breath, that if it slept
Or woke, I scarcely knew.
On earth, in Heaven, whom have I now
But Thee? in death, in life?
Oh! bind my spirit with the vow
That makes an end of strife!

"The dead above their dead may wail,
The living live to Thee,
Oh First and Last! Thou dost not fail,
For Thou art strong, and we,
Thy little ones, are weak and frail;
And Thou our Lord art free;
And we with heavy bonds are bound,
But now of bond or free
I reck not, bitter turns to sweet;
I see Thy hands, I see Thy feet,
Ah, dearest Lord, I see
Thy wounded heart: oh! be Thou found
For First and Last to me!"

He rose and went upon his way:
A moving to and fro
Was in the woods, as of a calm
Strong wind, that gathers slow;
No dew lay on the grassy dell,
The sky was cloudless, clear;
Yet from the clear bright heavens there fell
A solitary tear.

And through the woven boughs I saw
The glory of the sky
Look down, I saw the forest flowers
In quiet bloom and die:
I saw the lowly grasses bend,
I saw the daisies wave:
Oh Jesus, loving to the end,
Thou knowest of that grave!

DORA GREENWELL.

THE PROUD CHARACTER.

IT is not easy to describe pride well, inasmuch as we are all more or less infected with it, and it is difficult for us to see a defect, of which we ourselves furnish an illustration; and inasmuch as pride is the root and foundation of all other sins, which branch off into so many and so various forms that one man is scarcely capable even of surveying them all. Pride indeed is but another name for sin in general. Every breach of God's commandments, when accurately analysed, betrays pride as its moving principle. By its fatal agency our first parents fell, for had they continued humble, believing that their Father was wiser than they, they would never have touched the fruit against which He had so seriously warned them. And Scripture, as we know, points out no other cause for the fall of Satan and his angels. Attempting to make themselves independent of God, they abode not in the truth, and fell from their first estate. So that, in fact, all the evil which obtains in the universe may be clearly traced to this one source—pride.

It has often been observed that all evils, strictly viewed, are exaggerations of some good principle. Pride is the exaggeration of self-esteem, the over-estimation of one's self—of one's value, strength, capacity or talent. And as there is a tendency to confound virtues with those vices which are their unlawful exaggeration (prudent frugality, for instance, being often stigmatised as meanness, caution as cowardice, and so on), so the self-esteem that is simply right and proper is often condemned as pride. The difference between the two, however, is great and real. The one may as truly be said to characterise a saint as the other to characterise a sinner. It is true, there are many good people who think that such a thing as self-esteem is proper to no human being, because of the Scripture assurance that "we all have sinned and come short of the glory of God;" and they quote a host of texts to the effect that we are all guilty before our Maker, that all our righteousness is as filthy rags, and that in God's sight we are disgusting—full of wounds and bruises and putrefying sores from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot. This they do to prove that, instead of cherishing self-esteem, we should rather cultivate self contempt and self-condemnation. But those good people use these truths as they were never meant to be used, and forget that our want of due self-esteem is one of the chief causes of our dark, helpless, and miserable condition as spiritual creatures; and that if God has anything to reproach us for, as human beings, it is that we have not rightly valued and used that high and honourable position assigned to us in creation. If Adam had but appreciated the royal dignity with which God invested him, as at once bearing the Divine image and being sovereign under Him of the lower creatures, he would never have so degraded himself as to hearken to a creature in the form of one of the inferior animals, which told him that He, whose child and representative he was, was nothing better than an impostor. Christ has said that a man is much better than a sheep; but if a man, instead of acting like a king, conducts himself like one of the lower creatures, he certainly deserves contempt. "We are God's offspring," says the Apostle; and if we esteem ourselves as less than this, we are as guilty as we should be were we to exalt ourselves above all that is called God. It is true that through our apostasy from God we have lost all honour in his sight. But then assuredly the way to get out of this low condition is not by setting ourselves at the lowest level of existence, but rather by trying faithfully to regain the high and dignified position from which, through our recklessness, we fell.

And here two roads present themselves, between which we have to choose. We may try to regain this lost position by the exercise of our own wisdom and energy. This is the way of pride. Or we may try to regain it by the aid of God, who in Christ has graciously stretched out his hand to us to lead us back, not merely to our original position, but to a much higher state than we ever occupied before. This is the way of true Christian faith, which is founded upon a due estimation of ourselves as the offspring of God.

Self-esteem is thus a Christian virtue, as essential to true holiness as pride is to sin. The Apostle Paul gave many beautiful illustrations of it in his life and conduct. We never find him undervaluing his high calling as a child of God, as an Apostle, or as a man gifted by God with high talents, both intellectual and spiritual. Meek and indulgent as he is, he never allows himself to be played with, or tossed about by his jealous and dogmatic opponents in the Church. He cordially esteems and loves his fellow Apostles, yet when it is necessary to vindicate his own special calling, he always meets them with dignified independence, and when it is necessary to the bringing forth of God's glory, he hesitates not to point out that he had laboured more abundantly than they all. He often held up his own life to the churches as an example for imitation, or as a ground for defence against unjust accusation. And when, having undergone an infamous public flogging and a subsequent false imprisonment at Philippi, the magistrates wanted him to slink secretly out of the town, he decidedly refused to do so, and compelled them to withdraw the stigma they had attached to his character, by coming in person to his prison and leading him out with an honourable escort.

Now, if the display of his own excellence had been the Apostle's main object, all this might have been regarded as the fruit of pride; but since the whole of his life exhibits him as a man, than whom no Christian could be more averse to vainglory, all this may teach us that self-respect is an ornament of the Christian character as much as self-humiliation and self-denial are. But self-respect becomes pride when it is carried beyond its due limits; when, for instance, a man exalts himself at the cost of truth, with the intention of earning from others a praise which is unmerited. The praise the proud man delights in is not always undeserved, for every good and useful work is deserving of praise, no matter whether it come from a proud man or a humble one. Honour should be rendered to whom honour is due, even though the person receiving it may make a bad use of it. But when the proud man receives even deserved praise, he abuses it by showing greater delight in the honour his work yields to himself than in the boon which it confers upon others. This disposition of mind is further characterised by a constant attempt at magnifying the praise which accrues to it, and at getting it repeated on every fresh occasion, eliciting it even from the lips of strangers, or from those who are but partially acquainted with the circumstances.

But pride does not always desire praise of men. Among its numerous forms there is one which I would call haughty pride. This species is found among that class of people who have such a high idea of themselves that they think other people's praise or censure as incapable of affecting them as the stone from the boy's sling is incapable of reaching the moon. They are mostly people of high birth and low understanding—with full purses and empty heads, who, too stupid to perceive that there can be anything better than a long pedigree and a fine estate, have no conception of the value of a good man's approbation. They look down upon others with very much the same air of contempt as Pyrrhus' elephant did upon noble Fabricius. They suppose they can in no way better show their superiority over what they call the vulgar people than by adopting a course of life opposed to theirs. Therefore they lounge in idleness, because diligence is common; or they are studious to be intemperate at every meal, because temperance has now become plebeian. They belong to that class of people of whom the Apostle says that "their glory is in their shame." Theirs is the pride of that fool Hierostratus, who, since he saw no chance of getting fame as a builder, set fire to the temple of Diana at Ephesus, that he might at least get fame as a destroyer.

The same sort of pride is also sometimes noticeable in men of extraordinary talent or genius, and also in those who take themselves for such. Their superiority above all other men being conclusively settled in their own mind, they think they cannot better show it than by persistence in all kinds of disorderly habits and foolish irregularities, just as a locksmith will sometimes attempt to prove the indestructibleness of his fire-safe by surrounding it with flames. So you will often find eminent men making a point of being careless and indifferent. If they have promised to do you a service, or to meet you at a certain place or hour, you may expect them to forget it, not perhaps from want of kindness, but from their superabundance of genius. Some of them even give themselves up to profligacy, or at least maintain such equivocal connexions as would be certain to ruin their reputation for ever, were it not that their character is screened by the splendour of their accomplishments. This kind of pride conclusively shows that the man of the greatest genius may at the same time be the greatest fool.

Pride which piques itself upon the possession of merely material privileges—money, beauty, splendour of dress, and such like, may very fitly be called monkey-pride. People who are under its influence are like La Fontaine's monkey, which, having put on its master's night-cap and dressing-gown, placed itself at the breakfast-table and rang the bell for toast. Their chief folly consists in forgetting that whatever they are carrying about with them, whether it be a full purse, handsome form, or fine dress, is still but the adornment of a concealed skeleton, which must one day lie five or ten feet deep under the ground; and how pitiful will their case be on that day when a voice shall say to them, "Fools, this night your souls shall be required of you, and whose shall all these things be?"

An apparently more reasonable but not less blameable pride is that which plumes itself upon the successful results of ability, zeal, and energy. This may be called ambitious pride. It has often been observed that it is difficult to find able, clever, pushing people who are not apt, with a certain self-approving unction, to compare themselves with others who, owing to their silliness, slothfulness, or sluggishness, have remained behind them. Their fault consists in constantly neglecting to put two questions to themselves: first, What hast thou that thou didst not receive? and, second, What hast thou done that thou mightst not have done better? It would be a great blessing to them to give up comparing themselves with their inferiors, and resolve always to compare themselves with their superiors. This, however, they seldom or never do, except with the purpose of showing that the difference is solely attributable to circumstances not under their control, which is but another way of giving a sop to their pride. Ambition is like that pushing, circling force which makes the tree grow. If combined with humility, it yields abundant fruit; if combined with pride, it turns everything into twigs and leaves, which send forth magnificent foliage, but offer no refreshment to the hungry and thirsty. It is a simple truth, yet it is one of the very hardest to understand, that when we have thrown our whole heart into the work we have to do, and have striven our utmost to make our capacities and talents as productive as possible, still we have only done what it was our duty to do; and that every shade of self-exaltation or the piquing ourselves on having performed something extraordinary, is not only out of place but sinful. Such pride can only rest upon very foolish grounds,—upon the supposition, for instance, that God has given us more power than we need apply even for his service, that mediocrity is the standard of perfection, and that our duty requires nothing more from us than a return of some of the capital we received on loan. Moreover, the excellences of which this sort of pride boasts will, if minutely examined, often be found worth very little. It is as though you plumed yourself upon having invented a wonderful machine. But you forget to tell us how much you learnt from the experiments and failures of those who went before you. Perhaps you have only brought to a conclusion the laborious and unparalleled work of your predecessors. Or perhaps you boast of having managed your business so well that it is now one of the largest and most lucrative in town. But were one to tell your story in other words, he might truly say that you can only boast of being a great lover of your own self. Your conduct strangely contrasts with that of another Man, who was such a lover of others, that, to make them rich, He became poor.

Some people again are proud of their integrity and respectability. Their pride may be called moral pride. Scripture calls it Pharisaism—self-righteousness. They may be respectable people indeed, faithful in the discharge of their daily duties, honest as gold, just and true as Aristides, and kind to all who come in contact with them. Through their honesty and probity they may have worked themselves up in life, so that they occupy a respectable, or perhaps even a distinguished, position in society. Consciousness of these praiseworthy attainments often makes them take for granted that they deserve nothing but praise and approbation. Consequently they are quite inaccessible to correction of any kind. The moment one tries, even in the most discreet and gentle way, to convince them of a fault, they get angry, declare abruptly that they will not be so spoken to; or they silence their corrector by arguments proving that what is imputed to them for a fault, is, on the contrary, an excellent virtue If Christians, they readily accept the general title of "sinners," but they carefully cast aside the faintest imputation of being guilty of any special sin. Or should they occasionally be brought to confess that from their own personal experience they had known themselves as sinners, they only point to some absurd and long-past foible. Such people are, now-a-days, very phlegmatic, considerate, cold, and cautious. They do their duty, nothing beyond it. They are never moved into lively sympathy for the good, nor into passion against the evil. Their sympathies are always under the control of strict calculation. However good an object may be, if its pursuit can possibly lead them into any difficulties, or make them the subject of a little unpleasant gossip, they prudently decline having anything to do with it. Sometimes, too, they are extraordinarily active and zealous, but only in such works as will be certain to add to their respectability and reputation. And thus, while earning in their life nothing but praise, they secure to themselves a eulogistic epitaph after death. But whether they will secure anything beyond that, it were difficult to say, since it is not clear that they have not got all their reward on this earth.

Something akin to this is spiritual pride. The human heart is indeed a wonderful instrument. It knows how to turn everything, even the holiest and most divine things, into idols. Give man a blessed book like God's Word, and, unless guarded and guided by the true spirit, he will as a scholar, a profound thinker, a sort of prophet, turn it into a magazine of ornaments, to decorate himself with. Give him a blessed doctrine like that of salvation by grace, and he is sure to turn it into an instrument whereby to save himself. Show him true humility, and he will soon weave out of it a cloak, in which to walk abroad to be seen of men. To be favoured with spiritual gifts is indeed a great blessing, but the history of the Church of Corinth shows that even those gifted with them may be puffed up when the best gift of all, love, is neglected. The doctrine of election, for instance, is, if well understood, a precious jewel among the gems of Scripture; but there are not many believers who have wisdom and discretion enough to abstain from unwisely appropriating it as an ornament for their own selves. Believing that they are God's elect, they are easily led to suppose that there must be something more than ordinary about them as Christians. They are, in their own opinion, God's special favourites—through mere sovereign grace, of course—but still they stand nearer to God than other Christians. And so they know a great deal of what other Christians cannot yet understand. Nobody can teach them anything, they will teach everybody. They like to speak in figures, as the prophets; or in parables, as our Lord did. They are fond of giving a lengthened account of their own religious feelings, which they take for special operations of the Holy Spirit in their souls; and they gladly indulge in detailed narratives of the Lord's spiritual dealings with them, that everybody may know what extraordinary objects of God's care they are. Others, again, who through much spiritual exercise have attained a more than common degree of holiness, and live in close communion with the Lord, have often, after successfully overcoming many temptations and besetting sins, found this sin of spiritual pride left as their last enemy, threatening in the end to rob them of all the laurels which they gained in former conquests. Their pride usually manifests itself in their harsh and unchristian judgments of the faults of their neighbours. They often say in effect that they cannot possibly understand how such or such a brother or sister could fall into such or such a sin. They really doubt whether he or she could ever have been a Christian. They appear greatly scandalized at learning that certain people of Christian reputation indulge in certain amusements which they have erased from the list of permissible recreations. They make up their minds to have nothing to do with such people any longer. They are shocked at hearing that this or that minister, whom hitherto they have looked upon as a devout servant of God, could preach such or such a doctrine the other day! They resolve to call upon him to expostulate with him and put him right, and, if he should prove refractory, to renounce his fellowship. Blinded by the idea of their excellence, they forget that nobody can be so perfectly instructed as to be beyond the possibility of learning, and that nobody here on earth can be so holy as to be incapable of falling into some prejudice. To a proud mind nothing is more difficult to learn than the constant practice of that large-hearted magnanimity which claims no greater liberty to itself than it will gladly allow to others; nor is anything so incompatible with pride as that love, which, while rejoicing not in iniquity but in the truth, beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, and endureth all things.

The chief and common companion of pride is ignorance. Our pride feeds itself by dwelling upon the possession of some ornament which we believe to be extraordinarily brilliant. But did we see the precious jewels which adorn many others in like circumstances, we would shun to wear ours, and would meekly set ourselves to increase our store of grace. When the savage points proudly at the glass beads that adorn his neck, or a schoolboy plumes himself upon being able to spell out a common word, we cannot help laughing at their foolish ignorance. One day, when sitting in an express train, I noticed a swallow flying along—now far ahead, now far behind, making flying circles, as it seemed, round the train. "I wonder," thought I, "what that little creature would say if it could describe the impression which our highly-praised invention must make upon it. It must be much amused at the huge engine, with the puffing chimney, and all the snorting, whistling, hissing, and rattling, while it, without the slightest noise or effort, but only with a pair of tiny wings, which one might put into his waistcoat pocket, accomplishes a speed of from eighty to ninety miles an hour. Surely we have not yet learnt all the art of locomotion, even with our six thousand years' studying and trying!" Once—it was a week-day—I stood in a large country church, and looked at the splendid organ which towered up to the ceiling. It was just being tuned, and the organist sent forth a powerful roll of sound. Adjacent to the church was a meadow, and through the open window came the bellow of a cow, which made the church ring, and drowned the sound of the organ. I looked up to the huge instrument, with its rows of gigantic tubes, realising in my fancy the tremendous bellows and the man blowing them in the sweat of his brow; and then going to the window I looked at the cow, a comparatively little animal, six feet long and five high, and thought of its little throat, from which the powerful note proceeded. And I said to myself, "We have much to learn yet before we shall be able to rival nature's sounds!" The man who has some idea, however dim, of the boundless ocean of knowledge and science, whereof that which we do know is but a little drop, will deem nothing more absurd than proud self-elevation over the little knowledge we have; and it may be safely affirmed that a proud man, even though he were the most eminent among the learned or gifted, must be an esprit borné—a man whose range of view is, after all, sadly limited. Nor is this applicable only to science, but to every other sphere of mental development. A man who puts himself forward on the ground of his moral excellence, can only do so by shutting his eyes to the faults which he has left uncorrected, and to the impure motives which disguise themselves under the mask of his moral integrity. Moral or spiritual pride is always a sign of want of self-knowledge. A wise builder will never continue building up a lofty tower after he knows that there are rotten spots in the foundation.

Humiliation and destruction are the natural offspring of pride. "When pride cometh, then cometh shame," says the wise king; "and a haughty spirit goeth before a fall." History has in all ages and in all circles of human society put its seal upon these old sayings. From the day when Nebuchadnezzar fell in Babylon down to the moment when the first Napoleon landed in St. Helena, it has been shown in the case of hundreds and thousands of proud men, whether princes or servants, learned or unlearned, rich or poor, old or young, that there is no such slippery path in life as that of the proud. It is because there rules above all a God whose unchangeable principle is to "resist the proud and to give grace to the humble." In many cases, it is true, His divine judgments are not made visible to us in this life, but they are sure to be seen in the next, as we may learn from the story of Dives and Lazarus in the Gospel of Luke. And there is no doubt that many in their pride have had during their lifetime a bitter foretaste of their future degradation. Pride can never make a man feel truly happy. It brings upon him a series of disagreeable experiences which dispel many of the clouds of incense with which he would like to be perfumed. As he constantly crowns himself he finds that few will plait a wreath for him, except those whose flowers nobody envies. "All this availeth me nothing," said Haman, "so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king's gate." Already he felt, as it were, something of the pinching of the rope which was prepared for his neck. And as he always liked to look down upon people, he got just what he wanted when he was suspended on a gallows fifty cubits high.

Pride's only and true remedy is the loving faith of the heart in a crucified Saviour. One cannot truly believe oneself saved by such a self-humiliating love, and at the same time continue in conceit. However pious and godly a man may be, the moment pride takes possession of his heart he ceases to realise fully and clearly that for all he is and has he is solely indebted to Christ's having been made a curse for him, and being shamefully crucified in his stead. To speak of a proud Christian is as glaring a contradiction as to speak of wet fire or bitter sweet. We are saved by grace, and one of the old fathers of the Church said rightly: "All we have above hell is grace." Pride cannot dwell in a heart in which that truth lives. This is the reason why the cross of Christ is such a stumbling-block to the world. It silently declares that not the proud, but the meek ones shall inherit the earth. We rightly appreciate knowledge and power, and riches and glory, but we learn on the summit of Calvary that the way to attain them is not by pride, but by humility. The Man who is at present sitting on the throne of glory and power is not named Nebuchadnezzar, nor Augustus, nor Napoleon, nor Gamaliel, nor Antonius, but the lowly exalted Jesus.

The world does not believe it, nor can we prove it to those who are not willing to believe. But the day is not far distant when it shall be made clearly manifest, and when all generations of the earth shall acknowledge, that humility, and not pride, is the way to happiness and glory. THE FIRST TOOTH.

COTTAGE POEMS.

BY A CURATE.

I.—THE FIRST TOOTH.

CURATE of Devilsbye, in County D ——,
I entered on my work of ministry.
And, reader—who exclaims there's no such place
Upon the map of England—by your grace,
Somewhat disguised in Saxon though it be,
There is a Devilsbye in County D ——;
And more, the place is worthy of the name;
And often I have pondered how it came
To bear it. Had a spring of tainted life,
From souls with all unholy passions rife,
Stagnated there, and swelled into a sea
Of Sodom, gath'ring fresh impurity?
One of the dismal plague-spots of the land,
Where sin and misery went hand in hand,
Hunger with lust, and nakedness with shame—
Yes—Devilsbye was worthy of the name.
Upon this ground unequal war I waged,
And, faint as mediæval saint engaged
In conflict with the fiend, turned many a day
Into a smiling cottage on my way,
To rest, not body only: heart and soul
Alike were shaken. I could scarce control
Fierce bursts of wrath when cruel wrong prevailed,
While floods of doubt my deepest faith assailed.
The smoke of torment in thick clouds seemed driven
Between me and God's love—the face of Heaven.
My resting-place, the cottage of the Thornes,
A woodbined porch of lattice-work adorns;
Its inmates are the dame, her only son,
With his wife Alice, and a little one.
I married Alice; and, some months before
The time I write of, held her baby o'er
The font. That little nursling made a claim
On pastoral care, and of his free-will came Into my arms whene'er I took a seat
Within the cottage, beaten, in retreat.
Alice was good, good-tempered, healthful, fair,
But the old grandame had another air—
An air of Heaven's own sweet and awful grace
Marked every feature of the aged face.
The marks of care and suffering it bore:
No self-complacent smile the close lips wore—
Lips that had tasted of the bread of life
And no more hungered; lips that hushed all strife,
Prayed down all discord. And her eyes were dim,
And looked too deep for tears to overbrim.
Yet they had worn with weeping, as I knew
One day.

Unseen by babe and mother too
I entered. Alice sitting in a chair,
The child upon her knee—a smiling pair.
A tiny tooth, long gleaming white beneath
Its covering, had, bud-like, burst its sheath;
The pain had ceased, the infant laughs and crows;
With joy and pride the youthful mother shows
The pearly treasure, and the grandame tries,
With well-wiped spectacles and loving eyes,
Putting the little rose-leaf lips apart,
To see the speck: but with a sudden start
They feel my presence. Then they read my face,
Down to the babe, who made a sad grimace—
A piteous tearful frown—and turned away,
And hid his little head—and not in play.
Looked I so grim, then? The dame turned and said,
"What's happened, sir?" I only shook my head,
And answered, "I have walked this morning through That dreadful village." What that meant she knew.
"Then, sir, you'll rest a bit, out in the air."
With that she brought the cushion of her chair,
Of clean but faded cotton, to the seat
In the rude porch. The woodbine's breath was sweet,
The little garden was in fair array,
The fields beyond all smiling, glad, and gay.
So, leaving Alice with a nod and smile,
I turned into the porch to rest awhile.
There the dame followed in a little space
And looked her first inquiry in my face.
"Only another infant," I replied.
"Merciful Father! in my hands it died.
And died of hunger. With the helpless thing
In my vain arms, I sternly bade them bring (The creatures who had gathered round me there
In woman's semblance) food that it could bear,
And found it ravening."

Here there came a sob
From my companion, and I saw her throb
And quiver through the apron she had thrown Over her face, and sinking on the stone
Over against me, she sat still a space
Ere she uncovered her sweet patient face,
Composed as ever. "Alice does not know,
Not John even, all I've had to undergo,"
She murmured. And although I longed to ask,
I felt I could not; but I wore no mask,
And so revealed my thought, and she went on Without more words, but quickly and with tone
Subdued. "We married early—John and I—
Early and poor. It was not thoughtlessly:
We both were pious in our youth, and tried
To serve God duly, and our own fire-side
With scanty fare preferred, and holy quiet,
To the farm-kitchen's plenty and its riot.
But things went ill with us, I know not why;
Labour was scarce, for there was two to try
For every bit o' work. The farmers took
The idlest on, such as they knew would look
After the parish pay. O, it was hard!
Thus cheated of our virtue's poor reward,
We waited on. John trusted God at first,
But lost his faith when things got to the worst
And he most needed it. Our baby came
I' the dead o' winter, and its little flame
O' life wanted more kindling than I had To give it. And I thought John would go mad

To see me kept so poor ; I was so weak
And thin, the bones would almost cut my cheek.
And I was hungry often, and I knew,
Though he said nothing, John was hungry too.
'I'll bear 't no longer,' said my man one night.
I looked at him, and my heart stopped with fright:
He looked so fierce—such trouble in his eye.
'I have cursed God, and care not if I die!
But I'll not bear 't,' he said.
'O, my own man,'
I sobbed, 'God help us, for He only can.'
With that, to hush the infant's wailing cry,
I put it to my bosom. It was dry.
I rose up quickly, saying nothing more,
But, walking faintly up and down the floor,
Contrived to still him. Then my husband went,
And my despair in desperate tears had vent.
I will not say for want of food that night
My baby perished. It was famished quite Before. But ere my husband had returned,
Out on the hearth our scanty fire had burned ;
Our little one lay clay-cold, but at ease ;
And I was in a faint upon my knees.
I need not tell you more—a stolen meal
For once I tasted ; but John would not steal
For himself only, and I would not share,
To save my very life, another hare.
So John and I made up our minds to part
Till better times. God keep us one in heart!
I prayed, and may we re-united be,
Even as we both do put our trust in Thee!"
She ceased. I knew it was so :—they did well,
In service until better times befell,
Winning by waiting a fair future, free
For them and theirs from dire necessity.

THE MORAVIANS IN BRITISH GUIANA.

The history of the Moravian Missions in this part of the world is full of interest. It appears that the first step towards their establishment in the colony was taken in the year 1735, when the directors of the Dutch trading company of Surinam held a conference with the Bishop of Spangenberg, and it was determined to send three of the brethren to Surinam in order to inquire into the best mode of founding the desired missions. We have no record of any immediate action resulting from this commission ; but three years afterwards two brethren were sent to the Rio Berbice at the request of the owner of an estate there. They were the first preachers of the Gospel to the negroes. The predikants (ministers) heretofore employed came to these shores for the edification of the white planters and officials. These men either considered that the negroes had no souls, or that they were beyond the pale of salvation, for when the self-denying missionaries attempted to spread the knowledge of Christ crucified among their dependants, they were driven away. Despairing of any good result from their labours in this quarter, therefore, they betook themselves to a position higher up the river. Between the Kibiliberi and Tapoeri Creeks on the west bank is an estate named Savonette, marked on the old maps of the colony by the letter A. It is situated about 65 miles in a direct line from the present town of New Amsterdam, but 200 by the windings of the river. Here the disappointed but not disheartened missionaries settled down, and called the name of their station "Pilgerhut"—"Pilgrim's rest." From hence they sallied forth into the forest to convert the natives, and teach them the grand doctrines of Christianity. But even in this work they were pursued by the ill-will of the Dutch settlers, who used every device to discredit them with the Indians. They raised a report that the missionaries came to make slaves of them ; and the credulous natives ran away in alarm at the first sight of their best friends. The Government, so far from assisting, made a show of suspecting them, threw impediments in their way, and required them to take the oath of allegiance. Eventually, however, their affectionate, disinterested behaviour, made them beloved, and they extended their visits to Surinam, Demerara, Essequibo, and Venezuela, sometimes making a circuit of 300 miles in a single journey. Nothing could daunt these single-minded men. They traversed the dense solitudes of the forests, or paddled along the broad streams, throwing themselves among unknown and perhaps hostile tribes with the faith and devotion of true apostles. They carried neither purse, nor scrip, nor shoes. Where they were hospitably received, there they remained, eating and drinking such things as were set before them, and crying, "The kingdom of God is come nigh unto you." So far from disdaining labour, they might have said with the Apostle, "These hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me." They were the magistrates, teachers, doctors, and artisans of the Indians.

In 1739 the two pioneers were joined by another brother and his wife. In 1745 they had a further addition to their society in the persons of two brethren, who had formed part of a mission on the Cottaka river, in Surinam, which was broken up ; and about the same time two brethren and their wives arrived from Europe. In 1748 another brother arrived—Theos Schumann, who was sent out by the directors to exercise a general superintendence over the mission. He was selected for his learning, and must have had a natural aptitude for philology, for we are told that in twelve months he obtained such a mastery over the language of the natives that not only could he converse with them, but was able to translate the Scriptures for them to read. Before this, the missionaries had compiled an account of the life and sufferings of Christ in the Arawaak dialect, by the assistance of a mulatto boy who had been presented to them by a planter, and who understood the language. We may form some notion of the steady perseverance of these good men when we are told that, although they had been settled at Pilgerhut since 1738, the first native baptism by them did not take place till 1748. We find it recorded, however, "that the Divine Spirit was exciting a real hunger after the word of God among the Arawaaks." But they were not anxious to make a great show, or to astonish their countrymen by the success of their efforts. They came to the country to make Christians of its inhabitants, and with slow, plodding earnestness they set to work, determined to achieve this result; indifferent as to the time that it might take, but trusting in the mercy of God to assure success to their endeavours. By the end of June in this year they numbered 39 converts, and the little settlement gave shelter to 80 Indians of all ages. In reading the history of the Greenland missions, we meet with a parallel case of long-continued labours without evident result, carried on by some of these brethren in that cold and inhospitable clime. Having consulted together as to the plan most likely to ensure success in their mission, they determined to commence by teaching the people the nature and attributes of God, and his laws. For seven years they pursued their object, and no sign was apparent of any desirable change. They would probably have persevered in their plans, but that they were instructed by an accident (as we should say) to change their tactics. One of their number was engaged in the translation of the Gospel, when a Greenlander approached and inquired of him what he was doing. The missionary read to him the account of the passion of our Lord, with which the man was so struck that he desired to know more. This led the brethren to see that the true method in preaching the Gospel was first to engage the attention of the people by describing to them the life and sufferings of Christ.

In 1749 another brother and his wife were added to the society at Pilgerhut. In the following year an incident occurred—one of those remarkable circumstances that ought to silence for ever those who exclaim against the small results obtained from missions to the heathen, and begrudge the expense necessarily attendant on their maintenance—an incident that gave to the toiling missionaries hope and encouragement. One generation may plant, another may water; in God's own good time He giveth the increase. We are too often impatient, like children who have sown seeds in the garden and are continually digging them up to see if they grow. One of the Indian disciples of the Moravians had been paying a visit to his countrymen on the Orinoco, and had told them all that he had learned from the missionaries. They were so astonished at what they heard that eleven of them determined to hear the word from the mouths of the missionaries themselves. For this purpose they visited Pilgerhut, and the consequence was that several of them settled there and were converted. Similarly the glad news of the Gospel reached the Indians of the Corentyn, and brought several bands from that river to reinforce the settlement at Pilgerhut, where, by this time, there were 200 persons residing, while the congregation amounted to at least 300. Thus the word of God grew and prevailed.

The year 1751 witnessed the arrival of several more missionaries; but the jealousy of the Government deprived the colony of their services. They were of the same persuasion as the Quakers as to the taking of oaths, and based their opinion on the literal interpretation of Matt. v. 34, and James v. 12; and the oath of allegiance being insisted on by the Government, they considered that there was no alternative for them but to return to Europe. We may say that the mission had now reached the height of its prosperity. The natives had been taught, in addition to the truths of the Gospel, some of the useful arts of daily life. It was a rule with the Moravians that every man should learn some handicraft, in order that they might be in a position to earn a subsistence without being a burden on their converts. In this respect they followed the custom of the Jews, and eminently the example of St. Paul. Some of their converts were now capable of being made useful in instructing others, and, indeed, the devoted missionaries needed some assistance; for, by the year 1756, their records showed a total of 367 persons baptized, 48 of whom, however, had died. Next year (1757) the missionaries were sufficiently encouraged to form an establishment on the Corentyn river. Mr. Dachne, who pioneered the way for the founding of this mission, laboured on three years, single-handed, and with but slight visible success, when he was cheered by the arrival of three coadjutors. Welcome indeed were these fellow-labourers. Dreary and desolate as the life of a missionary must needs be in a wild unsettled country, he had been subjected to peculiar dangers and privations. Few Indians could be induced to join him at all, and these gradually fell away, till at length only a solitary companion was left. Soon this man was taken sick, and being intimidated by the prospect of death predicted by a piai-man,* if he continued with the white man, who, he said—was under the influence of the evil spirit—he, too, departed. The intrepid missionary was now alone in the wilderness, and death stared him in the face. He was laid down with fever, and in want of the common necessaries of life; yet his trust in the good providence of God was so firm that nothing would induce him to desert his post. In this condition he was one evening going to his hut to lie down in his hammock, when a large snake attacked him. Of course he used every exertion to rid himself of the reptile, but it unfortunately bit him in several places during the struggle, and eventually succeeded in twining itself round his neck and arms. The thought now occurred to him that, in the event of his death, it would be supposed that the Indians had murdered him, and with wonderful presence of mind he got hold of a piece of chalk and wrote on the table the words, "A serpent has killed me." The same simple faith, however, that had been his stay hitherto still upheld him. He remembered the words of his divine Master to his disciples—"Behold I give unto you power to tread on serpents and scorpions . . . . and nothing shall by any means hurt you;" and by a final effort he shook off the reptile, which was of the boa species, and not venomous. "One day," we are told, "his solitude was broken in upon by a band of Caribisce, some fifty of whom landed from their canoes, flourished their war-clubs, and said they had come to kill him. Dachne bade them welcome, and the chief came forward with an interpreter, and asked who gave him leave to build on their land. He said, 'The governor.' Then, what did he come for? and the missionary answered, 'I have brethren on the other side of the great waters, who having heard that the Indians of this river are ignorant of God, have sent me to tell you of the love of God, and what he has done for you.' Then the chief said, 'Have you never heard that we mean to kill you?' 'Yes,' answered Dachne, 'but I cannot believe it. You have among you some who have lived with me, and they can tell you that I am the friend of the Indians.' To this the chief replied, 'Yes; I have heard so. They say you are a different sort of Christian from the white men in general.' The missionary said, 'I am your friend. How is it you come to kill me?' And at last the chief answered, 'We have done wrong.' And not only did the Indians disperse without harming this servant of God, but they left a bountiful supply of food."

The arrival of the two additional missionaries infused new life and hope into the heart of Dachne, and they all set to work deliberately to establish themselves in the position that they had taken up. They gave the place the name of Ephraim, and soon a little church for the performance of their ministrations, and a dwelling-house, were reared. Their busy hands could not be idle, and they next proceeded to clear the land in the vicinity, and to plant it with provisions.

But a time of trial was now coming on these devoted men. In 1759 the colony was visited by an epidemic that carried off the governor, nearly one half of the Dutch colonists, and forty Christian Indians. A scarcity of provisions added to the horrors of the pestilence. Although natives and Europeans were alike attacked by the fever, advantage was taken of the simplicity of the Indians to instil into their minds a notion that the visitation was sent upon the missionaries as a punishment by the evil spirit, and to work upon their superstitious feelings so as to induce them to desert the mission. For three years the epidemic raged, committing awful ravages among the white population, and not sparing the missionaries. Theos Schumann, who returned from a visit to Europe in 1760, fell a victim to it only six months after his arrival in the colony, and two other brethren, whom he had brought out, suffered the same fate a few weeks after. By the end of 1762 the settlement at Pilgerhut numbered only some twenty-two inhabitants, and the garrison of the colony was reduced to twenty men. The breaking out of the slave insurrection in 1763 was the death-blow of the Pilgerhut mission. The weakened condition of the settlement, and the exasperated state of the insurgents, induced the missionaries to seek safety in flight. So, hearing that a large body of slaves were approaching the settlement, they assembled those of their converts who were willing to share their fortunes; and dividing themselves into two companies, they set out for Demerara, where they arrived in safety, and were cordially welcomed and hospitably treated by the settlers. Here the history of this once-flourishing settlement closes. Some of the fugitive teachers returned to Europe. Two of them, by name Cleman and Vester, remained in Demerara, only to lay their bones in peace in the land where they had borne such grievous crosses for the Gospel's sake. The brethren on the Corentyn sought safety in Surinam.

It may be questioned whether, taking into consideration the leniency exhibited by the negroes towards the other ministers that fell in their way, the Moravians did right in deserting their posts. Bearing in mind their devotedness to the work of their Master, the generally courageous bearing that they displayed, and the power of their faith, it would seem that we must look for some special cause that would impel them to fly even before danger positively threatened them. We find a sufficient explanation of this conduct in the fact that the Indians displayed towards the negro (as they do to this day) an unconquerable animosity. Taking advantage of this, the planters had been in the habit of engaging their services for the recovery of runaway slaves, who had betaken themselves to a wild life in the bush. Consequently the negro came to look upon the Indian as his natural enemy—as the bloodhound that would scent his footsteps in the trackless forest, and render him back to a life of slavery. The missionaries, being the friends and patrons of the Indians, and white men into the bargain, would of course be peculiarly obnoxious to the hatred of the slaves. And so we find that when the Moravians established a mission called "Sharon," on the river Saramaca, in Surinam, in 1757, the bush negroes, who in that colony were a powerful body, made an attack upon the settlement four years after, killed three of the Indians, took eleven prisoners, wounded two of the missionaries, and set fire to the place. If this could be done coolly and deliberately, without any special provocation, we can hardly doubt but that the Berbice settlements would have fared no better at the hands of an infuriated mob of a similar character, with arms in their hands, conscious of innumerable wrongs, thirsting for revenge, and reckless of consequences. The missionaries knew with whom they had to deal; and the fate of the mission at "Sharon" seems to fully justify their precipitate flight, and indeed to give a colouring of wisdom and humanity to it: for, if they had awaited the coming of the negroes and defended themselves, loss of life and other evils would have been the result. Another justification of the missionaries of the Berbice River is afforded in their brethren of the Corentyn (without any opportunity of consultation) pursuing the same course, and retiring to Paramaribo on the outbreak of the insurrection. They returned in the following year only to find the place in ruins, and deserted by their little native flock. They therefore formed a new station, a little higher up the river, and, with unabated confidence, again sought to sow the good seed of the word in the wilderness. The new settlement was called "Hope," and for some years the progress of the missionaries entitled them to think that the name had been happily selected. But it is not in the nature of things that success should continue long without interruption. In 1783 there were 167 native Christians residing at "Hope." In the following years the numbers fell off, owing to the ravages of small-pox, the scarcity of provisions, and the unsettled habits of the people. The missionaries were very much discouraged, but better days were in store. In 1789, J. J. G. Fischer was appointed to the mission, and set to work so earnestly that matters were soon restored to a more favourable footing. He is described as a man of great power of mind and cultivated intellect, and possessed, moreover, a vigorous constitution,—one of those instances of mens sana in sano corpore which are so rarely met with, and which so admirably adapt their possessor for the work of the mission field.

He commenced by making himself acquainted with the Arawaak dialect, which he accomplished in the course of a few months so as to be able to preach in it. A school was established, and everything went on successfully till 1796. Then came the inevitable succession of troubles which have so invariably attended on Indian missions and paralysed the exertions of the teachers—epidemic, famine, desertion. To make matters worse, in 1798 Mr. Fischer, who had proved himself so well fitted for the post he filled, was ordered away from "Hope" by the government of Surinam. In 1799 there was a population of 300 at the settlement; but in the course of the five years following it dwindled down to one-half that number. Even yet the catalogue of disasters was not complete, for in 1806 the whole settlement was burnt down; and though the Brethren clung with a laudable tenacity to their ruined station for two years longer, the fatal scourge of small-pox came and swept away the few disciples that remained steadfast. They had now no alternative but to quit the post and seek in other parts for some more promising sphere of labour. This field was not, however, even yet totally abandoned. In 1812 two missionaries arrived to make a further experiment. But it would seem that such an amount of success was not vouchsafed to their efforts as to justify them in remaining. They therefore quitted the scene of so much self-denial, suffering, patience, and Christian resignation—ay, and of wonderful successes, difficulties surmounted, and prayers mercifully answered, to preach the Gospel to the negroes belonging to the plantations up the river Nicherie. In the year 1862 the writer visited the Corentyn, and found at Orealla one old man, totally blind, named Nathaniel, who appeared to be the sole survivor of the disciples of the Moravian missionaries. He was familiar with the leading truths of the Gospel, and had not forgotten several hymns in Arawaak, composed by the Brethren for their converts.

Thus ended the labours of the Moravians in British Guiana; and a bright and animating picture they present to us of what Christian love and resolution will accomplish. In contemplating their history we feel ourselves carried back to the Apostolic age, and see in these devoted men so many St. Pauls raised up to carry the blessed light of the Gospel among the distant heathen. That apostle they seem to have studied as the model of what a true missionary ought to be. Like him they laboured with their hands lest they should be found burdensome to their flock. With him they might have said, "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed; always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body." "Approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses . . . in labours, in watchings, in fastings; by pureness, by knowledge, by long-suffering, by kindness, by the Holy Ghost, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth, by the power of God, by the armour of righteousness on the right hand and on the left, by honour and dishonour, by evil report and good report: as deceivers, and yet true; as unknown, and yet well known; as dying, and, behold, we live; as chastened, and not killed; as sorrowful, yet alway rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things." They might have taken up his words, and gloried in their sufferings for Christ's sake. "In labours more abundant . . in deaths oft . . in journeyings often, in perils of waters, in perils of robbers, in perils by mine own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren; in weariness and painfulness, in watchings often, in hunger and thirst, in fastings often, in cold and nakedness. Beside those things that are without, that which cometh upon me daily, the care of all the churches."

A SUNDAY EVENING MEDITATION.

BY A BUSINESS MAN.

Blessed Sunday evening, so quiet and still, how sweet art thou to my heart after a day's enjoyment in the sanctuary! Thou art to the soul what the peaceful summer evening is to nature after the day has been crowned with the goodness of Him whose paths drop fatness. Brightly has the Sun of Righteousness again shone into our hearts, quickening them by his life-giving rays; and like a softening, refreshing dew the gospel of salvation has alighted upon our thirsting souls, preparing, strengthening, encouraging, and sanctifying us for another week's work in the service of Jesus. And now my heart, like a well-worked, well-watered field, rests in the evening shade, recounting the blessings of the day, and thanking Him who "maketh the outgoings of the evening to rejoice."

Such the Sunday evening ought always to be—a grateful echo of the day's resurrection hymn. Alas! too often it is to me a forecast of the coming bustle of the week. After the last sermon has been heard and the last benediction received, it is as though our earthly hearts thought they had now given to God what is God's, and might safely open the gates of the temple to let in "those that sell oxen and sheep and doves, and the changers of money." We think we have had for the day enough of the question, "What think ye of Christ?" Other questions may now have their place. What think ye of trade? of the war? of the election? of So-and-so whom you saw at church to-day? of the marriage of your brother? of the pleasure-trip which you have schemed for the ensuing summer? of the last new novel? of the new fashion that has just been introduced from Paris? may each be discussed in turn.

Alas! I deeply feel that I still live a double life. How is it that I can so seldom find out the point where heaven and earth meet? That point is in Christ. In Him heaven and earth are re-united, become one. When on earth He was truly in heaven; now that He is in heaven He is truly on earth. When about to ascend up, He said, "I am with you; and with you I shall remain alway, even unto the end of the world." He was the "free Son of God," easily moving in both provinces of his Father's immeasurable kingdom. Alas! I feel I am not yet free with the freedom of the Son. I have such difficulty in soaring up to heaven! I slide so easily down to the earth again, where for a moment I have risen! Were I to-night to speak to my friends about that "cunning fox," Mr. W——, the shipbroker, who tried to cheat me the other day, I should feel little disposed to speak afterwards about the love of Jesus as manifested on the cross. Perhaps I could bring myself to do so, but with a feeling similar to that of a person who, on a sudden, is taken out of bed.

Jesus was pure when He was on earth; and therefore He could, if necessary, speak even of impure things without his mind receiving any stain from them. His pure heart responded not to the uncleanness without. His was that spirit to which every creature of God is good; that spirit which cannot see the evil except to rejoice all the more in the good, nor the devilish except to press the divine all the more fervently to its bosom. He knew no standpoint from which to look at creation, at heaven and earth, at man and his doings, at the devil and his devices, at history, its progress and its end, but God, the centre of all, from which all things flow and to which all things must return. The chief question with Him was not in what connection the things round about stood to his own self, but to God. Seeing the good, He saw it crowned with the glory of God. Seeing the evil, He saw it conquered and punished by God; He saw it overruled by God for the realisation of his own plan and counsel. So nothing could separate Him from the love of God, neither height, nor depth, nor any other creature. He knew all the evil which Herod was prepared to do to Him, and yet the thought of that raised no desire of revenge, nor ill-feeling in his heart. He knew that the evil, whatever it might be, would be transient, and only enhance his own future glory. But within the range of these thoughts and sympathies, there lay also this question, How Herod might be saved by the good? "Go ye and tell that fox, Behold I cast out devils, and I do cures to-day and to-morrow, and the third day I shall be perfected."

Oh, if I could in the same spirit think of Mr. W——. I feel I ought to be able to speak of him on a Sunday evening without marring in the slightest the sacred character of the day. But I fear I could not. I should most likely turn angry. I fear I should detail all the proceedings to bring out fully that man's villany and my own innocence in the matter; and the whole case would so engross my thoughts as to make me for the moment forget God and Christ, eternity and salvation. All the fruit of my religious engagements during the day, the impressions of two sermons, the effects of so many prayers and hymns, would, as if with one stroke, be swept away, and this blessed day, begun in the Spirit, would be finished in the flesh. And there are hundreds of subjects besides, which, if broached, would entirely spoil my Sunday night. Indeed, I begin to see that I must keep my thoughts strictly fixed upon religious matters to be able to abide with Christ. The moment any secular topic comes in, I am in danger of sliding from the top of the holy mountain, and of being dragged down again into the mire of selfish calculations, worldly reflections, and, sometimes even, of ill-controlled passions.

This indeed is very sad. It shows that I have not yet got rid of my own miserable self—that I am still looking upon that self as the centre of everything, the whole creation moving round it, as the planetary system round the sun. It shows that I have not yet learnt to see God in the middle of the universe, and everything in connection with or in relation to Him. Alas! what a straitened state of mind this is, not to be able to abide with Christ unless all the doors be locked and the windows shut. What a narrow notion of God one must have when he is not able to find Him on earth, and always needs the ladder of solitary meditation to climb up to heaven! It is true, as the singer of the 115th Psalm says, that "the heaven, even the heavens are the Lord's, but the earth hath he given to the children of men." But this saying is preceded by another one, "The Lord made heaven and earth." Again the Spirit says, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." This is just as true at the noisy, bustling Exchange of London, as in the quiet, solitary closet. Indeed, it is heathenish to think that the Lord is God of the hills but not God of the valleys. Thus the Syrians thought who lived without God and without Christ in the world (1 Kings xx. 28). But Rahab, from whom Christ is born after the flesh, said, "The Lord your God, he is God in heaven above and in earth beneath" (Josh. ii. 11). If I could only cease to look at my own self, and begin to see God everywhere, as the One from whom, through whom, and unto whom all things are, it would always be Sabbath within me, even though I were sitting in the midst of a market crowd.

I heard two good sermons to-day. The one reminded me that Christ is made unto me salvation, the other that He is made unto me sanctification. In other words, this means that He is my greatest treasure for time and eternity. What real harm or profit can there then be for me in any other person or thing? Are they not, taken altogether, only a combination of transient instruments in the hand of God to carry out his glorious purposes, to make that everlasting treasure, Christ, all the richer, and greater, and fuller? One day all things round about me will collapse, and Christ with his Church will rise out of it, full of glory and majesty, just as, after the collapse of the scaffolding, the wonderful palace comes more clearly to light in all the riches of its beauty. What was all that noise and bustle, that loud hammering, and sawing, and chiselling for? "To earn my wages," replied the operative. "To fill my purse," said the builder. But the king's children who are to inhabit that royal mansion, smiled, and thought, "When all of you will have left the place, then shall we know what it was for." What, after all, is the end for which God put me in my business, for which He now gladdened me with success, now distressed me with adversity, now alarmed me by failures? Truly my person could not be that end, unless so far as it all tended to chisel and to polish, to shape and to fit me for a stone in the great spiritual temple of Christ. Why do I not always look upon my business in that light? Alas! because I so seldom have that temple in my view; and because I so seldom remember that I am a stone, and only a stone in it. My own house is so often the temple in my proud fancy.

We are commanded to rest during one day, and work during six days. But we were never commanded to be heavenly-minded during one day, and earthly-minded during the other six. If it is true that I am bought by Jesus at a price, then I am his property, not only for to-day, but for to-morrow, and the day after to-morrow, and all my life long. Then I am his servant in my office as in my closet. Nay, everything that is mine is his; my house and my garden; my warehouse and its goods; my fire-safe and its contents—it all belongs to Him. I am only his steward, appointed to administer these things for his glory, for the support and promotion of his cause. Thus they are not profane but holy things, all consecrated to the service of God and his Christ. Why, then, should their management prevent me being heavenly-minded? Or why should the thinking or speaking of them be unfitted for a Sunday evening? If my heart by so doing is drawn away from Christ, surely the fault cannot lie with those things, but with my heart. If my heart was what it ought to be, nothing could separate it from Christ. If it is not what it ought to be, it will continue separated from Christ, even though it should all day be engaged in reading God's word and praying. A king is a king even though clad with rags, and a slave can never become a king by dressing himself in purple, and by adorning himself with a crown and a sceptre. If my heart loves Mammon more than God, it will worship in the temple of Mammon though I be sitting in the temple of God. And if my heart love Jesus more than all the gold in the world, it will worship Jesus though I be sitting in the midst of piles of sovereigns and heaps of bank-notes. Whatever a true priest does is priestly and holy, whether he does it within or without the tabernacle. The priest is more than the tabernacle. The tabernacle does not sanctify the priest, but the priest sanctifies the tabernacle. And is not a Christ-loving heart more than gold? So the gold does not secularise that heart, the heart sanctifies the gold.

It is a sad state of things this having a divided mind. But how am I to prevent a recurrence of it? How am I to secure—not the bending of knees, the folding of hands, the singing of hymns and the utterance of prayers—but the true worshipping of God in the spirit during a Sunday? How am I to preclude the earthly profane things from coming into the heavenward-directed mind? Alas! I know of no Sunday on which it does not happen more or less. I have tried everything to prevent it. In vain! I might just as well have tried to prevent the birds from flying into my garden; I might scare them away for one moment, but they were sure to come back the next. It is impossible to keep the world out of one's thoughts during a whole day—utterly impossible.

But if it is impossible, how can it be required? Does God require us to do what we cannot possibly do? Is it required? Is the Christian religion given for man as he really is, or for man as he is not? Is it necessary first to etherealize oneself into an abstract, ideal sort of being, before one can be a truly devoted Christian? Is Christ given to us only to draw our minds away to abstract notions? Or is He given to enable us to worship and glorify God in this real world in which we are placed? The latter no doubt is the case. When making intercession for his disciples, our Lord prayed: "I pray not that thou shouldst take them out of the world, but that Thou shouldst keep them from the evil." He desired they should remain in the world, that, on seeing their work and witnessing their conduct, "the world should believe that God had sent Him" (John xvii. 21). So the world is the very arena of the Christian's operations—the world, i.e., that vast system of persons and things in which I find myself, with my wife and children, with my clerks and fellow-merchants, with my office and warehouses, with Mr. W—— also. I find myself, by God's providence, placed in connection with all those persons and things, and it is in connection with them that my Lord will have me to manifest my religion, to worship Him, to exercise myself in godliness, to fit myself for my everlasting destiny. Now, if all this is true, why should it be improper to allow these persons and things to come into my mind while praying? Is it not absurd to require, at the moment when one's soul, in solitary, hallowed devotion, is musing on its relation to its Saviour, that those very objects which had such a strong, decisive bearing upon that relation, either for better or for worse, should anxiously be excluded? Suppose a king sends his son to the army in a distant country, to have him exercised as a good soldier. Suppose after many months the young man comes back on a visit to his royal father, whom he approaches with love and reverence. He enters on a confidential conversation, in which he discloses his love for his beloved father, and tells him all he feels for him. But he anxiously abstains from speaking about the army, about the persons with whom he has to deal, about his experiences in the daily turmoil of a soldier's life, about the food, about the dress, about his quarrels and dangers, about his difficulties and pleasures. In short, he anxiously avoids to touch upon any of those very things in the midst of which his father placed him with the expressed purpose of having him trained in them. "These things," he thinks, "are too common, too vulgar for such a sublime prince as my father is. If I want to speak of them I must quit the room and absent myself from him." Would it not be absurd to suppose such a case? Would a tender-hearted father be satisfied with such a conversation? Could a loving son satisfy himself with such an empty show of words?

Yet such an absurd hypocrisy was I guilty of this morning. My Saviour, how grossly have I offended Thee! Thou hast watched me all the week, in all my outgoings and ingoings. Yet I have treated Thee as if Thou wert perfectly ignorant of them. Thou who, in Thy providential wisdom, hadst allowed or caused all those things to pass, in order that I too, with so many thousands of Thy children, should be trained and exercised in the midst of them! Why did I not speak to Thee about them? Why did I not tell Thee how my heart felt under them? Why did I not pour out my heart's anxiety and fear into Thy bosom? I might have given free course to my thoughts, as I really did this morning, even in Thy presence, and Thou wouldst have felt with me, and Thou wouldst have quieted the agitated waves within. But, alas! I withdrew from Thee. I thought Thou wert too spiritual for such material things. Thou, who becamest man; who wert in all points tempted like as we are; who even now, though sitting on a throne of glory, art the man Jesus Christ! (1 Tim. ii. 5.) Son of God! when shall I really believe that Thou art come in the flesh?

I am afraid my Christianity is too sublime, and I am in danger of turning carnal from over-spirituality. I feel I have not yet learnt to make Jesus my all and all, else I should not exclude Him from a thousand things from which I do not exclude myself. I am walking on this earth hoping to go to heaven some day. This is not Christian. I ought to be dwelling in heaven, and only on a visit to this earth to do some work for my Lord and Master. That is the true Christian state. If I am in Christ, I am set with Him in heavenly places, and everything which I am connected with here below stands in connection with Him, because I am his. But, alas! I am so often under an impression that He will have nothing to do with the things with which He bids me have to do. As if He had sent me to a place where He refuses to be himself! He who one time most likely was standing at his foster-father's bench, tool in hand! We should not think of calling that a spiritual condition. Still, He who was labouring there in that carpenter's shop, was the quickening Spirit Himself (1 Cor. xv. 45). I have experienced that I may be very unspiritual even while praying. I feel I shall not be able truly to pray, till I have learned to be spiritual even while writing out an invoice.

PHILIP MELANCTHON.

With its apple-trees and pear-trees all round it, with its cherries for the early summer and its walnuts for winter, Bretten is such a village as most boys would like to live in; and, embosomed amidst sunny slopes, which pour forth corn and wine, it ought to be the very home of peace and plenty. Here, four hundred years ago, George Schwarzerd followed his craft as an armourer. His very occupation was a hint of the dangers which have so often surrounded the fruitful Palatinate, and it was with looks which told of a troublesome world that George beat out the corslets and sharpened the swords with which his neighbours, when needful, should defend their orchards and farms. A man of warm affections as well as dark forebodings, he took leave of life somewhat gloomily, praying God to preserve his son amidst the "terrible tempests" which were ready to burst on the world.

That son (born February 16, 1497) was then only eleven. In affectionateness and in a seriousness so deep as to be sometimes mournful, he resembled his father; but the main influence on his mind was exerted by his mother. Well-born—for her father had been chief magistrate of Bretten—and with a remarkable transparency and truthfulness of character, to the grace and elevation of the Christian lady she added the practical talent and sunshiny kindness of the housewife and mother; and thus, whilst the moody blacksmith, nearer the earth than his more angelic helpmate, hung sombre on the domestic horizon, Barbara Reuter kept the sky clear towards the zenith. Her homely rhymes still float about amongst the German peasantry:—

> "Almsgiving beggareth not;
> Church-going hindereth not;
> To grease the wheel delayeth not;
> Gain ill-gotten helpeth not;
> God's book deceiveth not."

Under her fond, though sensible guidance, Philip soon opened up into a gentle, studious child, and made wonderful progress in such learning as Bretten could supply.

In giving a young person a present, it is well to remember how much may sometimes hinge upon it. Even without a little cannon to play with, it is possible that the first Napoleon might have turned out a soldier; nor does the present of a little ship always send a boy to sea: but where the keepsake falls in with existing tastes, it will add to the bias, and may even decide the destiny. A kinsman, himself a learned man, and who had taken much interest in Philip's progress, sent him two books, and they may be said to have given a turn to all his pursuits as well as a goal for his entire career. One of Reuchlin's books was a Latin Bible; the other was a Greek grammar. To the happy recipient each was a priceless acquisition. Greek, itself one of the finest creations of human intelligence, was a golden key, and opened the door of a spacious treasury which few had yet entered, and where, covered with dust but untarnished, lay ready for the lifting massive ingots and minted money stamped with the image and superscription of the mightiest geniuses amongst the sons of men. The Bible, again, ushered him into God's own world—a world of love and of heavenly fatherliness—that world of Divine perfections and of high human hopes and aspirations of which scarce a glimpse could be gained by those who only looked in through the peep-holes of the Papacy. Into the mind of the docile student and worshipper the "grace and truth" came at once; nay, Christ himself came in, the supreme object of faith and affection.

At a later period the same kinsman sent his young friend another present: he gave him a new name. This was at that period quite the fashion among scholars. Reuchlin's own name, meaning Smoky, or Reekie, had been translated into Capnio; and in the same way he covered with "well-sounding Greek," the gritty German Schwarzerd, or Black-earth, under which his grand-nephew had been born into the world, and thus set a-going the now immortal name MELANCTHON.

When little more than twelve the boy was sent to the neighbouring university of Heidelberg, and thence to Tübingen. So precocious were his abilities, and so rapid his acquirements, that he soon attracted the attention of the learned, and in 1518, when only one-and-twenty, he was invited to the Greek professorship at Wittemberg. Here he found in the chair of theology a broad burly Saxon, with a trace of the tonsure on his crown, but with nothing of the monk in his visage: manifestly no schoolman, but a sincere and earnest seeker after truth, looking out on his hearers with honest human eyes, and speaking in tones which from the deepest and most awe-struck emotion could rise to piercing invective and stormy passion. The theologian, however, could hardly conceal his disappointment when the new professor arrived. A stripling, of slim figure and awkward gait, timid and embarrassed, and, except in his lofty brow, with no air of mastery, he was a striking contrast to his sturdy energetic colleague. A few days passed on, and the new-comer delivered his inaugural oration. It was a marvel of eloquence: the master-piece was unveiled; the lamp was brought out from under the bushel, and as it was held on high all Wittemberg rang with the name of Melancthon. No one was more thoroughly charmed than Luther. With the full force of his intense and ardent nature he gave himself to "Philip," and in such a master of ancient Greek devoutly hailed a helper sent from Heaven. For the next five-and-twenty years the youth of Germany came pouring into Wittemberg to learn the language of Plato and Homer, and as many as fifteen hundred at once have been seen hanging on the lips of the charming interpreter.

But whence the joy of Luther? What has Greek to do with the Gospel? Well, the Reformer was puzzling over the Latin translation of the Bible, and with small knowledge of the original, he was often a good deal perplexed. On the whole, even through that misty medium, it did seem pretty plain that salvation is wholly of grace, and that the work of the sinner has been undertaken and finished by Christ. But what is this? "Perform penance, that your sins may be blotted out. Be penitent and believe the Gospel." "What is it, Philip? In the original tongue, how readest thou?" And when Philip assured him that in the original there was not a word about penitence or penance, that μετανοεῖτε was really nothing more nor less than "take another thought—change your mind," "take another thought and believe the Gospel, that your sins may be blotted out"—"whoso turns to God and amends his ways—whoso changes his mind respecting Christ and is baptised, the same shall be saved"—another snare of the fowler was broken, and Luther clapped his wings with joy.*

In the great effort to give the German people God's Word in their own tongue, the two Reformers were a mighty help to one another—Luther, with his vigorous command of the vernacular; Melancthon, with his delicate sense of the original. And all throughout, in God's wisdom wonderful, the fellow-labourers admirably supplemented and seconded one another. As Luther says of himself, "I was born for struggling on the field of battle with partisans and devils. Thus my writings breathe war and tempest. I must root up stock and stem, clear away thorns and brambles, and fill up swamps and sloughs. I am like the stout pioneer who must clear and level the road. But our master of arts, Philip, goes forward quietly and gently, cultivating and planting, sowing and watering joyfully, according as God has dealt to him so liberally of His gifts." †

There was another service which Melancthon at this period rendered to the cause of a pure Christianity. A work was wanted in which thoughtful readers should find the outlines of revealed religion in orderly arrangement, free from superstitious admixtures, and set forth in language perspicuous and simple. This work the young professor undertook, and it was a task for which he was singularly adapted. He was not an ecclesiastic. As far as we know, he never was ordained. He approached the Gospel with the modesty of a learner and a layman, free from professional trammels, and assuming to know nothing except what he had acquired at the great Master's feet. At the same time he brought to the study and exposition the largeness of an intellect wide in its range and universal in its information, and that fairness of mind and sweetness of spirit which are still more charming than the fluent and elegant style. The result was a little Manual, published in 1521, and which, under the name of "Theological Commonplaces," found such favour that, before the end of the century, ninety-nine editions had been published, either in translations or in the original Latin. Of these translations one was in Italian; and at Rome itself it was so greatly admired that it was rapidly circulating in the very precincts of St. Peter's. When the discovery was made that "Signor Ippofilo da Terra Negra" was no other than a German heretic in a Tuscan disguise, the book was ordered to be burned.*

The time of its appearance was opportune. Preceding by fourteen years the Institutes of Calvin, it served as a manifesto of the Reformers and a compendium of evangelical theology, and its temperate, well-guarded statements were readily received by many who would have been irritated by the vehemence, or repelled by the paradoxes of Luther; whilst its plan of simply explaining and proving the truth, without assailing its adversaries, commended it to readers who disliked polemical wrangling.

Indeed, for the period in which he lived it may be allowed that Melancthon had too little taste for doctrinal discussion. If "the faith once delivered to the saints" is assaulted, we are bound to defend it, and it is only by "proving all things" that we can "hold fast that which is good." It is to the honour of Melancthon that he did not evade a distasteful necessity, but accepting it as a "burden of the Lord," bore his own share in the keen and anxious contests of the time, and, second only to one, made a mighty contribution to the cause of Reform.

Still, men may be patriotic, and yet not fond of campaigning; and the battle of the warrior was no joy to Melancthon. His gentle and sensitive spirit shrank from the rude encounter; coarse invective and personal raillery were weapons which he could not use; and the candour which sees good attributes, or a measure of truth, on the opposite side, however fit for a judge, is fatal to a popular champion. To all this must be added, that the sacramentarian controversy and the ecclesiastical questions which came to be so eagerly canvassed, lay remote from that region which was the home of his spirit; and when he would fain have been seeking communion with Heaven, or practising the weightier matters of domestic piety in the midst of his household, he felt it hard to turn out and take part in a theological fray. Every man who would serve his generation, must do a large amount of irksome work, and every Christian has a cross to carry. Ecclesiastical controversy was the cross of Melancthon, and his irksome but inevitable task was to take part in the fruitless discussions between Lutherans and Zuinglians, as well as in the more vital questions between Papists and Protestants.

With his lofty intellect and a spirit at once devout and truth-loving, he would have liked to pursue such studies as are represented by his "Common-Places," and his "Commentary on Romans." Next to these his great delight was the language and literature of ancient Greece. "They are the fountain of all our finest thoughts and fairest arts. Where else can you find a complete philosophy? Where else the history of empires and of those events which are not included in the sacred narrative?" "For rightly understanding the New Testament, containing as it does the Gospel of Jesus Christ, this language is indispensable. There are in it many words, many figures and phrases, many sentences which carry a wondrous weight in the original, whilst a deep divine wisdom breathes through the whole. I should deem him no mean scholar who could translate the Testament truly and happily, and give us anything of its force and energy."* To his students he would say, "Love the doctrine and writings of Paul, and often peruse them. You will find them of more service than whole heaps of commentaries. The man who has got the clue to the Pauline epistles, and who reads them constantly over, will learn much more than he who is continually handling mere commentators." At the same time he loved the language itself, and he banished to the companionship of "pigs and their acorns" the barbarians who disdained its treasures. His eloquent prelections went far to make it popular, and earned for him the title, "Preceptor of Germany."

He died on the 16th of April, 1560, at Wittemberg, and was laid in the grave beside Luther. Hearing that he was ill, his friend Camerarius hastened to see him. The dying scholar repeated the verse in Greek, "I have a desire to depart and be with Christ," and then expatiated on the meaning of the word, ἀναλῦσαι. "I have a desire to weigh anchor. I have a desire to be moving, passing on, setting about my journey, so as to leave this life of toil for the blessed rest of heaven." And when at his own request they moved his couch into his library, he smiled, and, still alluding to the same thought, remarked, "This couch may be called my travelling carriage, since it is in it that I am likely to take my departure." On his last day, with characteristic fondness, he dwelt on those words of the Master which few since that Master have ever so entirely adopted, "That they all may be one, as we are one." He also mentioned that the words lay very near his heart, "To as many as received Him, He gave power to become the sons of God." His medical son-in-law, the excellent Peucer, gave him a cordial, and asked if he would like anything else. He answered "Nothing else but heaven"—"Aliud nihil, nisi cœlum." He fainted, and, thinking him gone, some one called aloud, when he revived, and said his last word, "Disturb not my sweet repose."

During his illness he had been observed writing on a scrap of paper. After his decease it was found, and turned out to be reasons for desiring to die. "Thou shalt depart from sins. Thou shalt be delivered from sorrows, and from the contention of divines. Thou shalt come to the Light. Thou shalt see God. Thou shalt learn those wondrous secrets which in this life thou couldst not fathom. Thou shalt learn why we are thus framed, and what is the union of the two natures in Christ." "O that I had wings like a dove!" had been his frequent exclamation, and he was getting them now. Little did those around him surmise the topics about which for forty years his calm and lofty intellect had been exercised—the mystery of man's existence on earth—"Why thou art thus framed," even the redeemed sons of God, the animal and the angel so strangely linked together; and that other mystery, the Incarnation, the Son of God become the Son of Man. These "wondrous secrets" had absorbed his mind. He had felt their fascination; he had desired to look into them, but he could not fathom them. But now he was going to the Light, and would understand them better. "Thou shalt be delivered from sorrows." These sorrows had been useful. He had said it himself, "If I had no anxieties, I should lose a powerful incentive to prayer, but the cares of life impel to devotion. Trouble sends me to prayer, and prayer drives away trouble." Nevertheless, the sorrows were not joyous but grievous: one of his two daughters married unhappily, the care of all the churches, and those bereavements which tore, and left frightfully wounded, feelings by far too tender.

From one of the greatest of miseries, the torture of malevolent affections, Melancthon was entirely exempted; nor can his be a joyless existence to whose mind such thoughts are familiar as come out in every page of his voluminous writings. If, as a theologian, obnoxious to the Romanists, and buffeted by his own brethren, he was popular as a professor, and he was rich in friends. Nearly seven thousand of his letters have been preserved, glowing with warm feeling and devout affection, and revealing in frequent glimpses a beautiful background of domestic and social happiness. The congenial pencil of Alexander Johnstone has painted a scene described by one of his earlier biographers: A Frenchman who had heard his fame, and who sought out his abode in Wittemberg, when he found him with a book in his hand rocking the cradle, could not conceal his amazement; but, so piously did he discourse on paternal duties and on that kingdom of heaven which belongs to the little children, that "the stranger went away much wiser than he came." In those days there was not the cold remoteness between masters and servants which now exists in many households. For four-and-thirty years there resided under the roof of Melancthon a faithful domestic, a native of Heilbronn, though of Swedish parentage. Through his faithful economy, the Reformer was enabled to maintain his continual charities as well as his extensive hospitality. He was a favourite with the children, who received from him their earliest lessons and no small part of their education; and he was a favourite with the students, who, in a body, attended his funeral. In his own perplexities, his master often sought his advice; and after his death inscribed on his tomb a Latin epitaph:—

"Here, at a distance from his native land,
Came honest John, at Philip's first command:
Companion of his exile, doubly dear,
Who in a servant found a friend sincere;
And more than friend—a man of faith and prayer,
Assiduous soother of his master's care.
Here to the worms his lifeless body's given,
But his immortal soul sees God in heaven."

EVENING THOUGHTS.

STAINED from within and from without,
I come again to Thee;
And as this water now has cleansed,
Cleanse Thou my soul for me.

Just as this raiment is put off,
Put off my pride from me,
And clothe me in the pure white robe
Of meek humility.

Now, even through its lowliness,
My soul to Thee can rise,
And offer as a royal priest
Its vesper sacrifice.

Here all I have and all I am
I on Thy altar lay,
And fill the censers with my thanks
For all Thy love to-day.

Thou hast been with me once again,
And kept me all day long;
And, though so foolish and so weak,
In Thee I have been strong.

Through all the gloomy mist around,
In Thee I have had light;
Through Thee, on Error's darkest ground,
Have fought once more for Right.

Send down Thy blessing on the good
Wrought in these working hours,
Just as Thy dew is falling now
Upon the fruits and flowers.

Thou knowest all that I would say
Of my mistaken deeds:
Thou, in the garden of my soul,
Know'st how to deal with weeds:

Now give me Thy belovèd's sleep,
Beneath Thy care at rest,
Safe as a little child when held
Upon its mother's breast.

And let my last dim waking thought
Rest lovingly on Thee;
And in my wondrous land of dreams
Thy glory may I see;

And when upon my eyes again
Fall morning's golden gleams,
Thou, "Sun of Righteousness," shine too,
"With healing in Thy beams."

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.

The "Eirenikon" of Dr. Pusey, in which, as we formerly noticed, he tries to show that in essential doctrines the standards of the Church of Rome and the Church of England, when candidly interpreted, are alike, and in which, from the very depths of his heart, he calls for union and communion between these two sections of Christendom, has caused, as might have been expected, no slight commotion. To the Evangelical section it is matter of profound regret that an able, learned and influential man should be so blind to the vast and vital differences between the system of Rome and the system of the Bible, and should rate so miserably low those great truths of the Reformation for which many of the best and noblest of the land cheerfully shed their blood. One Protestant Society has petitioned for his removal from his Professorship in the University of Oxford, believing him, by the avowal of such views, to have become disqualified to be a teacher in a Protestant University. Some even who favour Tractarian views have come forward to disavow the sentiments expressed in the "Eirenikon," and in letters subsequently published in the newspapers. The Rev. Archer Gurney declares that now Dr. Pusey stands alone in his views, and that though at one time there was a general disposition on the part of Anglo-Catholics to associate the papal system with their principles, yet others had resisted this tendency, which in Dr. Pusey was to be traced to a belief in the absolute endlessness and probable triumph of evil, and the dread of all advance of mind. The Tablet, the Dublin organ of the papal body, has given the advances of Dr. Pusey a somewhat rough reception, being extremely ill-pleased with his endeavour to prove that mariolatry is not properly part and parcel of the Roman Catholic system. It makes light of what Dr. Pusey has written against the practice of mariolatry; regards this as feebleness itself compared with what had been written by earlier Protestant writers; and feels assured that from so trivial charges the Church of Rome can sustain no damage whatever. In rehearsing the memorable events of 1865, the Guardian newspaper enumerates among others the publication of Dr. Pusey's "Eirenikon"; cautiously admits that on many points he is not to be followed; more than implies that what he aims at is for the present utterly hopeless and impracticable; but commends him for his publication as reminding us "how far we must all come short of the Christian standard while we are not one," and thus leading Anglicans and Catholics to lament their divisions, and labour and pray for their removal.

Meanwhile, another scheme of union has been somewhat unexpectedly brought before the public, or rather revived—a project for the union of the Greek Church with the Church of England. The report of a meeting held on 15th October last, in the office of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, in London, has reached this country, viâ Moscow, the meeting having been a private one, and the account of it communicated by Count Orloff, who was present, to a friend in Russia, who sent a letter to the Moscow Gazette. Among others present were the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Oxford and Lincoln, and the coadjutor-Bishop of Edinburgh. The proceedings pointed to the desirableness of steps being taken for inter-communion between the two Churches. Count Orloff explained that the Russian Church was only one of the five branches of the Eastern Catholic Church, and that it was impossible for any of the inferior clergy to decide questions of inter-communion, which could only be disposed of by the regular authorities. No resolutions were come to at this meeting; but all agreed that the cause should be promoted cautiously but incessantly. It may be presumed that those who favour this project are of opinion that there is nothing in the doctrines and practices of the Greek Church essentially opposed to the principles of the Church of England, an opinion which Count Orloff assumed, when he proposed "that works should to be published in England setting forth the history, doctrine, and present condition of the Anglican Church, with a view to proving that it is not a Protestant but Catholic Church, and accordingly related to the Eastern Church."

It would appear that the friends of the Sunday League, feeling probably that there is less likelihood than before of the British Museum and other scientific collections being opened to the public on Sundays, have resolved to draw on their own resources in order to make Sunday available for the scientific and general instruction of the people. A series of discourses has been commenced at St. Martin's Hall, Long Acre, on Sunday evenings, accompanied with sacred music. Among the lectures and lecturers announced, we find Professor Huxley, on the Desirableness of Improving Natural Knowledge; Sir John Bowring, on Religious Progress outside the Christian pale, amongst Buddhists, Brahmins, Parsees, Mahometans, &c.; Dr. Carpenter, on the Antiquity of Man; and Dr. W. B. Hodgson, on the Antiquity of the Earth. It is said that the lectures are under the patronage of Mr. Dickens, Mr. Darwin, Sir Charles Lyell, Sir J. Lubbock, Mr. Layard, M.P., Mr. J. Stuart Mill, Professor Owen, Professor Tyndall, Sir Joshua Walmsley, Sir J. G. Wilkinson, and others. It does not appear that the subjects are very different from those that, from not a few pulpits, have formed, occasionally at least, the Sabbath repast of Unitarian congregations; but in the shape which the enterprise has assumed, it may be regarded as an attempt to propound a new style of religious worship, a new remedy for the woes of humanity, a new pabulum for the cravings of the human soul. The movement proceeds on the principle that the refreshment and improvement of the intellect is one of the objects contemplated by the day of rest, and that instruction in the works of God, in nature, and elsewhere, is therefore a suitable employment on that day. Our readers may remember that the question was debated publicly a few years ago, on an occasion when Lord Stanley appeared among the advocates of these views, and that, in refutation of them, one of the best and most conclusive pamphlets ever written was published by the Rev. William Arthur, in a series of letters addressed to that nobleman. The pamphlet is not now beside us, but if we remember rightly its leading position was, that to employ the Sabbath day directly for intellectual improvement, or for physical recreation, was sure to defeat the higher ends for which the day was given, both as a season of rest and of religious exercise and communion with God. Once let the high spiritual character of the day be tampered with, and there is no security against its degenerating into a day of ordinary secular labour, or mere frivolous amusement. Intellectual refreshment will not be left out, where the religious character of the day is recognised; but, if the pursuit of intellectual refreshment become the direct and avowed object, the religious character of the day is sure to be lost. The lectures referred to are an instructive sign of the times. They indicate one of the more plausible modes of subverting the old idea of the Sabbath, which we may expect to be brought to bear for a time with increased vigour by the more intellectual class of secularists. To render such tactics inoperative, it is desirable not only that they be opposed by argument, but that similar lectures under more distinctly Christian auspices, be multiplied on week nights. For our own part, we do not anticipate that the plan will be very effective. Even the eminent names connected with it can hardly prevent one from smiling at the attempt. The class is a very large one that feel it a delight, or at least a duty, to devote the Lord's Day to religion; the class is also a large one that would fain give it to pleasure; but the intervening class, that would use it for mere intellectual advancement, is not a large one, and very far from enthusiastic or self-denying.

The prevalence of fever in London and other large towns, and the dread of cholera, or some other fearful epidemic, has once more attracted attention in influential quarters to the miserable condition of the dwellings in which a large proportion of the poor reside. An important letter was lately published in the Times, by Dr. Horace Jeafferson, late resident medical officer to the London Fever Hospital. This gentleman lately devoted a portion of time to a careful inspection of several of the poor districts of London, with a view, partly, to ascertain their sanitary condition, and partly, to find out the composition of the parish-vestries, who form the Sanitary Committee of the metropolis; and are, therefore, answerable for the lives and health of so many thousands. The revelations of Dr. Jeafferson are extremely sad. The want of water is almost universal. Even in the most favourable circumstances, the available water is collected in an old butt, often, perhaps always, extremely filthy; in many cases there is no butt, the water merely flowing for twenty minutes a day through an open pipe, when it is caught by those who bring their vessels to it; and in many other cases, the supply of water is exposed to the ooze of filthy substances, and cannot be drunk without a sickening effect. In some instances, there is no supply at all on Sundays, and the inhabitants of whole courts are dependent on the public-houses, which, of course, will not be likely to supply them with water, unless they are their customers for stronger liquors. It need not be remarked that fever is seldom absent from such localities, and that the utter absence of Christianity, the utterly godless and pagan aspect which many of them present, has some connection, at least, with their physical condition. Dr. Jeafferson found that of the elected members of vestries, publicans formed a more numerous class than the members of any other occupation. Butchers were as numerous as medical men, and very few persons of high social position were to be found in them. It thus became extremely difficult to carry out any real reform. The subject is surely worthy of the most earnest attention of Christian philanthropists. After what has been done in the "Potteries" by the estimable authoress of "Ragged Homes and How to Mend them," and the most interesting and encouraging illustration which that district affords of the blessed effects when earnest Evangelism allies itself with social reform, it does not need to be proved that Christians dare not shut their eyes to the physical miseries of the poor, nor abandon them unhelped to the destructive agencies by which they are surrounded. In Edinburgh, the new Lord Provost, Mr. William Chambers, has inaugurated a movement for opening up to the light and air of heaven the dense and crowded closes which spread out from the main streets of the Old Town. City missionaries and others who have devoted days and years to the endeavour to sow the good seed in such unprepared soil, and have had to encourage themselves with the sight of so very small a percentage of it springing up and bearing fruit, will welcome such movements, with no ordinary joy, and will offer their most earnest prayers that God's blessing may rest upon them.

A distinguished preacher, a barefooted Carmelite, has lately been creating a great impression in Paris. The archbishop, M. Darboy, impressed with the opposition between the spirit of modern times and the spirit of the Roman Catholic Church, had appointed Father Hyacinthe to the pulpit of Notre Dame, that he might endeavour in his sermons to bring them into harmony. With this view, M. Hyacinthe announced as the subject of a series of lectures, the examination of the new system of independent morality. Not in France only, but elsewhere, the idea is held by a number of sceptical philosophers, that morality does not depend on religion, but that the principles that are applicable to the ordinary duties of daily life may be sustained on an independent basis. The audiences that crowded to hear him were immense. The energy and eloquence of the preacher were most remarkable. But the tone which he adopted was far too liberal to suit the mass of the priesthood. For one thing, he claimed Protestants as his coadjutors. "I look over into the pale of Christian Protestantism," he exclaimed, "and I say, You are my auxiliaries. True, I cannot forget what separates us; but I cannot forget what unites us. Do you not believe in Christ, O my auxiliaries! I look no more to the abyss that exists between us; I extend to you a friendly hand, and I thank you for the help that you will lend me here, elsewhere, and everywhere, when I defend religious morals." This was sufficiently bold: but when, on another occasion, he spoke in praise of the institutions of the United States, the sin became unpardonable, and le Pere Hyacinthe was remanded to his convent, to meditate on the insuperable difficulty of reconciling the spirit of the age with a Church the famous Encyclical of whose Head, sent forth in 1864, has not yet passed into oblivion.

Facts are from time to time emerging in France indicative not only of wide-spread dislike to the Romish Church, but of deep-seated hostility to all religion. A new fraternity has been formed for the purpose of protecting its members from "the last rites of the Church." The society of Les Solidaires is now said to embrace many thousand persons in Paris, and has branches in all the principal towns of France, who are bound, on the summons of any member of the body or his family, to attend his dying moments, and protect him from the intrusion of priests; to arrange the funeral with economy and decorum; and to form as numerous a convoi as is consistent with other duties and occupations. The funerals attended by this society are conducted with a solemnity and importance which not only causes the absence of clerical rites to be less missed, but forms a demonstration against the clergy. The origin of this club is ascribed to the rapacity of priests in attendance on the dying, and the disgust caused by the manner in which they often take advantage of their feeble condition to obtain bequests of their property in favour of the Church. A new novel, La Croisade Noire, which has caused some sensation, has for its object to picture the intrigues, falsehoods, deceits, and bad passions that are often employed to secure a rich inheritance for monasteries, and is said to be from the life.

The license of sentiment prevailing among the younger educated men in France has received a remarkable illustration. A great gathering of young men took place at Liège, amounting, it is said, to 1500, of whom many were French students. They discussed all sorts of religious, social, and political problems, with a license to which the most advanced of debating societies, past or present, could afford no parallel. Several speakers, says the correspondent of Evangelical Christendom, proclaimed that their object was to abolish all religions, to destroy every church, and to get rid of the idea of God. Other speakers declared that the men of terror fulfilled their duty when, in 1793, France was inundated with blood; and they added that 100,000 heads must yet be struck off, in order to establish society upon a better foundation. Seven of these students, five of medicine and two of law, have been sentenced to be excluded for ever from the Academy of Paris. The correspondent of Christian Work refers to the exceedingly great activity of godless men, who are pouring infidel thought in streams into every reading population, through journals, almanacs, novels, and illustrated papers of all sorts. The dislike to clerical education is extreme. The attention of the authorities is frequently called to the strange and often hideous practices of clerical schools; and only the other day, an assistant nun-teacher in Paris was convicted of seizing infants' noses with heated tongs!

In Italy, steps have been lately taken by the Government for rescuing an important branch of education from priestly hands. In that country there are no fewer than 260 "seminaries"—i. e., theological training colleges of the Romish Church, but educating, at the same time, a great many youths destined to secular pursuits. The Government have insisted on having these institutions open to the visits of inspectors. This resolution gave rise to a loud outcry and a great opposition; but the inspectors persevered, and have given in their report. It appears that the education given to those attending these seminaries is utterly mediæval—anything savouring of modern light or progress being either excluded or reduced to a minimum. The inspectors generally remarked on the spiritless appearance of the young men—their very natures seemed crushed into a dull, formal, lumpish type—no free outcome of individual temperament, no joyous overflowing of young fresh life. The result has been that the revenues of these institutions have been put under administration: one-third assigned to the Church for the training of the bonâ fide clergy; and the other two-thirds retained for general educational purposes.

An outburst of the reforming sentiments, now prevalent among many of the clergy and people, took place somewhat strangely in the cathedral of Milan. The Bishop of Mandori had gone thither to preach during the Novena of the Immaculate Conception, and in doing so gave utterance to some violent Ultramontane sentiments. "On one occasion" (says the correspondent of the Guardian) "he was interrupted by some member of the congregation crying out, 'That is not the law;' and again, 'Let him preach the Gospel of Christ;' and again, 'Don't believe him.' A priest who was present accused the interrupter of being a Protestant; something like a tumult ensued; and the first speaker was apprehended but subsequently let go. Another day the well-known reform preacher, Don Ambrogio, preached on the steps outside the cathedral, while the bishop preached within. A large crowd had assembled to hear him, when suddenly a troop of sacristans and others rushed out of the cathedral and attacked Don Ambrogio and his hearers with sticks, when a complete street row ensued, Don Ambrogio being finally removed by the police. On the day of the fête itself some one fixed a petard to the front of the pulpit, which exploded just as the Bishop began to preach, creating of course great consternation. The Bishop returned thanks to the Virgin for his miraculous preservation; but the authorities of the city, getting alarmed at these continuous scenes of commotion, telegraphed to the Government for instructions, and the minister replied by orders to make the Bishop desist from further public functions in Milan, on pain of being sent back forcibly to his diocese. Such scenes remind us vividly of the sixteenth century, with the essential difference, however, that the secular arm is no longer to be found taking part with one side."

An interesting narrative is given in La Semaine Religieuse, of the singular adventures of a young Turk in search of the Gospel. This youth is the son of a pasha who filled a high position at Constantinople. At a very early age, he had read the Koran with great attention, and was dissatisfied with its contradictions; an earnest desire arose to become acquainted with the sacred writings of the Christians, and other religious bodies. One day in Constantinople he found in a shop a Turkish Bible, which he purchased, carried home, and along with his mother read it with deep interest, being particularly struck with its account of the character of Christ. His father, hearing of what was going on, was greatly enraged, treated him very harshly, and uttered terrible threats to deter him from his Bible-reading. But for three years he read on, and had his convictions more and more confirmed. At the end of that time, he was sent to Damascus, to study Syriac. Then he was ordered to go a pilgrimage to Mecca. On the voyage to Alexandria, a Romish priest became acquainted with him, and seeing his Christian tendencies, gave him such a glowing account of the Christianity of Rome, that he was persuaded to go with him to that city. But at Rome he was utterly dissatisfied with the showy and gorgeous worship, which was quite inconsistent with his Mahometan notions of simplicity, and presented nothing of the holy, spiritual life which his New Testament led him to look for in Christianity. To emancipate himself from the fetters of Romanism, especially after he had been baptised, and was so much in the hands of the priests, was a new achievement. At last, however, he succeeded. At Marseilles, whither he had been sent, to embark for the East, he found a Protestant pastor, who brought him to Florence, where he has been admitted among the students of theology of the Waldensian college. His religious education cannot but be defective, and his views obscure; but he is said to have a most child-like faith, and a remarkable knowledge of the Bible. His age is only nineteen. We heartily echo the prayer of the writer in La Semaine —"May God enlighten him with the light of life, and bring him a captive to the feet of Jesus Christ."

The American Bible Society's Record contains a letter from the Rev. Mr. Hickey, its agent in Mexico, giving some very interesting details of the religious movement among the priesthood of that Empire, to which we alluded in our last Number:—"The movement," he says, "seems to have begun with the priests rather than with the people, though both classes are concerned in it. Certain priests were much dissatisfied, not to say disgusted, with the vices of the clergy, and became doubtful about some of the dogmas of the Church of Rome. They entered upon a course of investigation, formed circles of inquiry which met together to study the Scriptures and consult authorities in Biblical interpretation. Many such circles of inquiry were instituted. The Rev. Mr. Gomez was a leader in this movement, and he was seized and put in prison. Others also began to preach the pure Bible. Among them was Don Henriquez Orestes, now in New York. For three years he preached the truth, and resigned a large income for conscience' sake, reducing himself to entire poverty. The number actually engaged in the reform movement it is not easy to estimate. The number connected with each circle is not uniform nor continuous; but it is safe to say there are at least 100 engaged in it, and not less than 500 who are interested in it, and desire to see it succeed. This is inferred from the facts that many letters of inquiry are received by the reforming priests from those who are seeking information, and many secret calls are made on them, when travelling, by persons of whom they had not previously heard. They come like Nicodemus, by night, to inquire into the truth, of which they have heard some vague report." The movement is quite of a religious nature. The priests belonging to it renounce auricular confession, worship of images, adoration of the Virgin and the saints, transubstantiation, and the celibacy of the clergy. They give the communion in both kinds, and advocate the reading of the Bible by the people. Many of the laity sympathise with them. Some newspapers containing articles on the reform movement are sold in double the usual numbers, and read with remarkable avidity. The leaders of the movement have not yet settled their future course. They are anxiously seeking the guidance of the Holy Spirit, being men of prayer and deep religious conviction.

From the opposite side of the earth, we have an interesting account by Dr. Legge of a visit lately paid by him to Japan:—"It is a lovely country," he writes, "and the climate is delicious. The eye rests everywhere on a verdure as rich as that of England; and there is a boldness and loftiness about the mountains in many places which give a grandeur to the aspects of the scenery which is not found in England. Largely metalliferous, the country is favourable to the intellectual and physical development of the inhabitants. The people are cleaner in their habits, more simple and child-like in their character, and more impressible, than the Chinese. At the same time they are less observant of the proprieties of decency, more revengeful, and perhaps less moral. Their language is easily acquired. Anyone at all a Chinese scholar would find the learning of Japanese a very easy task.

"One is struck with the contrast which the appearance and movements of foreigners present to what he has been accustomed in China. In Japan they look healthy and vigorous, as at home. The constitution there will wear out with lapse of time, as it must do everywhere; but it will not be prematurely exhausted. Hakodadi seemed to me as cool as Scotland, and much more balmy. The laws against Christianity are not yet repealed. Over the gateways of villages I saw in many places an outline of these laws written up. Things, however, are evidently working to a toleration. Following the great changes that have occurred, and along with the greater which are in progress, there must come shortly the freedom to missionaries of preaching, and liberty of profession and worship to Japanese converts.

"At Nagasaki and Yokohama there are missionaries, six in all, the representatives of three societies in the United States; also there are Roman Catholic missionaries. These are occupied in the study of the language, in preparing translations, and in teaching English and French in the schools instituted by Government, some of them gratuitously, and others for a stated remuneration. There is not a single agent from any or all of the missionary societies of Great Britain. This ought surely to be for a lamentation. The population of the Japan Islands is probably about the same as that of our British Islands. God is moving, in his providence, to open a great and effectual door for the entrance of his truth among them. Shall the opening come, and no messengers from the churches of our country be found prepared to go in at it?"

The Church Missionary Society has had to deplore the loss, since their last annual meeting, of several of their most valuable missionaries. The Intelligencer for December contains obituary notices of the Rev. Edward Rogers, a missionary in Western India, who died at Bombay on 8th August; Rev. Joseph Fleet, of the Travancore Mission, who died in the mission field, after a service of thirty-two years; and of the Rev. Gottlob Friedrich Bühler, of the Yoruba Mission, who, losing his health in Africa, returned to Stuttgart, and died there on the 27th of July last, at the early age of thirty-six. The number of the Intelligencer for January adds the record of four more deaths in the mission field: "Cockran, whose forty years of service comprises the history of the North-West American Mission; Noble, who with such holy constancy surrendered himself to the foundation work of the Telugu Mission, and who was satisfied to expend his life in digging deep, that he might lay the foundation on a rock; Pfander, the eminent Mahometan controversialist, whose works have already brought conviction to the minds of many Mussulmans, both in India and Turkey; besides these, a young missionary, the Rev. H. Bartlett, of Madras, who had just buckled on his armour—all these have gone." The loss of so many labourers, when the supply is at any rate so inadequate, is a serious trial, and may well lead, not only the Church Missionary Society, but all the friends of missions, to increase the earnestness of their cry to God to send forth labourers to his harvest.

An interesting account appeared in the Monthly Record of the Free Church of Scotland for December of the breaking up of the Brahma Somaj of Calcutta, a circumstance very significant in relation to the future of Brahminism. The Brahma Somaj was instituted by the celebrated Rajah Rammohun Roy. The object of it was to lead his countrymen to renounce polytheism, and to worship the one god, Brahma, of whom the Vedas were assumed to be a divinely authoritative revelation. The Brahma Somaj was an assembly or congregation established for his worship. Since the death of its founder, his followers have greatly increased. They include the élite of the educated native Hindoos. But they have been departing from his principles. The inspiration or infallible authority of the Vedas has been rejected. Natural theology, based on the manifestation of God's attributes in the works of creation, has been rejected. And for some years past, all religion has been declared to rest solely on the intuitions of the mind. Of late years the Somaj contained two parties—a progressive and a conservative. The progressive party, feeling painfully the practical antagonism between their avowed principles and the retention of certain old social habits and usages connected with caste, intermarriage, &c., began to plead for the modification or abandonment of these. The conservative party resisted the demand. The consequence has been a disruption of the Somaj. The advanced section are under the leadership of Babu Kesub Chandra Sen, formerly secretary of the Society. This gentleman delivered a lecture a few months ago in Calcutta, attended by seven hundred educated natives, mostly young men, besides a few Europeans. The principles and position of the progressive Somaj were set forth. An attempt was made at the close of the lecture to get an opportunity of reply, but the meeting was so enthusiastic in favour of the lecturer, that the opposition could not be heard. Dr. Duff, who is greatly interested in this movement, thinks that perhaps the most notable part of it was the resolution to establish a female Brahma mission. Accordingly, a Brahmica Somaj, consisting of thirteen ladies of respectable families, and mostly wives of persecuted Brahmins, has been established in Calcutta. At its formation, the presiding minister delivered a sermon in which he exhorted them to labour with earnestness, sincerity and trustful humanity, to cultivate their minds and souls under the shadow of the true church, looking for strength to the merciful providence of the holy God. It appears that several Christian ladies were present at the opening of this female Brahma Mission. The women were all intelligent, able to read, and wonderfully devout. An arrangement was made to meet with these women every Saturday, after their service, to talk with and instruct them. Of their own accord, they asked many questions on subjects of the deepest interest. "We cannot say" (Dr. Duff remarks) "what may come out of this, for with God all things are possible. Let earnest prayer ascend to the Father of spirits that fruit may result from the movement that shall redound to his praise and glory."

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

XII.

It will not appear strange that I should linger so long upon the first few months of my association with a people who, now that I am an old man, look to me like my own children. For those who were then older than myself are now "old dwellers in those high countries" where there is no age, only wisdom; and I shall soon go to them. How glad I shall be to see my Old Rogers again, who, as he taught me upon earth, will teach me yet more, I thank my God, in heaven! But I must not let the reverie which always gathers about the feather-end of my pen the moment I take it up to write these recollections, interfere with the work before me.

After this Christmas-tide, I found myself in closer relationship to my parishioners. No doubt I was always in danger of giving unknown offence to those who were ready to fancy that I neglected them, and did not distribute my favours equally. But as I never took offence, the offence I gave was easily got rid of. A clergyman, of all men, should be slow to take offence, for if he does, he will never be free or strong to reprove sin. And it must sometimes be his duty to speak severely to those, especially the good, who are turning their faces the wrong way. It is of little use to reprove the sinner, but it is worth while sometimes to reprove those who have a regard for righteousness, however imperfect they may be. "Reprove not a scorner, lest he hate thee; rebuke a wise man, and he will love thee."

But I took great care about interfering; though I would interfere upon request—not always, however, upon the side whence the request came, and more seldom still upon either side. The clergyman must never be a partisan. When our Lord was requested to act as umpire between two brothers, He refused. But He spoke and said, "Take heed, and beware of covetousness." Now, though the best of men is unworthy to loose the latchet of His shoe, yet the servant must be as his master. Ah me! while I write it, I remember that the sinful woman might yet do as she would with His sacred feet. I bethink me: Desert may not touch his shoe-tie: Love may kiss his feet.

I visited, of course, at the Hall, as at the farm-houses in the country, and the cottages in the village. I did not come to like Mrs. Oldcastle better. And there was one woman in the house whom I disliked still more: that Sarah whom Judy had called in my hearing a white wolf. Her face was yet whiter than that of her mistress, only it was not smooth like hers; for its whiteness came apparently from the small-pox, which had so thickened the skin that no blood, if she had any, could shine through. I seldom saw her—only indeed caught a glimpse of her now and then as I passed through the house.

Nor did I make much progress with Mr. Stoddart. He had always something friendly to say, and often some theosophical theory to bring forward, which, I must add, never seemed to me to mean, or at least to reveal, anything. He was a great reader of mystical books, and yet the man's nature seemed cold. It was sunshiny, but not sunny. His intellect was rather a lambent flame than a genial warmth. He could make things, but he could not grow anything. And when I came to see that he had had more than any one else to do with the education of Miss Oldcastle, I understood her a little better, and saw that her so-called e-ducation had been in a great measure re-pression—of a negative sort, no doubt, but not therefore the less mischievous. For to teach speculation instead of devotion, mysticism instead of love, word instead of deed, is surely ruinously repressive to the nature that is meant for sunbright activity both of heart and hand. My chief perplexity continued to be how he could play the organ as he did.

My reader will think that I am always coming round to Miss Oldcastle; but if he does, I cannot help it. I began, I say, to understand her a little better. She seemed to me always like one walking in a "watery sunbeam," without knowing that it was but the wintry pledge of a summer sun at hand. She took it, or was trying to take it, for the sunlight; trying to make herself feel all the glory people said was in the light, instead of making haste towards the perfect day. I found afterwards that several things had combined to bring about this condition; and I know she will forgive me if, for the sake of others, I endeavour to make it understood by-and-by.

I have not much more to tell my readers about this winter. As out of a whole changeful season only one day, or, it may be, but one moment in which the time seemed to burst into its own blossom, will cling to the memory; so of the various interviews with my friends, and the whole flow of the current of my life, during that winter, nothing more of nature or human-nature occurs to me worth recording. I will pass on to the summer season as rapidly as I may, though the early spring will detain me with the relation of just a single incident.

I was on my way to the Hall to see Mr. Stoddart. I wanted to ask him whether something could not be done beyond his exquisite playing to rouse the sense of music in my people. I believed that nothing helps you so much to feel as the taking of what share may, from the nature of the thing, be possible to you; because, for one reason, in order to feel, it is necessary that the mind should rest upon the matter, whatever it is. The poorest success, provided the attempt has been genuine, will enable one to enter into any art ten times better than before. Now I had, I confess, little hope of moving Mr. Stoddart in the matter; but if I should succeed, I thought it would do himself more good to mingle with his humble fellows in the attempt to do them a trifle of good, than the opening of any number of intellectual windows towards the circumambient truth.

It was just beginning to grow dusk. The wind was blustering in gusts among the trees, swaying them suddenly and fiercely like a keen passion, now sweeping them all one way as if the multitude of tops would break loose and rush away like a wild river, and now subsiding as suddenly, and allowing them to recover themselves and stand upright, with tones and motions of indignant expostulation. There was just one cold bar of light in the west, and the east was one grey mass, while overhead the stars were twinkling. The grass and all the ground about the trees were very wet. The time seemed more dreary somehow than the winter. Rigour was past, and tenderness had not come. For the wind was cold without being keen, and bursting from the trees every now and then with a roar as of a sea breaking on distant sands, whirled about me as if it wanted me to go and join in its play.

Suddenly I saw, to my amazement, in a walk that ran alongside of the avenue, Miss Oldcastle, struggling against the wind, which blew straight down the path upon her. The cause of my amazement was twofold. First, I had supposed her with her mother in London, whither their journeys had been not infrequent since Christmas-tide; and next—why should she be fighting with the wind, so far from the house, with only a shawl drawn over her head?

The reader may wonder how I should know her in this attire in the dusk, and where there was not the smallest probability of finding her. Suffice it to say that I did recognise her at once; and passing between two great tree-trunks, and through an opening in some underwood, was by her side in a moment. But the noise of the wind had prevented her from hearing my approach, and when I uttered her name, she started violently, and, turning, drew herself up very haughtily, in part, I presume, to hide her tremor.—She was always a little haughty with me, I must acknowledge. Could there have been anything in my address, however unconscious of it I was, that made her fear I was ready to become intrusive? Or might it not be that, hearing of my footing with my parishioners generally, she was prepared to resent any assumption of clerical familiarity with her; and so, in my behaviour, any poor innocent "bush was supposed a bear"? For I need not tell my reader that nothing was farther from my intention, even with the lowliest of my flock, than to presume upon my position as clergyman. I think they all gave me the relation I occupied towards them personally.—But I had never seen her look so haughty as now. If I had been watching her very thoughts she could hardly have looked more indignant.

"I beg your pardon," I said, distressed; "I have startled you dreadfully."

"Not in the least," she replied, but without moving, and still with a curve in her form like the neck of a frayed horse.

I thought it better to leave apology, which was evidently disagreeable to her, and speak of indifferent things.

"I was on my way to call on Mr. Stoddart," I said.

"You will find him at home, I believe."

"I fancied you and Mrs. Oldcastle in London."

"We returned yesterday."

Still she stood as before. I made a movement in the direction of the house. She seemed as if she would walk in the opposite direction.

"May I not walk with you to the house?"

"I am not going in just yet."

"Are you protected enough for such a night?"

"I enjoy the wind."

I bowed and walked on; for what else could I do?

I cannot say that I enjoyed leaving her behind me in the gathering dark, the wind blowing her about with no more reverence than if she had been a bush of privet. Nor was it with a light heart that I bore her repulse as I slowly climbed the hill to the house. However, a little personal mortification is wholesome—though I cannot say either that I derived much consolation from the reflection.

Sarah opened the glass door, her black, glossy, restless eyes looking out of her white face from under grey eyebrows. I knew at once by her look beyond me that she had expected to find me accompanied by her young mistress. I did not volunteer any information, as my reader may suppose.

I found, as I had feared, that, although Mr. Stoddart seemed to listen with some interest to what I said, I could not bring him to the point of making any practical suggestion, or of responding to one made by me; and I left him with the conviction that he would do nothing to help me. Yet during the whole of our interview he had not opposed a single word I said. He was like clay too much softened with water to keep the form into which it has been modelled. He would take some kind of form easily, and lose it yet more easily. I did not show all my dissatisfaction, however, for that would only have estranged us; and it is not required, nay, it may be wrong, to show all you feel or think: what is required of us is, not to show what we do not feel or think; for that is to be false.

I left the house in a gloomy mood. I know I ought to have looked up to God and said: "These things do not reach to Thee, my Father. Thou art ever the same; and I rise above my small as well as my great troubles by remembering Thy peace, and Thy unchangeable Godhood to me and all Thy creatures." But I did not come to myself all at once. The thought of God had not come, though it was pretty sure to come before I got home. I was brooding over the littleness of all I could do; and feeling that sickness which sometimes will overtake a man in the midst of the work he likes best, when the unpleasant parts of it crowd upon him, and his own efforts, especially those made from the will without sustaining impulse, come back upon him with a feeling of unreality, decay, and bitterness, as if he had been unnatural and untrue, and putting himself in false relations by false efforts for good. I know this all came from selfishness—thinking about myself instead of about God and my neighbour. But so it was.—And so I was walking down the avenue, where it was now very dark, with my head bent to the ground, when I in my turn started at the sound of a woman's voice, and looking up, saw by the starlight the dim form of Miss Oldcastle standing before me.

She spoke first.

"Mr. Walton, I was very rude to you. I beg your pardon."

"Indeed, I did not think so. I only thought what a blundering awkward fellow I was to startle you as I did. You have to forgive me."

"I fancy"—and here I know she smiled, though how I know I do not know—"I fancy I have made that even," she said pleasantly; "for you must confess I startled you now."

"You did; but it was in a very different way. I annoyed you with my rudeness. You only scattered a swarm of bats that kept flapping their skinny wings in my face."

"What do you mean? There are no bats at this time of the year."

"Not outside. In 'winter and rough weather,' they creep inside, you know."

"Ah! I ought to understand you. But I did not think you were ever like that. I thought you were too good."

"I wish I were. I hope to be some day. I am not yet, anyhow. And I thank you for driving the bats away in the meantime."

"You make me the more ashamed of myself to think that perhaps my rudeness had a share in bringing them.—Yours is no doubt thankless labour sometimes."

She seemed to make the last remark just to prevent the conversation from returning to her as its subject. And now all the bright portions of my work came up before me.

"You are quite mistaken in that, Miss Oldcastle. On the contrary, the thanks I get are far more than commensurate with the labour. Of course one meets with a disappointment sometimes, but that is only when they don't know what you mean. And how should they know what you mean till they are different themselves?—You remember what Wordsworth says on this very subject in his poem of Simon Lee?"—

"I do not know anything of Wordsworth."

"—'I've heard of hearts unkind, kind deeds
With coldness still returning;
Alas! the gratitude of men
Hath oftener left me mourning.'"

"I do not quite see what he means."

"May I recommend you to think about it? You will be sure to find it out for yourself, and that will be ten times more satisfactory than if I were to explain it to you. And, besides, you will never forget it, if you do."

"Will you repeat the lines again?"

I did so.

All this time the wind had been still. Now it rose with a slow gush in the trees. Was it fancy? Or, as the wind moved the shrubbery, did I see a white face? And could it be the White Wolf, as Judy called her?

I spoke aloud:

"But it is cruel to keep you standing here in such a night. You must be a real lover of nature to walk in the dark wind."

"I like it. Good night."

So we parted. I gazed into the darkness after her, though she disappeared at the distance of a yard or two; and would have stood longer had I not still suspected the proximity of Judy's Wolf, which made me turn and go home, regardless now of Mr. Stoddart's doughiness.—I do not think I had ever passed through that iron gate without looking up at the grotesque creatures on the pillars, and I fear I have mentioned them too often already; but this time I did not even look at them, I know—for I remembered it afterwards.

I met Miss Oldcastle several times before the summer, but her old manner remained, or rather had returned, for there had been nothing of it in the tone of her voice in that interview, if interview it could be called where neither could see more than the other's outline.

XIII.

By slow degrees the summer bloomed. Green came instead of white; rainbows instead of icicles. The grounds about the Hall seemed the incarnation of a summer which had taken years to ripen to its perfection. The very grass seemed to have aged into perfect youth in that "haunt of ancient peace;" for surely nowhere else was such thick delicate-bladed, delicate-coloured grass to be seen. Gnarled old trees of may stood like altars of smoking perfume, or each like one million-petalled flower of upheaved whiteness—or of tender rosiness, as if the snow which had covered it in winter had sunk in and gathered warmth from the life of the tree, and now crept out again to adorn the summer. The long loops of the laburnum hung heavy with gold towards the sod below; and the air was full of the fragrance of the young leaves of the limes. Down in the valley below, the daisies shone in all the meadows, varied with the buttercup and the celandine; while in damp places grew large pimpernels, and along the sides of the river the meadow-sweet stood amongst the reeds at the very edge of the water, breathing out the odours of dreamful sleep. The clumsy pollards were each one mass of undivided green. The mill-wheel had regained its knotty look, with its moss and its dip and drip, as it yielded to the slow water, which would have let it alone but that there was no other way out of the land to the sea.

I used now to wander about in the fields and woods, with a book in my hand, at which I often did not look the whole day, and which yet I liked to have with me. And I seemed somehow to come back with most upon those days in which I did not read. In this manner I prepared almost all my sermons that summer. But, although I prepared them thus in the open country, I had another custom, which perhaps may appear strange to some, before I preached them. This was, to spend the Saturday evening, not in my study, but in the church. This custom of mine was known to the sexton, and the church was always clean and ready for me after about mid-day, so that I could be alone there as soon as I pleased. It would take more space than my limits will afford to explain thoroughly why I liked to do this. But I will venture to attempt a partial explanation in a few words.

This fine old church in which I was honoured to lead the prayers of my people, was not the expression of the religious feeling of my time. There was a gloom about it—a sacred gloom, I know, and I loved it; but such gloom was not in my feeling when I talked to my flock. I honoured the place; I rejoiced in its history; I delighted to think that even by the temples made with hands outlasting these bodies of ours, we were in a sense united to those who in them had before us lifted up holy hands without wrath or doubting; and with many more who, like us, had lifted up at least prayerful hands, without hatred or despair. The place soothed me, tuned me to a solemn mood—one of self-denial, and gentle gladness in all sober things. But, had I been an architect, and had I had to build a church—I do not in the least know how I should have built it—I am certain it would have been very different from this. Else I should be a mere imitator, like all the church-architects I know anything about in the present day. For I always found the open air the most genial influence upon me for the production of religious feeling and thought. I had been led to try whether it might not be so with me by the fact that our Lord seemed so much to delight in the open air, and late in the day as well as early in the morning would climb the mountain to be alone with his Father. I found that it helped to give a reality to everything that I thought about, if I only contemplated it under the high untroubled blue, with the lowly green beneath my feet, and the wind blowing on me to remind me of the Spirit that once moved on the face of the waters, bringing order out of disorder and light out of darkness, and was now seeking every day a fuller entrance into my heart, that there He might work the one will of the Father in heaven.

My reader will see then that there was, as it were, not so much a discord, as a lack of harmony between the surroundings wherein my thoughts took form, or, to use a homelier phrase, my sermon was studied, and the surroundings wherein I had to put these forms into the garments of words, or preach that sermon. I therefore sought to bridge over this difference (if I understood music, I am sure I could find an expression exactly fitted to my meaning),—to find an easy passage between the open-air mood and the church mood, so as to be able to bring into the church as much of the fresh air, and the tree-music, and the colour-harmony, and the gladness over all, as might be possible; and, in order to this, I thought all my sermon over again in the afternoon sun as it shone slantingly through the stained window over Lord Eagleye's tomb, and in the failing light thereafter and the gathering dusk of the twilight, pacing up and down the solemn old place, hanging my thoughts here on a crocket, there on a corbel; now on the gable-point over which Weir's face would gaze next morning, and now on the aspiring peaks of the organ. I thus made the place a cell of thought and prayer. And when the next day came, I found the forms around me so interwoven with the forms of my thought, that I felt almost like one of the old monks who had built the place, so little did I find any check to my thought or utterance from its unfitness for the expression of my individual modernism. But not one atom the more did I incline to the evil fancy that God was more in the past than in the present; that He is more within the walls of the church, than in the unwalled sky and earth; or seek to turn backwards one step from a living Now to an entombed and consecrated Past.

One lovely Saturday, I had been out all the morning. I had not walked far, for I had sat in various places longer than I had walked, my path lying through fields and copses, crossing a country road only now and then. I had my Greek Testament with me, and I read when I sat, and thought when I walked. I remember well enough that I was going to preach about the cloud of witnesses, and explain to my people that this did not mean persons looking at, witnessing our behaviour—not so could any addition be made to the awfulness of the fact that the eye of God was upon us—but witnesses to the truth, people who did what God wanted them to do, come of it what might, whether a crown or a rack, scoffs or applause; to behold whose witnessing might well rouse all that was human and divine in us to choose our part with them and their Lord.—When I came home, I had an early dinner, and then betook myself to my Saturday's resort.—I had never had a room large enough to satisfy me before. Now my study was to my mind.

All through the slowly fading afternoon, the autumn of the day, when the colours are richest and the shadows long and lengthening, I paced my solemn old-thoughted church. Sometimes I went up into the pulpit and sat there, looking on the ancient walls which had grown up under men's hands that men might be helped to pray by the visible symbol of unity which the walls gave, and that the voice of the Spirit of God might be heard exhorting men to forsake the evil and choose the good. And I thought how many witnesses to the truth had knelt in those ancient pews. For as the great Church is made up of numberless communities, so is the great shining orb of witness-bearers made up of millions of lesser orbs. All men and women of true heart bear individual testimony to the truth of God, saying, "I have trusted and found Him faithful." And the feeble light of the glowworm is yet light, pure, and good, and with a loveliness of its own. "So, O Lord," I said, "let my light shine before men." And I felt no fear of vanity in such a prayer, for I knew that the glory to come of it is to God only—"that men may glorify their Father in heaven." And I knew that when we seek glory for ourselves, the light goes out, and the Horror that dwells in darkness breathes cold upon our spirits. And I remember that just as I thought thus, my eye was caught first by a yellow light that gilded the apex of the font-cover, which had been wrought like a flame or a bursting blossom: it was so old and worn, I never could tell which; and then by a red light all over a white marble tablet in the wall—the red of life on the cold hue of the grave. And this red light did not come from any work of man's device, but from the great window of the west, which little Gerard Weir wanted to help God to paint. I must have been in a happy mood that Saturday afternoon, for everything pleased me and made me happier; and all the church-forms about me blended and harmonized graciously with the throne and footstool of God which I saw through the windows. And I lingered on till the night had come; till the church only gloomed about me, and had no shine; and then I found my spirit burning up the clearer, as a lamp which has been flaming all the day with light unseen becomes a glory in the room when the sun is gone down.

At length I felt tired, and would go home. Yet I lingered for a few moments in the vestry, thinking what hymns would harmonize best with the things I wanted to make my people think about. It was now almost quite dark out of doors—at least as dark as it would be.

Suddenly through the gloom I thought I heard a moan and a sob. I sat upright in my chair and listened. But I heard nothing more, and concluded I had deceived myself. After a few moments, I rose to go home and have some tea, and turn my mind rather away from than towards the subject of witness-bearing any more for that night, lest I should burn the fuel of it out before I came to warm the people with it, and should have to blow its embers instead of flashing its light and heat upon them in gladness. So I left the church by my vestry-door, which I closed behind me, and took my way along the path through the clustering group of graves.

Again I heard a sob. This time I was sure of it. And there lay something dark upon one of the grassy mounds. I approached it, but it did not move. I spoke.

"Can I be of any use to you?" I said.

"No," returned an almost inaudible voice.

Though I did not know whose was the grave, I knew that no one had been buried there very lately, and if the grief were for the loss of the dead, it was more than probably aroused to fresh vigour by recent misfortune.

I stooped, and taking the figure by the arm, said,

"Come with me, and let us see what can be done for you."

I then saw that it was a youth—perhaps scarcely more than a boy. And as soon as I saw that, I knew that his grief could hardly be incurable. He returned no answer, but rose at once to his feet, and submitted to be led away. I took him the shortest road to my house through the shrubbery, brought him into the study, made him sit down in my easy-chair, and rang for lights and wine; for the dew had been falling heavily, and his clothes were quite dank. But when the wine came, he refused to take any.

"But you want it," I said.

"No, sir, I don't, indeed."

"Take some for my sake, then."

"I would rather not, sir."

"Why?"

"I promised my father a year ago, when I left home, that I would not drink anything stronger than water. And I can't break my promise now."

"Where is your home?"

"In the village, sir."

"That wasn't your father's grave I found you upon, was it?"

"No, sir. It was my mother's."

"Then your father is still alive?"

"Yes, sir. You know him very well—Thomas Weir."

"Ah! He told me he had a son in London. Are you that son?"

"Yes, sir," he answered, swallowing a rising sob.

"Then what is the matter? Your father is a good friend of mine, and would tell you you might trust me."

"I don't doubt it, sir. But you won't believe me any more than my father."

By this time I had perused his person, his dress, and his countenance. He was of middle size, but evidently not full grown. His dress was very decent. His face was pale and thin, and revealed a likeness to his father. He had blue eyes that looked full at me, and, as far as I could judge, betokened, along with the whole of his expression, an honest and sensitive nature. I found him very attractive, and was therefore the more emboldened to press for the knowledge of his story.

"I cannot promise to believe whatever you say; but almost I could. And if you tell me the truth, I like you too much already to be in great danger of doubting you; for you know the truth has a force of its own."

"I thought so till to-night," he answered. "But if my father would not believe me, how can I expect you to do so, sir?"

"Your father may have been too much troubled by your story to be able to do it justice. It is not a bit like your father to be unfair."

"No, sir. And so much the less chance of your believing me."

Somehow his talk prepossessed me still more in his favour. There was a certain refinement in it, a quality of dialogue which indicated thought, as I judged; and I became more and more certain that, whatever I might have to think of it when told, he would yet tell me the truth.

"Come, try me," I said.

"I will, sir. But I must begin at the beginning."

"Begin where you like. I have nothing more to do to-night, and you may take what time you please. But I will ring for tea first; for I dare say you have not made any promise about that."

A faint smile flickered on his face. He was evidently beginning to feel a little more comfortable.

"When did you arrive from London?" I asked.

"About two hours ago, I suppose."

"Bring tea, Mrs. Pearson, and that cold chicken and the ham, and plenty of toast. We are both hungry."

Mrs. Pearson gave a questioning look at the lad and departed to do her duty.

When she returned with the tray, I saw by the unconsciously eager way in which he looked at the eatables, that he had had nothing for some time; and so, even after we were left alone, I would not let him say a word till he had made a good meal. It was delightful to see how he ate. Few troubles will destroy a growing lad's hunger; and indeed it has always been to me a marvel how the feelings and the appetites affect each other. I have known grief actually make people, and not sensual people at all, quite hungry. At last I thought I had better not offer him any more.

After the tea-things had been taken away, I put the candles out; and the moon, which had risen, nearly full, while we were at tea, shone into the room. I had thought that he might possibly find it easier to tell his story in the moonlight, which, if there were any shame in the recital, would not, by too much revelation, reduce him to the despair of Macbeth, when, feeling that he could contemplate his deed, but not his deed and himself together, he exclaimed,

"To know my deed, 't were best not know myself."

So, sitting by the window in the moonlight, he told his tale. The moon lighted up his pale face as he told it, and gave rather a wild expression to his eyes, eager to find faith in me.—I have not much of the dramatic in me, I know; and I am rather a flat teller of stories on that account. I shall not, therefore, seeing there is no necessity for it, attempt to give the tale in his own words. But, indeed, when I think of it, they did not differ so much from the form of my own, for he had, I presume, lost his provincialisms, and being, as I found afterwards, a reader of the best books that came in his way, had not caught up many cockneyisms instead.

He had filled a place in the employment of Messrs. ——— and Co., large silk mercers, linen drapers, &c., &c., in London; for all the trades are mingled now. His work at first was to accompany one of the carts which delivered the purchases of the day; but, I presume because he showed himself to be a smart lad, they took him at length into the shop to wait behind the counter. This he did not like so much, but, as it was considered a rise in life, made no objection to the change.

He seemed to himself to get on pretty well. He soon learned all the marks on the goods intended to be understood by the shopmen, and within a few months believed that he was found generally useful. He had as yet had no distinct department allotted to him, but was moved from place to place, according as the local pressure of business might demand.

"I confess," he said, "that I was not always satisfied with what was going on about me. I mean I could not help doubting if everything was done on the square, as they say. But nothing came plainly in my way, and so I could honestly say it did not concern me. I took care to be straightforward for my part, and, knowing only the prices marked for the sale of the goods, I had nothing to do with anything else. But one day, while I was showing a lady some handkerchiefs which were marked as mouchoirs de l'aris—I don't know if I pronounce it right, sir—she said she did not believe they were French cambric; and I, knowing nothing about it, said nothing. But, happening to look up while we both stood silent, the lady examining the handkerchiefs, and I doing nothing till she should have made up her mind, I caught sight of the eyes of the shop-walker, as they call the man who shows customers where to go for what they want, and sees that they are attended to. He is a fat man, dressed in black, with a great gold chain, which they say in the shop is only copper gilt. But that doesn't matter, only it would be the liker himself. He was standing staring at me. I could not tell what to make of it; but from that day I often caught him watching me, as if I had been a customer suspected of shop-lifting. Still I only thought he was very disagreeable, and tried to forget him.

"One day—the day before yesterday—two ladies, an old lady and a young one, came into the shop, and wanted to look at some shawls. It was dinner-time, and most of the men were in the house at their dinner. The shop-walker sent me to them, and then, I do believe, though I did not see him, stood behind a pillar to watch me, as he had been in the way of doing more openly. I thought I had seen the ladies before, and though I could not then tell where, I am now almost sure they were Mrs. and Miss Oldcastle, of the Hall. They wanted to buy a cashmere for the young lady. I showed them some. They wanted better. I brought the best we had, inquiring, that I might make no mistake. They asked the price. I told them. They said they were not good enough, and wanted to see some more. I told them they were the best we had. They looked at them again; said they were sorry, but the shawls were not good enough, and left the shop without buying anything. I proceeded to take the shawls upstairs again, and, as I went, passed the shop-walker, whom I had not observed while I was attending to the ladies. 'You're for no good, young man!' he said with a nasty sneer. 'What do you mean by that, Mr. B.?' I asked, for his sneer made me angry. 'You'll know before to-morrow,' he answered, and walked away. That same evening, as we were shutting up shop, I was sent for to the principal's room. The moment I entered, he said, 'You won't suit us, young man, I find. You had better pack up your box to-night, and be off to-morrow. There's your quarter's salary.' 'What have I done?' I asked in astonishment, and yet with a vague suspicion of the matter. 'It's not what you've done, but what you don't do,' he answered. 'Do you think we can afford to keep you here and pay you wages to send people away from the shop without buying? If you do, you're mistaken, that's all. You may go.' 'But what could I do?' I said. 'I suppose that spy B——,'—I believe I said so, sir. 'Now, now, young man, none of your sauce!' said Mr. ——. 'Honest people don't think about spies.' 'I thought it was for honesty you were getting rid of me,' I said. Mr. —— rose to his feet, his lips white, and pointed to the door. 'Take your money and be off. And mind you don't refer to me for a character. After such impudence I couldn't in conscience give you one.' Then, calming down a little when he saw I turned to go, 'You had better take to your hands again, for your head will never keep you. There, be off!' he said, pushing the money towards me, and turning his back to me. I could not touch it. 'Keep the money, Mr. ——,' I said. 'It'll make up for what you've lost by me.' And I left the room at once without waiting for an answer.

"While I was packing my box, one of my chums came in, and I told him all about it. He is rather a good fellow, that, sir; but he laughed, and said, 'What a fool you are, Weir! You'll never make your daily bread, and you needn't think it. If you knew what I know, you'd have known better. And it's very odd it was about shawls, too. I'll tell you. As you're going away, you won't let it out. Mr. ——' (that was the same who had just turned me away) 'was serving some ladies himself, for he wasn't above being in the shop, like his partner. They wanted the best Indian shawl they could get. None of those he showed them were good enough, for the ladies really didn't know one from another. They always go by the price you ask, and Mr. —— knew that well enough. He had sent me up-stairs for the shawls, and as I brought them he said, "These are the best imported, madam." There were three ladies; and one shook her head, and another shook her head, and they all shook their heads. And then Mr. —— was sorry, I believe you, that he had said they were the best. But you won't catch him in a trap! He's too old a fox for that.' I'm telling you, sir, what Johnson told me. 'He looked close down at the shawls, as if he was short-sighted, though he could see as far as any man. "I beg your pardon, ladies," said he, "you're right. I am quite wrong. What a stupid blunder to make! And yet they did deceive me. Here, Johnson, take these shawls away. How could you be so stupid? I will fetch the thing you want myself, ladies." So I went with him. He chose out three or four shawls, of the nicest patterns, from the very same lot, marked in the very same way, folded them differently, and gave them to me to carry down. "Now, ladies, here they are!" he said. "These are quite a different thing, as you will see; and, indeed, they cost half as much again." In five minutes they had bought two of them, and paid just half as much more than he had asked for them the first time. That's Mr. ——! and that's what you should have done if you had wanted to keep your place.'—But I assure you, sir, I could not help being glad to be out of it."

"But there is nothing in all this to be miserable about," I said. "You did your duty."

"It would be all right, sir, if father believed me. I don't want to be idle, I'm sure."

"Does your father think you do?"

"I don't know what he thinks. He won't speak to me. I told my story—as much of it as he would let me, at least—but he wouldn't listen to me. He only said he knew better than that. I couldn't bear it. He always was rather hard upon us. I'm sure if you hadn't been so kind to me, sir, I don't know what I should have done by this time. I haven't another friend in the world."

"Yes, you have. Your Father in heaven is your friend."

"I don't know that, sir. I'm not good enough."

"That's quite true. But you would never have done your duty if He had not been with you."

"Do you think so, sir?" he returned, eagerly.

"Indeed I do. Everything good comes from the Father of lights. Every one that walks in any glimmering of light walks so far in his light. For there is no light—only darkness—comes from below. And man apart from God can generate no light. He's not meant to be separated from God, you see. And only think then what light He can give you if you will turn to Him and ask for it. What He has given you should make you long for more; for what you have is not enough—Ah! far from it."

"I think I understand. But I didn't feel good at all in the matter. I didn't see any other way of doing."

"So much the better. We ought never to feel good. We are but unprofitable servants at best. There is no merit in doing your duty; only you would have been a poor wretched creature not to do as you did. And now, instead of making yourself miserable over the consequences of it, you ought to bear them like a man, with courage and hope, thanking God that He has made you suffer for righteousness' sake, and denied you the success and the praise of cheating. I will go to your father at once, and find out what he is thinking about it. For no doubt Mr. —— has written to him with his version of the story. Perhaps he will be more inclined to believe you when he finds that I believe you."

"Oh, thank you, sir!" cried the lad, and jumped up from his seat to go with me.

"No," I said; "you had better stay where you are. I shall be able to speak more freely if you are not present. Here is a book to amuse yourself with. I do not think I shall be long gone."

But I was longer gone than I thought I should be.

When I reached the carpenter's house, I found, to my surprise, that he was still at work. By the light of a single tallow candle placed beside him on the bench, he was ploughing away at a groove. His pale face, of which the lines were unusually sharp, as I might have expected after what had occurred, was the sole object that reflected the light of the candle to my eyes as I entered the gloomy place. He looked up, but, without even greeting me, dropped his face again and went on with his work.

"What!" I said, cheerily, for I believed that, like Gideon's pitcher, I held dark within me the light that would discomfit his Midianites, which consciousness may well make the pitcher cheery inside, even while the light as yet is all its own—worthless, till it break out upon the world, and cease to illuminate only glazed pitcher-sides—"What," I said, "working so late?"

"Yes, sir."

"It is not usual with you, I know."

"It's all a humbug!" he said fiercely, but coldly notwithstanding, as he stood erect from his work, and turned his white face full on me—of which, however, the eyes drooped—"It's all a humbug; and I don't mean to be humbugged any more."

"Am I a humbug?" I returned, not quite taken by surprise.

"I don't say that. Don't make a personal thing of it, sir. You're taken in, I believe, like the rest of us. Tell me that a God governs the world! What have I done, to be used like this?"

I thought with myself how I could retort for his young son: "What has he done to be used like this?" But that was not my way, though it might work well enough in some hands. Some men are called to be prophets. I could only "stand and wait."

"It would be wrong in me to pretend ignorance," I said, "of what you mean. I know all about it."

"Do you? He has been to you, has he? But you don't know all about it, sir. The impudence of the young rascal!"

He paused for a moment.

"A man like me!" he resumed, becoming eloquent in his indignation, and, as I thought afterwards, entirely justifying what Wordsworth says about the language of the so-called uneducated,—"A man like me, who was as proud of his honour as any aristocrat in the country—prouder than any of them would grant me the right to be!"

"Too proud of it, I think—not too careful of it," I said. But I was thankful he did not heed me, for the speech would only have irritated him. He went on.

"Me to be treated like this! One child a . . . ."

Here came a terrible break in his speech. But he tried again.

"And the other a . . . ."

Instead of finishing the sentence, however, he drove his plough fiercely through the groove, splitting off some inches of the wall of it at the end.

"If any one has treated you so," I said, "it must be the devil, not God."

"But if there were a God, he could have prevented it all."

"Mind what I said to you once before: He hasn't done yet. And there is another enemy in his way as bad as the devil—I mean our selves. When people want to walk their own way without God, God lets them try it. And then the devil gets a hold of them. But God won't let him keep them. As soon as they are 'wearied in the greatness of their way,' they begin to look about for a Saviour. And then they find God ready to pardon, ready to help, not breaking the bruised reed—leading them to his own self manifest—with whom no man can fear any longer, Jesus Christ, the righteous lover of men—their elder brother—what we call big brother, you know—one to help them and take their part against the devil, the world, and the flesh, and all the rest of the wicked powers. So you see God is tender—just like the prodigal son's father—only with this difference, that God has millions of prodigals, and never gets tired of going out to meet them and welcome them back, every one as if he were the only prodigal son He had ever had. There's a father indeed! Have you been such a father to your son?"

"The prodigal didn't come with a pack of lies. He told his father the truth, bad as it was."

"How do you know that your son didn't tell you the truth? All the young men that go from home don't do as the prodigal did. Why should you not believe what he tells you?"

"I'm not one to reckon without my host. Here's my bill."

And so saying, he handed me a letter. I took it and read:

"Sir,—It has become our painful duty to inform you that your son has this day been discharged from the employment of Messrs. —— and Co., his conduct not being such as to justify the confidence hitherto reposed in him. It would have been contrary to the interests of the establishment to continue him longer behind the counter, although we are not prepared to urge anything against him beyond the fact that he has shown himself absolutely indifferent to the interests of his employers. We trust that the chief blame will be found to lie with certain connexions of a kind easy to be formed in large cities, and that the loss of his situation may be punishment sufficient, if not for justice, yet to make him consider his ways and be wise. We enclose his quarter's salary, which the young man rejected with insult, and,

"We remain, &c.,

"—— and Co."

"And," I exclaimed, "this is what you found your judgment of your own son upon! You reject him unheard, and take the word of a stranger! I don't wonder you cannot believe in your Father when you behave so to your son. I don't say your conclusion is false, though I don't believe it. But I do say the grounds you go upon are anything but sufficient."

"You don't mean to tell me that a man of Mr. ——'s standing, who has one of the largest shops in London, and whose brother is Mayor of Addicehead, would slander a poor lad like that!"

"Oh you mammon-worshipper!" I cried. "Because a man has one of the largest shops in London and his brother is Mayor of Addicehead, you take his testimony and refuse your son's! I did not know the boy till this evening; but I call upon you to bring back to your memory all that you have known of him from his childhood, and then ask yourself whether there is not at least as much probability of his having remained honest as of the master of a great London shop being infallible in his conclusions—at which conclusions, whatever they be, I confess no man can wonder, after seeing how readily his father listens to his defamation."

I spoke with warmth. Before I had done, the pale face of the carpenter was red as fire; for he had been acting contrary to all his own theories of human equality, and that in a shameful manner. Still, whether convinced or not, he would not give in. He only drove away at his work, which he was utterly destroying. His mouth was closed so tight, he looked as if he had his jaw locked; and his eyes gleamed over the ruined board with a light which seemed to me to have more of obstinacy in it than contrition.

"Ah, Thomas!" I said, taking up the speech once more, "if God had behaved to us as you have behaved to your boy—be he innocent, be he guilty—there's not a man or woman of all our lost race would have returned to him from the time of Adam till now. I don't wonder that you find it difficult to believe in Him."

And with those words I left the shop, determined to overwhelm the unbeliever with proof, and put him to shame before his own soul, whence, I thought, would come even more good to him than to his son. For there was a great deal of self-satisfaction mixed up with the man's honesty, and the sooner that had a blow the better—it might prove a death-blow in the long run. It was pride that lay at the root of his hardness. He visited the daughter's fault upon the son. His daughter had disgraced him; and he was ready to flash into wrath with his son upon any imputation which recalled to him the torture he had undergone when his daughter's dishonour came first to the light. Her he had never forgiven, and now his pride flung his son out after her upon the first suspicion. His imagination had filled up all the blanks in the wicked insinuations of Mr. ——. He concluded that he had taken money to spend in the worst company, and had so disgraced him beyond forgiveness. His pride paralysed his love. He thought more about himself than about his children. His own shame outweighed in his estimation the sadness of their guilt. It was a less matter that they should be guilty, than that he, their father, should be disgraced.

Thinking over all this, and forgetting how late it was, I found myself half-way up the avenue of the Hall. I wanted to find out whether young Weir's fancy that the ladies he had failed in serving, or rather whom he had really served with honesty, were Mrs. and Miss Oldcastle, was correct. What a point it would be if it was! I should not then be satisfied except I could prevail on Miss Oldcastle to accompany me to Thomas Weir, and shame the faithlessness out of him. So eager was I after certainty, that it was not till I stood before the house that I saw clearly the impropriety of attempting anything further that night. One light only was burning in the whole front, and that was on the first floor.

Glancing up at it, I knew not why, as I turned to go down the hill again, I saw a corner of the blind drawn aside and a face peeping out—whose, I could not tell. This was uncomfortable—for what could be taking me there at such a time? But I walked steadily away, certain I could not escape recognition, and determining to refer to this ill-considered visit when I called the next day. I would not put it off till Monday, I was resolved.

I lingered on the bridge as I went home. Not a light was to be seen in the village, except one over Catherine Weir's shop. There were not many restless souls in my parish—not so many as there ought to be. Yet gladly would I see the troubled in peace—not a moment, though, before their troubles should have brought them where the weary and heavy-laden can alone find rest to their souls—finding the Father's peace in the Son—the Father himself reconciling them to himself.

How still the night was! My soul hung, as it were, suspended in stillness; for the whole sphere of heaven seemed to be about me, the stars above shining as clear below in the mirror of the all but motionless water. It was a pure type of the "rest that remaineth"—rest, the one immovable centre wherein lie all the stores of might, whence issue all forces, all influences of making and moulding. "And, indeed," I said to myself, "after all the noise, uproar, and strife that there is on the earth, after all the tempests, earthquakes, and volcanic outbursts, there is yet more of peace than of tumult in the world. How many nights like this glide away in loveliness, when deep sleep hath fallen upon men, and they know neither how still their own repose, nor how beautiful the sleep of nature! Ah, what must the stillness of the kingdom be! When the heavenly day's work is done, with what a gentle wing will the night come down! But I bethink me, the rest there, as here, will be the presence of God; and if we have Him with us, the battle-field itself will be—if not quiet, yet as full of peace as this night of stars." So I spoke to myself, and went home.

I had little immediate comfort to give my young guest, but I had plenty of hope. I told him he must stay in the house to-morrow; for it would be better to have the reconciliation with his father over before he appeared in public. So the next day neither Weir was at church.

As soon as the afternoon service was over, I went once more to the Hall, and was shown into the drawing room—a great faded room, in which the prevailing colour was a dingy gold, hence called the yellow drawing-room when the house had more than one. It looked down upon the lawn, which, although little expense was now laid out on any of the ornamental adjuncts of the Hall, was still kept very nice. There sat Mrs. Oldcastle reading, with her face to the house. A little way further off, Miss Oldcastle sat, with a book on her knee, but her gaze fixed on the wide-spread landscape before her, of which, however, she seemed to be as inobservant as of her book. I caught glimpses of Judy flitting hither and thither among the trees, never a moment in one place.

Fearful of having an interview with the old lady alone, which was not likely to lead to what I wanted, I stepped from a window which was open, out upon the terrace, and thence down the steps to the lawn below. The servant had just informed Mrs. Oldcastle of my visit when I came near. She drew herself up in her chair, and evidently chose to regard my approach as an intrusion.

"I did not expect a visit from you to-day, Mr. Walton, you will allow me to say?"

"I am doing Sunday work," I answered. "Will you kindly tell me whether you were in London on Thursday last? But stay, allow me to ask Miss Oldcastle to join us."

Without waiting for answer, I went to Miss Oldcastle, and begged her to come and listen to something in which I wanted her help. She rose courteously though without cordiality, and accompanied me to her mother, who sat with perfect rigidity, watching us.

"Again let me ask," I said, "if you were in London on Thursday."

Though I addressed the old lady, the answer came from her daughter.

"Yes, we were."

"Were you in —— & Co.'s, in —— Street?"

But now before Miss Oldcastle could reply, her mother interposed.

"Are we charged with shoplifting, Mr. Walton? Really, one is not accustomed to such cross-questioning—except from a lawyer."

"Have patience with me for a moment," I returned. "I am not going to be mysterious for more than two or three questions. Please tell me whether you were in that shop or not."

"I believe we were," said the mother.

"Yes, certainly," said the daughter.

"Did you buy anything?"

"No. We——" Miss Oldcastle began.

"Not a word more," I exclaimed eagerly. "Come with me at once."

"What do you mean, Mr. Walton?" said the mother, with a sort of cold indignation, while the daughter looked surprised, but said nothing.

"I beg your pardon for my impetuosity; but much is in your power at this moment. The son of one of my parishioners has come home in trouble. His father, Thomas Weir——"

"Ah!" said Mrs. Oldcastle, in a tone considerably at strife with refinement. But I took no notice.

"His father will not believe his story. The lad thinks you were the ladies in serving whom he got into trouble. I am so confident he tells the truth, that I want Miss Oldcastle to be so kind as accompany me to Weir's house——"

"Really, Mr. Walton, I am astonished at your making such a request!" exclaimed Mrs. Oldcastle, with suitable emphasis on every salient syllable, while her white face flushed with anger. "To ask Miss Oldcastle to accompany you to the dwelling of the ringleader of all the canaille of the neighbourhood!"

"It is for the sake of justice," I interposed.

"That is no concern of ours. Let them fight it out between them. I am sure any trouble that comes of it is no more than they all deserve. A low family—men and women of them!"

"I assure you, I think very differently."

"I daresay you do."

"But neither your opinion nor mine has anything to do with the matter."

Here I turned to Miss Oldcastle and went on—

"It is a chance which seldom occurs in one's life, Miss Oldcastle—a chance of setting wrong right by a word; and as a minister of the Gospel of truth and love, I beg you to assist me with your presence to that end."

I would have spoken more strongly, but I knew that her word given to me would be enough without her presence. At the same time, I felt not only that there would be a propriety in her taking a personal interest in the matter, but that it would do her good, and tend to create a favour towards each other in some of my flock between whom at present there seemed to be nothing in common.

But at my last words, Mrs. Oldcastle rose to her feet, no longer red—now whiter than her usual whiteness with passion.

"You dare to persist! You take advantage of your profession to persist in dragging my daughter into a vile dispute between mechanics of the lowest class!—against the positive command of her only parent! Have you no respect for her position in society?—for her sex? Mister Walton, you act in a manner unworthy of your cloth."

I had stood looking in her eyes with as much self-possession as I could muster. And I believe I should have borne it all quietly, but for that last word. If there is one epithet I hate more than another, it is that execrable word cloth—used for the office of a clergyman. I have no time to set forth its offence now. If my reader cannot feel it, I do not care to make him feel it. Only I am sorry to say it overcame my temper.

"Madam," I said, "I owe nothing to my tailor. But I owe God my whole being, and my neighbour all I can do for him. 'He that loveth not his brother is a murderer,' or murderess, as the case may be."

At that word murderess, her face became livid, and she turned away without reply. By this time her daughter was half way to the house. She followed her. And here was I left to go home, with the full knowledge that, partly from trying to gain too much, and partly from losing my temper, I had at best but a mangled and unsatisfactory testimony to carry back to Thomas Weir. Of course I walked away—round the end of the house and down the avenue; and the further I went the more mortified I grew. It was not merely the shame of losing my temper, though that was a shame—and with a woman too, merely because she used a common epithet!—but I saw that it must appear very strange to the carpenter that I was not able to give a more explicit account of some sort, what I had learned not being in the least decisive in the matter. It only amounted to this, that Mrs. and Miss Oldcastle were in the shop on the very day on which Weir was dismissed. It proved that so much of what he had told me was correct—nothing more. And if I tried to better the matter by explaining how I had offended them, would it not deepen the very hatred I had hoped to overcome? In fact, I stood convicted before the tribunal of my own conscience of having lost all the certain good of my attempt, in part at least from the foolish desire to produce a conviction of Weir rather than in Weir, which should be triumphant after a melodramatic fashion, and—must I confess it?—should punish him for not believing in his son when I did; forgetting in my miserable selfishness that not to believe in his son was an unspeakably worse punishment in itself than any conviction or consequent shame brought about by the most overwhelming of stage-effects. I assure my reader, I felt humiliated.

Now I think humiliation is a very different condition of mind from humility. Humiliation no man can desire: it is shame and torture. Humility is the true, right condition of humanity—peaceful, divine. And yet a man may gladly welcome humiliation when it comes, if he finds that with fierce shock and rude revulsion it has turned him right round, with his face away from pride, whither he was travelling, and towards humility, however far away upon the horizon's verge she may sit waiting for him. To me, however, there came a gentle and not therefore less effective dissolution of the bonds both of pride and humiliation; and before Weir and I met, I was nearly as anxious to heal his wounded spirit, as I was to work justice for his son.

I was walking slowly, with burning cheek and downcast eyes, the one of conflict, the other of shame and defeat, away from the great house, which seemed to be staring after me down the avenue with all its window-eyes, when suddenly my deliverance came. At a somewhat sharp turn, where the avenue changed into a winding road, Miss Oldcastle stood waiting for me, the glow of haste upon her cheek, and the firmness of resolution upon her lips. Once more I was startled by her sudden presence, but she did not smile.

"Mr. Walton, what do you want me to do? I would not willingly refuse, if it is, as you say, really my duty to go with you."

"I cannot be positive about that," I answered. "I think I put it too strongly. But it would be a considerable advantage, I think, if you would go with me and let me ask you a few questions in the presence of Thomas Weir. It will have more effect if I am able to tell him that I have only learned as yet that you were in the shop on that day, and refer him to you for the rest."

"I will go."

"A thousand thanks. But how did you manage to—— ?"

Here I stopped, not knowing how to finish the question.

"You are surprised that I came, notwithstanding mamma's objection to my going ?"

"I confess I am. I should not have been surprised at Judy's doing so, now."

She was silent for a moment.

"Do you think obedience to parents is to last for ever ? The honour is, of course. But I am surely old enough to be right in following my conscience at least."

"You mistake me. That is not the difficulty at all. Of course you ought to do what is right against the highest authority on earth, which I take to be just the parental. What I am surprised at is your courage."

"Not because of its degree, only that it is mine !"

And she sighed.—She was quite right, and I did not know what to answer. But she resumed.

"I know I am cowardly. But if I cannot dare, I can bear. Is it not strange ?—With my mother looking at me, I dare not say a word, dare hardly move against her will. And it is not always a good will. I cannot honour my mother as I would. But the moment her eyes are off me, I can do anything, knowing the consequences perfectly, and just as regardless of them ; for, as I tell you, Mr. Walton, I can endure ; and you do not know what that might come to mean with my mother. Once she kept me shut up in my room, and sent me only bread and water, for a whole week to the very hour. Not that I minded that much, but it will let you know a little of my position in my own home. That is why I walked away before her. I saw what was coming."

And Miss Oldcastle drew herself up with more expression of pride than I had yet seen in her, revealing to me that perhaps I had hitherto quite misunderstood the source of her apparent haughtiness. I could not reply for indignation. My silence must have been the cause of what she said next.

"Ah ! you think I have no right to speak so about my own mother ! Well ! well ! But indeed I would not have done so a month ago."

"If I am silent, Miss Oldcastle, it is that my sympathy is too strong for me. There are mothers and mothers. And for a mother not to be a mother is too dreadful."

She made no reply. I resumed.

"It will seem cruel, perhaps ;—certainly in saying it, I lay myself open to the rejoinder that talk is so easy ;—still I shall feel more honest when I have said it : the only thing I feel should be altered in your conduct—forgive me—is that you should dare your mother. Do not think, for it is an unfortunate phrase, that my meaning is a vulgar one. If it were, I should at least know better than to utter it to you. What I mean is, that you ought to be able to be and do the same before your mother's eyes, that you are and do when she is out of sight. I mean that you should look in your mother's eyes, and do what is right."

"I know that—know it well." (She emphasized the words as I do). "But you do not know what a spell she casts upon me ; how impossible it is to do as you say."

"Difficult, I allow. Impossible, not. You will never be free till you do so."

"You are too hard upon me. Besides, though you will scarcely be able to believe it now, I do honour her, and cannot help feeling that by doing as I do, I avoid irreverence, impertinence, rudeness—whichever is the right word for what I mean."

"I understand you perfectly. But the truth is more than propriety of behaviour, even to a parent ; and indeed has in it a deeper reverence, or the germ of it at least, than any adherence to the mere code of respect. If you once did as I want you to do, you would find that in reality you both revered and loved your mother more than you do now."

"You may be right. But I am certain you speak without any real idea of the difficulty."

"That may be. And yet what I say remains just as true."

"How could I meet violence, for instance ?"

"Impossible !"

She returned no reply. We walked in silence for some minutes. At length she said,

"My mother's self-will amounts to madness, I do believe. I have yet to learn where she would stop of herself."

"All self-will is madness," I returned—stupidly enough. For what is the use of making general remarks when you have a terrible concrete before you ? "To want one's own way just and only because it is one's own way is the height of madness."

"Perhaps. But when madness has to be encountered as if it were sense, it makes it no easier to know that it is madness."

"Does your uncle give you no help ?"

"He ! Poor man ! He is as frightened at her as I am. He dares not even go away. He did not know what he was coming to when he came to Oldcastle Hall. Dear uncle ! I owe him a great deal. But for any help of that sort, he is of no more use than a child. I believe mamma looks upon him as half an idiot. He can do anything or everything but help one to live, to be anything. Oh me ! I am so tired !"

And the proud lady, as I had thought her, perhaps not incorrectly, burst out crying.

What was I to do? I did not know in the least. What I said, I do not even now know. But by this time we were at the gate, and as soon as we had passed the guardian monstrosities, we found the open road an effectual antidote to tears. When we came within sight of the old house where Weir lived, Miss Oldcastle became again a little curious as to what I required of her.

"Trust me," I said. "There is nothing mysterious about it. Only I prefer the truth to come out fresh in the ears of the man most concerned."

"I do trust you," she answered. And we knocked at the house-door.

Thomas Weir himself opened the door, with a candle in his hand. He looked very much astonished to see his lady-visitor. He asked us, politely enough, to walk up stairs, and ushered us into the large room I have already described. There sat the old man, as I had first seen him, by the side of the fire. He received us with more than politeness—with courtesy; and I could not help glancing at Miss Oldcastle to see what impression this family of "low, free-thinking republicans" made upon her. It was easy to discover that the impression was of favourable surprise. But I was as much surprised at her behaviour as she was at theirs. Not a haughty tone was to be heard in her voice; not a haughty movement to be seen in her form. She accepted the chair offered her, and sat down, perfectly at home, by the fire-side, only that she turned towards me, waiting for what explanation I might think proper to give.

Before I had time to speak, however, old Mr. Weir broke the silence.

"I've been telling Tom, sir, as I've told him many a time afore, as how he's a deal too hard with his children."

"Father!" interrupted Thomas angrily.

"Have patience a bit, my boy," persisted the old man, turning again towards me.—"Now, sir, he won't even hear young Tom's side of the story; and I say that boy won't tell him no lie if he's the same boy he went away."

"I tell you, father," again began Thomas; but this time I interposed, to prevent useless talk beforehand.

"Thomas," I said, "listen to me. I have heard your son's side of the story. Because of something he said, I went to Miss Oldcastle, and asked her whether she was in his late master's shop last Thursday. That is all I have asked her, and all she has told me is that she was. I know no more than you what she is going to reply to my questions now, but I have no doubt her answers will correspond to your son's story.

I then put my questions to Miss Oldcastle, whose answers amounted to this:—That they had wanted to buy a shawl; that they had seen none good enough; that they had left the shop without buying anything; and that they had been waited upon by a young man, who, while perfectly polite and attentive to their wants, did not seem to have the ways or manners of a London shop-lad.

I then told them the story as young Tom had related it to me, and asked if his sister was not in the house and might not go to fetch him. But she was with her sister Catherine.

"I think, Mr. Walton, if you have done with me, I ought to go home now," said Miss Oldcastle.

"Certainly," I answered. "I will take you home at once. I am greatly obliged to you for coming."

"Indeed, sir," said the old man, rising with difficulty, "we're obliged both to you and the lady more than we can tell. To take such a deal of trouble for us! But you see, sir, you're one of them as thinks a man's got his duty to do one way or another, whether he be clergyman or carpenter. God bless you, miss. You're of the right sort, which you'll excuse an old man, miss, as 'll never see ye again till ye've got the wings as ye ought to have."

Miss Oldcastle smiled very sweetly, and answered nothing, but shook hands with them both, and bade them good-night. Weir could not speak a word; he could hardly even lift his eyes. But a red spot glowed on each of his pale cheeks, making him look very like his daughter Catherine, and I could see Miss Oldcastle wince and grow red too with the gripe he gave her hand. But she smiled again none the less sweetly.

"I will see Miss Oldcastle home, and then go back to my house and bring the boy with me," I said, as we left.

It was some time before either of us spoke. The sun was setting, the sky the earth and the air lovely with rosy light, and the world full of that peculiar calm which belongs to the evening of the day of rest. Surely the world ought to wake better on the morrow.

"Not very dangerous people, those, Miss Oldcastle," I said, at last.

"I thank you very much for taking me to see them," she returned, cordially.

"You won't believe all you may happen to hear against the working people now?"

"I never did."

"There are ill-conditioned, cross-grained, low-minded, selfish, unbelieving people amongst them. God knows it. But there are ladies and gentlemen amongst them too."

"That old man is a gentleman."

"He is. And the only way to teach them all to be such, is to be such to them. The man who does not show himself a gentleman to the working people—why should I call them the poor? some of them are better off than many of the rich, for they can pay their debts, and do it.——"

I had forgot the beginning of my sentence.

"You were saying that the man who does not show himself a gentleman to the poor——"

"Is no gentleman at all. Only a gentle without the man; and if you consult my namesake old Izaak, you will find what that is."

"I will look. I know your way now. You won't tell me anything I can find out for myself."

"Is it not the best way?"

"Yes. Because, for one thing, you find out so much more than you look for."

"Certainly that has been my own experience."

"Are you a descendant of Izaak Walton?"

"No. I believe there are none. But I hope I have so much of his spirit that I can do two things like him."

"Tell me."

"Live in the country though I was not brought up in it, and know a good man when I see him."

"I am very glad you asked me to go to-night."

"If people only knew their own brothers and sisters, the kingdom of heaven would not be far off."

I do not think Miss Oldcastle quite liked this, for she was silent thereafter; though I allow that is not conclusive. And we had now come close to the house.

"I wish I could help you," I said.

"In what?"

"To bear what I fear is waiting you."

"I told you I was equal to that. It is where we are unequal that we want help. You may have to give it me some day—who knows?"

I left her most unwillingly in the porch, just as Sarah (the white wolf) had her hand on the door, rejoicing in my heart, however, over her last words.

My reader will not be surprised, after all this, if, before I get very much farther with my story, I have to confess that I loved Miss Oldcastle.

When young Tom and I entered the room, his grandfather rose and tottered to meet him. His father made one step towards him and then hesitated. Of all conditions of the human mind that of being ashamed of himself must have been the strangest to Thomas Weir. The man had never in his life, I believe, done anything mean or dishonest, and therefore he had had less frequent opportunities than most people of being ashamed of himself. Hence his fall had been from another pinnacle—that of pride. When a man thinks it such a fine thing to have done right, he might almost as well have done wrong, for it shows he considers right something extra, not absolutely essential to human existence, not the life of a man. I call it Thomas Weir's fall; for surely to behave in an unfatherly manner to both daughter and son—the one sinful, and therefore needing the more tenderness—the other innocent, and therefore claiming justification—and to do so from pride, and hurt pride, was fall enough in one history, worse a great deal than many sins that go by harder names; for the world's judgment of wrong does not exactly correspond with the reality. And now if he was humbled in the one instance, there would be room to hope he might become humble in the other. But I had soon to see that, for a time, his pride, driven from its entrenchment against his son, only retreated, with all its forces, into the other against his daughter.

Before a moment had passed, justice overcame so far that he held out his hand and said:

"Come, Tom, let by-gones be by-gones."

But I stepped between.

"Thomas Weir," I said, "I have too great a regard for you,—and you know I dare not flatter you—to let you off this way, or rather leave you to think you have done your duty when you have not done the half of it. You have done your son a wrong, a great wrong. How can you claim to be a gentleman—I say nothing of being a Christian, for therein you make no claim—how, I say, can you claim to act like a gentleman, if, having done a man wrong—his being your own son has nothing to do with the matter one way or other, except that it ought to make you see your duty more easily—having done him wrong, why don't you beg his pardon, I say, like a man?"

He did not move a step. But young Tom stepped hurriedly forward, and catching his father's hand in both of his, cried out:

"My father shan't beg my pardon. I beg yours. father, for everything I ever did to displease you, But I wasn't to blame in this. I wasn't, indeed."

"Tom, I beg your pardon," said the hard man, overcome at last. "And now, sir," he added, turning to me, "will you let by-gones be by-gones between my boy and me?"

There was just a touch of bitterness in his tone.

"With all my heart," I replied. "But I want just a word with you in the shop before I go."

"Certainly," he answered, stiffly; and I bade the old and the young man good night, and followed him down stairs.

"Thomas, my friend," I said, when we got into the shop, laying my hand on his shoulder, "will you after this say that God has dealt hardly with you? There's a son for any man God ever made to give thanks for on his knees! Thomas, you have a strong sense of fair play in your heart, and you give fair play neither to your own son nor yet to God himself. You close your doors and brood over your own miseries, and the wrongs people have done you; whereas, if you would but open those doors, you might come out into the light of God's truth, and see that his heart is as clear as sunlight towards you. You won't believe this, and therefore naturally you can't quite believe that there is a God at all; for, indeed, a being that was not all light would be no God at all. If you would but let Him teach you, you would find your perplexities melt away like the snow in spring, till you could hardly believe you had ever felt them. No arguing will convince you of a God, but let Him once come in, and all argument will be tenfold useless to convince you that there is no God. Give God justice. Try Him as I have said.—Good night."

He did not return my farewell with a single word. But the grasp of his strong rough hand was more earnest and loving even than usual. I could not see his face, for it was almost dark; but, indeed, I felt that it was better I could not see it.

I went home as peaceful in my heart as the night whose curtains God had drawn about the earth that it might sleep till the morrow.

IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.

THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

Matt. v., vi., vii. ; Luke vi. 20—49.

The traveller from Jerusalem gets his first sight of the Sea of Galilee from the top of Mount Tabor. It is but a small corner of the lake, lying miles away, deep sunk among the hills, that he sees. Descending from the height whence this first glimpse of the lake is got, the road to Tiberias leads over an elevated undulating plateau, the one marked feature of which is a curious double-peaked hill, rising about fifty or sixty feet above the general level of the surrounding table-land, and sloping down on its eastern side into the plain of Gennesaret. From the two prominences it presents this hill is called the Horns of Hattin, Hattin being a village at its base. It overlooks the lake and the plain. You see Capernaum from its summit, lying across the valley about seven miles off. As seen again from Capernaum and the plain, it appears as the highest and loneliest elevation that rises upon that side of the lake. It would naturally be spoken of by the inhabitants of Capernaum and its neighbourhood, even as St. Matthew speaks of it, as the mountain. It would naturally be the place to which any one seeking for solitude would retire. When somewhere in its neighbourhood there came around our Lord "a great multitude of people out of all Judea and Jerusalem, and from the sea coast of Tyre and Sidon, and from Galilee and Decapolis, and from Idumea and from beyond Jordan," * and when, seeking relief from the pressure, it is said that He went up into a mountain, no one so likely to be the one referred to by the Evangelist as the Horns of Hattin,—to which, as the supposed place of their utterance, the name of the Mount of the Beatitudes has for ages been given.

The night upon this mountain was spent by Christ in prayer—alone perhaps upon the higher summit, the disciples slumbering below. At dawn he called them to him, and out of them he chose the twelve, and ordained them "that they might be with him, and that he might send them forth to preach." But on what principle was the selection made? in what manner was the ordination effected? It may be presumed that some regard was had to the personal qualifications of those whom the Lord chose for this high office. We know indeed too little of any but two or three of the twelve to trace the special fitness of the human instrument for the work given it to do. Of all but one, however, we may believe that such fitness did exist. But how came that one to be numbered with the rest? It is possible that Judas may have done much to obtrude himself, or that others may have done much to obtrude him upon the notice of the Saviour. We read of one who, with great professions of attachment, volunteered to become a disciple, saying to Jesus, "Master, I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest;" whom Jesus neither rejected nor welcomed, meeting his declaration of adherence with the ominous words, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man hath not where to lay his head." If, as some have thought, the man who came forward in this way and pressed himself into the discipleship were Judas—if he was a man of acknowledged ability and considerable influence, whom no one at the time had the slightest reason to suspect, who was welcomed by all the other disciples, and commended by them to their Master as a most desirable associate—if the rejection of such a man in such circumstances could have seemed to be an act of caprice without known or apparent reason, this might serve perhaps in some slight degree to explain to us how Judas came at first to be numbered with the twelve. Many will feel as if there were something like profanity in any conjecture of this kind, and all will be satisfied in simply accepting the fact that Jesus chose those twelve men, and yet that one of them was a devil.

Was it by simple designation to the office without any form or ceremony? or was it by laying of Christ's hand solemnly on the head of each, then gathering the circle round him and offering up a consecration prayer, that the Apostles were set apart? We cannot tell. It is surely singular, however, that the manner of the ordination of the Apostles by our Lord himself, in like manner as the ordination of the first Presbyters or Bishops of the Church by the Apostles, should have been left unnoticed and undescribed.

The ordination over, Jesus descended to a level spot, either between the two summits or lying at their base.* The day had now advanced, and the great multitude that had followed Him, apprised of his place of retreat, poured in upon Him, bringing their diseased along with them. He stood for a time healing all who were brought to him. Retreating then again to the mountain-side, He sat down. His disciples seated themselves immediately around Him, and the great multitude stood or sat upon the level ground below.

Such were the circumstances under which the Sermon on the Mount was delivered. It may have been the first discourse of the kind which St. Matthew had heard; all the more natural, therefore, that he should have been directed to preserve so full a record of it. We have no authority for saying that it was actually the first formal and lengthened address delivered by our Lord. Many other longer or shorter discourses, to smaller or larger audiences, may Jesus have spoken during this period of his ministry. But this was the one selected by Divine Wisdom to be presented as a specimen or sample of our Lord's teaching as addressed to mixed Galilean audiences in the earlier stages of his ministry. There was a change in his mode of teaching afterwards, even in Galilee, as there was a marked difference between all his discourses there, and those addressed to very different audiences in Jerusalem. Here upon the mount He had a vast concourse of people of all castes and from all quarters before Him. Nearest to Him were his own disciples. To them his words were in the first instance spoken, but they were meant to reach the consciences and hearts of the motley crowd that lay beyond.

Now, if there was one sentiment more widely than another spread throughout this crowd, it was the vague yet ardent expectation, beating then in almost every Jewish breast, of some great national deliverance—of the near approach of a new kingdom—the kingdom of God. Of this kingdom they had no higher conception than that it would be a free and independent outward and visible Jewish monarchy. And when it came, then would come the days of liberty and peace, of honour and triumph, and all kinds of blessedness for poor oppressed Judea. With what a delicate hand—not openly and rudely rebuking, yet laying the axe withal at its very roots—was this deep national prejudice now treated by our Lord. What could have run more directly counter to the earthly ambitious hopes, swelling up within the hearts of those around him? what could have served more effectually to check them, than the very first words which Jesus uttered? "Blessed are the poor in spirit: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets that were before you." How different the kind of blessedness thus described from that which his hearers had been hungering and thirsting after! How different the kind of kingdom thus described from that which they had been expecting He should set up! And, apart from their special use and immediate service as addressed of old to the Galilean audience, these beatitudes remain to teach us wherein the only true, pure, lasting blessedness for man consists; not in anything outward, not in the gratification of any of our natural passions or desires, our covetousness, or our pride, or our ambition, or our love of pleasure; not in what we have, but in what we are in God's sight and in relation to his empire over our souls. The poor in spirit, those most deeply conscious of their spiritual poverty, their want of that which can alone find favour with God; the mourners whose grief is the fruit of guilt and unworthiness realised and deeply felt; the meek, who bow patiently and submissively to every stroke, whoever be the smiter; the hungerers and thirsters after righteousness, the pure in heart, the peace-makers, the persecuted for righteousness' sake,—do we regard these as the happiest of our race? is theirs the kind of happiness upon which our heart is chiefly set, and which we are labouring with our utmost efforts to realise? If not, however ready we may be to extol the pure and high morality of the Sermon on the Mount, we have failed to take in the first and one of the greatest truths which it conveys, as to the source, and seat, and character, and conditions of the only abiding and indestructible blessedness of sinful man.

But while the multitude were cherishing false ideas and expectations about his kingdom, many were cherishing false ideas and fears about Christ himself that equally required to be removed. They had noticed in his teaching the absence of any reference to many of those religious services that they so punctiliously performed, some disregard of them in his own practice and in that of his disciples. This man, they began to say, is an enemy to Moses. He is aiming at nothing short of a subversion of the old, the heaven-given law. Jesus must proclaim how untrue the accusation was. "Think not," He said, "that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." But in what did the true fulfilment of the Mosaic law consist? It was a vast and complicated code, embracing a body of laws for a peculiar people, existing at a particular period, and organised for a special purpose; subject therefore to all the limitations and exhibiting all the adaptations to existing circumstances which, in proportion to the wisdom with which it is framed, all such legislation must display. It had in it commands of a purely ethical and religious character, conveyed in more general and abstract forms; and it had in it a large apparatus of positive enactments and ordinances chiefly meant to symbolise the truths and facts of the Christian dispensation. It was not throughout an expression of God's absolute will, perfect, immutable, meant to be of permanent and universal obligation. Part of it, perfectly adapted to its design, was inherently imperfect; part of it as necessarily transitory. When the time came that the Jewish nation should either cease to exist or cease to have its old functions to discharge, and when all its types and ceremonies had their true meaning expressed and their ends accomplished—then out of this complicated law there would come to be extracted that which was absolutely perfect and universally obligatory. Jesus knew that at his advent that time had come, and assuming the very place and exercising the very prerogative of the Divine Legislator of the Jews, He begins in this Sermon on the Mount to execute this task. He treats the old Jewish practice of divorce as imperfect, being adapted to a single nation at a particular stage of its moral training, and lays down the original and perfect law of the marriage relationship. In like manner He deals with the lex talionis—the rule of an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth, and with the law and custom as to oaths. But it is especially in his treatment of those commandments about whose permanent obligation there was and could be no doubt, that the novelty and value of his teaching displayed itself. These were negative and prohibitory in their form. Thou shalt not kill, thou shalt not commit adultery, &c., &c. They had been looked at in the letter rather than in the spirit. They had been regarded simply as prohibitions of certain outward acts or crimes. Abstinence from the forbidden deeds had been taken as a keeping of the divine commands. Obedience had thus come to be looked upon as a thing of outward constraint or mechanical conformity, its merit lying in the force of the constraint, the exactness of the conformity. It was thus that the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees consisted mainly in a stiff and formal adherence to the letter of the precept, to the neglect often, and sometimes to the contradiction of its spirit. This fatal error Christ exposes, taking up commandment after commandment, unfolding the spirituality and extent of the requirement, showing how it reached not simply or mainly to the regulation of the outward conduct, but primarily and above all things to the state of the heart; that murder lay in embryo in an angry feeling, that adultery lurked in a licentious look, that it was not alone when the name of God was vainly used that irreverence might be exhibited and profane swearing practised, that the old Jewish rule of retaliation was no rule for the regulation of the affections or the guidance of the conduct in a pure and perfect state, that from the heart every sentiment of malice or revenge must be banished, and in the conduct the evil done to us by another remain unresented, unavenged, the enemy to be loved, the persecutor to be prayed for; and all this done that we might be merciful as our Father that is in heaven is merciful, perfect as He is perfect, children of Him who maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good and sendeth his rain on the just and on the unjust.

This end and aim of being like to, of being imitators of God, was one too pure, too high, too holy to suffer corruption and the worm to enter into it by admixture with the selfish and ignoble motive of courting human approval, winning human applause. Too much of the almsgiving and the fasting and the praying that He saw practised around Him was done to be seen of men—prompted by no other motive, was nothing but hypocrisy, utterly offensive to his Father in heaven. Concealed and unostentatious let the givings and the fastings be, short and simple and secret the prayers of those who would be his disciples and true children of his Father, who seeing in secret would in due time openly reward.

Let all be done as unto Him with an undivided allegiance, for no man can serve two masters; and with an unbounded trust, for, having such a Father, why should there be any over-carefulness for earthly things, —those things that He knows we have need of, or any undue concern about a future which is not ours but his? Why so anxious about food and raiment? It is God who sustains the life of the body, you must trust him for that—the greater thing; then why distrust Him for the less? Behold the fowls of the air; consider the lilies of the field; look at the grass that grows beneath your feet. Not theirs, as yours, the capacity for trust and toil and foresight. A worthless fleeting existence theirs as compared with yours; yet see how they are not only cared for but lavishly adorned. "Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you."

Conscious of your own far shortcomings from that perfect confidence you should cherish—that constant service you should be rendering, be not severe in criticising or condemning others. Judge not that ye be not judged. "Why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, and considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite; first cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye."

It may be very difficult to be all, to do all that I am now telling you you ought to be and to do; but is there not an open and effectual way for having every felt spiritual want relieved? "Ask and it shall be given you, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you." "Ye, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him."

Drawing from the exhaustless fountain of grace and strength that in Him is opened to you, fear not to adopt this as the one comprehensive rule of your whole bearing and conduct toward others. "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets."

Before the days of Christ there was a great Jewish teacher, Hillel. An inquirer once came to him asking the strange question: "Can you teach one the whole law during the time that I am able to stand on one foot?" "Yes," said Hillel, "it is contained in this one rule: Whatsoever ye would not wish that your neighbour should do to you, do it not to him." This and other sayings of preceding Rabbis have been quoted with a view of detracting somewhat from the originality of the moral teaching of Christ. Yet even here, when the resemblance between the lessons taught is so marked, one difference may be discerned—a difference that runs through so large a part of the Saviour's precepts as compared with those of all other moral legislators. He translates the negative into the positive. With Him it is not—be not, do not; but, be and do. In few instances are any specific rules of conduct laid down. To plant the right spirit and motive in the heart, out of which all true morality proceeds, is the great object he aims at. Look up to God, he says to us, as indeed your Father—ever living, ever loving, patiently bearing with you, largely providing for you, willing to forgive you. Walk humbly, meekly, trustingly before Him. Commit your way to Him, cast all your care on Him, seek all your supplies from Him, render all your returns to Him. Look upon all your fellow-men as children of the same father, members of the same family. Love each other, and live together as brethren, bearing yourselves towards all around you patiently, forgivingly, generously, hopefully. The gate thus opened is strait, the way is narrow, but it is the only one that leadeth unto life. And finally, remember that it is practice, not profession, that can alone conduct you along the path to the throne in heaven. Hear then, and do, that ye may be like the wise man who built his house upon a rock, "and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house, and it fell not, for it was founded upon a rock."

Such is a rapid, imperfect sketch of the Sermon on the Mount, regarded mainly from a historical point of view, in its bearings upon the audience to which it was originally addressed. The people who first heard it, we are told, were astonished at its doctrine. Well they might. It was so different from what they had been accustomed to. No laboured argument, no profound discussion, no doubtful disputation, no nice distinctions, no scheme of doctrines formally and elaborately propounded, no exact routine of religious services prescribed. It dealt with the simplest, plainest moral and religious truths and duties; and did this in the simplest, plainest manner;—directly, familiarly, colloquially—a freshness about it like that of the morning breeze which played over the mountain-side. The thing, however, that seems to have struck the listeners most, was the calm, unhesitating, authoritative tone in which the whole was uttered. "They were astonished at his doctrine: for he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes." Here is One who comes forth from none of the great schools,—who has sat at the feet of none of the great masters,—who uses no book language,—who appeals to no authority but his own—a young untaught Nazarene; and yet He takes it upon Him to pronounce with the utmost confidence as to who the truly blessed are, and reckons among these those who were to be railed at and persecuted for his sake. Here is One who does not shrink from taking into his hands the law and the prophets, acting not simply as their expositor—the clearer of them from all false traditional interpretations. He is bold enough to say that He came to fulfil them; in one remarkable instance, at least—that of the law which permitted divorce—speaking as the original lawgiver was alone entitled to do, declaring that the time for this permission had now ceased, and that henceforth such divorces as Moses had tolerated were not to be allowed. Here is One who speaks of God as one who fully knew and had a right to declare how his children were to act so as to please Him; whom He would forgive, whom He would reward, upon whom He would bestow his gifts. Here is One who, though seated on that Galilean mountain, with nothing to distinguish Him from the humble fishermen around Him, speaks of a day on which He would be seated on the throne of universal judgment, to whom many would say, "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works?"—to whom He was to say, "I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity."

In consequence of the simplicity, purity, and elevation of the moral precepts which it contains, and still more, perhaps, because of none of the peculiar doctrines as to the person, character, office, and work of Christ as the Mediator being found in it, this Sermon on the Mount has been greedily seized upon and highly extolled by many as the true epitome of Christianity—as Christ's own gospel coming from his own lips. But it is far less difficult for us to discern the reasons why the truths of the incarnation and the propitiatory sacrifice were not at this time and to that audience alluded to or dwelt upon by Jesus, than it is for any who would reduce Him to the level of a mere moral legislator to account for the position which, even when enunciating the simplest moral precepts, He assumed—for the tone of authority in which He speaks. Dimly, indeed, through this Sermon on the Mount does the Jesus of the Cross appear, but the Jesus of the Throne is here, and once that we have learned from other after-teachings of Himself and his Apostles to know, and love, and trust in Him as our great High Priest, who has bought us with his blood, it will be the habit and the delight of every true and faithful follower of his to take up and dwell upon that wonderful discourse, in which, more clearly and fully than in any other words of human speech, the very spirit and essence of a humble child-like faith in God, and the lofty ideal of a perfect, a heavenly morality, is unfolded and enforced. WILLIAM HANNA.

GOD'S DAY.

BY THE REV. J. H. RIGG, D.D., AUTHOR OF "MODERN ANGLICAN THEOLOGY," &c.

THE Rev. W. Arthur, in his "People's Day," one of the closest, keenest, and most polished pieces of argument ever addressed to a statesman, lays down the principle that, as respects the sacred day of rest, "man's rights rest upon God's rights; the repose of the Sunday on the religion of the Sabbath;" or, as he otherwise expresses the same principle, that "the public sense of the Sabbath-day's sacredness is the only protection of the working man." In the same pamphlet he admirably describes the manner in which a devout but happy Christian would have the sacred day employed. He is writing to Lord Stanley, to whom, under the title of "an appeal against his advocacy of a French Sunday," the pamphlet is addressed in the form of a letter. "More adroitly than accurately," he says, "you described that opinion as being that the day must be devoted to subjects 'exclusively theological.' These terms are not ill-chosen, if meant to edge the antipathy of those to whom the service of God is a dry matter; but very ill, if meant to express the view taken of the Sabbath by those to whom this service is a delight. They would never think of saying that the whole of the Sabbath was to be employed in subjects and studies 'exclusively theological.' They would rather say that it was to be religiously kept; meaning by this, that it must be spent in thankful rest; in glad and single-hearted enjoyment of the mercies of Providence; in doing good to the poor, the sick, and the ignorant; in acts of private, family, and public worship; in useful reading, innocent intercourse, and the singing of psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs." There is, indeed, one omission in this summary; the aspect of the blessed day towards family life is only glanced at under the head of family worship, or intimated under the phrase "innocent intercourse." We will, however, let Mr. Arthur himself supply the omission from another page of his "Appeal." "There is another respect in which the Lord's day is the People's day; their day for fostering domestic affection, which, next to religion, promotes national stability. It is with multitudes the only day when a father can spend some hours with his wife and children; when an old man can see his daughter, when a lad stands again by his mother's knee, and a young man sits once more by that fireside, the very sight of which retouches all his good feelings, and shames some which he is beginning to learn in the world."

It is very important, especially in the present period of earnest controversy on the subject of Sabbath observance, that we should do full justice to those who differ, more or less widely, from the views which we ourselves hold on this subject. It is at least something, it may be very much, for a man to hold to the sacredness of the day, even though he should not rest his convictions as to its sanctity on the same grounds as ourselves; to regard its religious observance as a solemn obligation, even although he should not deduce that obligation from the same scriptural premises as we do. We must be careful not to confound such a man with the mere secularist, who has neither conviction nor feeling as to the holiness of the day, with whom it is nothing better or higher than a holiday, and whether it shall or shall not be protected from violation is a mere problem of political economy, at the most a question of national education.

The late Dr. Pye Smith, one of the most illustrious names among modern Nonconformist divines in England, held the sanctity of the Sabbath on grounds which, although closely approximating to those generally maintained in North Britain, did not fully coincide with them. Writing to a staunchly orthodox friend, he thus concludes what he has to say on this point: "These [arguments] furnish me with the very same doctrine as yours, in a manner which seems to me of invincibly demonstrative strength; whereas a direct argument [from the positive law] is capable of being quite refuted."

On this point Dr. Smith's biographer has some observations which I wish to quote, and, indeed, for the sake of which I have quoted the foregoing sentence. It appears that Dr. Smith's own observance of the Sabbath was most strict, most spiritual, most religious. Although a passionate devotee of learning and science, and although, as a Fellow of the Royal Society, he was regularly invited to attend the Saturday soirées given by the President of the Royal Society, yet, for fear of infringing upon the sanctity of the Lord's Day, he scrupulously abstained from attending these brilliant, fascinating, and to him peculiarly congenial, assemblies. Not even once did he attend. Religious self-denial, for the sake of the high proprieties of religion, could hardly go farther. It is scarcely possible to imagine a finer instance of sensitive regard for the holiness and the spiritual improvement of the Sabbath. It may, without any breach of charity, be believed that some of the highest sticklers for all dogmatic orthodoxy on the subject of the Sabbath law would have been less precise and scrupulous.

"On that day," says his biographer, "he felt himself in a purer and more thoroughly congenial element than on other days; as though his renewed nature was less in the world of care and of common duty, and was, therefore, more completely in the possession, or at least in the pursuit, of delights which filled him at times with almost unutterable gratitude. . . . O, that it were possible for all who plead against the obligation of the [letter of the] Mosaic law in this particular, to be 'a law unto themselves' in the spirit and style in which Dr. Smith was! When the life of a duty is found to supersede the necessity of the letter, then the great interests of truth and holiness have a distinction put upon them on earth, akin to that which will be their glory in heaven. But, alas! many persons appear to think themselves very good Christians, in proportion as they succeed in proving that they ought not to be Jews; just as though they would directly reverse the words of Christ, and make Him say—'I came not to fulfil the law, but to destroy.'"*

There are three general forms in which the principle of the religious obligation of the Lord's Day may be held, with two of which we shall deal in this paper. The third, which we regard as the right and full form, will be set forth separately. The first is that the first day of the week is to be celebrated and kept holy as the Lord's Day, and in commemoration of his resurrection, because the Church, which "has authority" in matters of faith and worship, has so decreed and required.† This, however, is a view which leaves the Sabbath entirely defenceless. It ignores the authority of Scripure. It reduces the sanctity of the Sabbath to that of a Church festival; it leaves it really at a lower level than that of Good Friday, or Christmas Day, as observed by the same religionists with whom this merely ecclesiastical view finds favour. It empties the Sabbath ordinance of the blessed law of rest. Moreover, being based only on the authority of Church Councils, it can have no force excepta mong those who render reverence to such Councils. The man who denies priestly power, and rejects patristic corruptions, if he has not meantime been shown some better foundation on which the Sabbath-law may firmly rest, will, together with the superstition which he rejects, cast off all reverence for the sacred day. Its claims will be regarded as the spurious pretensions of a fertile and exacting superstition, and will be thrown overboard with the saints' days and the mummeries of a "creed outworn." What, in fact, is the Lord's Day of Romanist countries? To the devotee, a day of blind and besotted drudgery, ending, however, it may be, with a dance; to loyal Catholics of an average sort, a hurried day which begins in superstitious formalism, which ends in dissipation, and which, in its middle hours, is given to driving a brisker trade than on most other days; to the people at large, a market day and holiday in one, with not even a pretence of religion, as regards multitudes of the men, with no family union, no home-blessings, no thought of God, no glimpse of the rest or holiness of heaven. Such is "the Lord's Day" at Paris, at Brussels, at Munich, in the cities of Italy:—such, alas! is also the Sunday of High-Lutheran Berlin. Such an ecclesiastical Sabbath may be sanctioned and guarded by the authority of the Church; but it may be questioned whether it be worth guarding. It is a Sabbath without rest, a Sabbath without authority in Scripture, a Sabbath without a Sabbath-law. Cut off from the primeval institute; resting on no higher authority than that of an ecclesiastical arrangement; denuded of all the historic grandeur and sanctity which belong to the moral law; able to claim no connection with the Christian Lawgiver's word, "the Sabbath was made for man;" standing in no organic relation to the family or family-life; there is left to it no divinity or grace. There waits upon it no power from on high; neither has it any charm to win and hold the human heart. No Grahame could draw inspiration for his verse from such a Sabbath as this; nor could any such strains of exquisite feeling as those in which even Burns, the gifted but the reckless and misguided, has paid his tribute to the beauty and blessedness of the preparation for the Sabbath, have been suggested to any poet, however richly endowed, in a country where the Sunday is but an ecclesiastical festival.

* "Life of Dr. Pye Smith." By John Medway. Pp. 444-5.

† It is only fair to say that the Council of Trent teaches a far higher view of the day than this. It recognises the Lord's Day as corresponding to the moral element in the Fourth Commandment. It recommends, if it does not enjoin, "cessation from bodily labour and from business," in order to the performance of "the duties of piety and religion,"—"the religious and holy observance of the Sabbath." This, however, is not in accordance with the popular understanding of the day among Romanists; and, in fact, the system and the popular teaching of the Romish communion cannot but nullify all that is sound and good in the letter of the Tridentine decree, ambiguous in some places as this is, and inadequate throughout. Bellarmine's catechism is commonly in use, which substitutes, "Remember the festivals to keep them holy," instead of the Fourth Commandment, thus merging the Lord's Day among the scores of saints' days celebrated by the Romish superstition, which are far too numerous, and in their nature too puerile and heathenish, for any savour of real sanctity or intelligent devotion ("reasonable service") to be connected with them.

The second form in which the principle of the religious obligation of the Lord's Day may be held, is that the Lord's Day is of Divine authority, because of apostolic origin. Probably, indeed, most who hold this view would say that Christ himself must be regarded as having instituted the festival of his own resurrection. But it is regarded as by no means to be identified with the Jewish Sabbath. That is held to have passed away with the Jewish dispensation. A common principle is, indeed, by some admitted to underlie both institutions, the principle, viz., of the consecration of a fixed portion of time, of a regularly recurring seventh day, to the service of God. Many, however, of the class of divines of whom I am now speaking would not admit this, for the decisive reason that they regard the Jewish Sabbath as having been pre-eminently and characteristically, if not exclusively, a day of bodily rest, while they view the Lord's Day as a religious festival, which by no means includes as a part of its essential definition or purpose any idea whatever of bodily rest. General rejoicing, as for the grandest and most comprehensive good, affecting both the body and soul; and especially, as giving the key-note to the whole festival, devout thanksgiving and holy meditation, at appointed times, in regard to God's great gift of his Son to man, the divine and redeeming sacrifice of the Saviour, and all that the Christian religion teaches and requires—would be considered as summing up the duties of the day.

It is plain, however, that, as thus defined, the view at which we are now glancing provides no charter for mankind, as such. It gives no title to a day of rest. It warrants, on the part of the Legislature, no further action, at the most, than what is needed to secure a decent provision of vacancy and facility for worship in church-hours, whether those be regarded, as at present in England, as the hours of morning and afternoon service, or whether, as in some Protestant cities of the Continent, and in accordance with a growing fashion among many classes of our own population, a single forenoon service might be deemed sufficient homage to the duties and sanctity of the day. It may be doubted, indeed, whether, on any other ground than the right of the people to a day of rest, any legislation at all with regard to hours of worship, or cessation from business, could fairly be maintained. Let the Sabbath be reduced to a mere festival, and even although its properly Christian origin and authority, and its Divine character, be admitted, it will not thence follow that the Legislature of a Christian land is bound to preserve some portion of it free from business for the purposes of worship. It would only follow that Government itself was bound, in all its departments, to give its own employés facilities for worship,—for what hours who should say? and that the sittings of the Legislature ought to be suspended during certain hours,—what hours, again, who could determine? As it is not the duty of the Legislature to compel attendance on worship, so it may well be doubted whether, except on the ground of the common rights of man, as divinely sanctioned and as hitherto recognised by a sort of "common law" among Christians, Parliament could have a right to compel vacancy from business even during church-hours. Many divines and many Christians believe Good Friday, as a solemn festival sanctioned by the Church, to be entitled to the most religious observance. They would place the obligation to keep this day on grounds fully equivalent to those on which, according to the view I am now considering, the obligation to keep holy the Lord's Day is placed. With them the ordination of the Church is equivalent to apostolic institution or even the command of Christ. But would any of those who hold such views in regard to the duty of the religious observance of Good Friday seriously contend that the law ought to prohibit all persons from working on that day, or compel all employers to give holiday on that day? Public opinion, the general feeling of the nation, at least in England, does in effect secure the almost universal observance of Good Friday as a complete public holiday. It is also secured, in some cases, by means of private indentures or specific terms of engagement, that clerks, apprentices, servants, and workpeople shall have Good Friday as a vacant day, just as in the case of Christmas-day. But yet the universal feeling seems to be that, as no right of labour or evident claim of humanity demands that the day should be free, no state-legislation can impose upon the population the duty of universally abstaining from labour. So far as we can understand, even if the decided majority of the population of Great Britain regarded Good Friday as High-Churchmen do, the law would not be invoked to compel, by any general enactment, the intermission of labour on that day. What is merely a matter of religious principle and conviction, according to the spirit of modern legislation, is left to work its own way and assert its own power by merely voluntary agency and by moral means.

It seems probable, therefore, that the fence which at present, for the sake of man's own natural rights, his physical and intellectual well being, his family affections, his moral and religious capacities and sensibilities, protects one day in seven from the encroachment of selfish claims, and the tyranny of competition in the labour market, is the only legal protection which, in such a commonwealth as that of Britain, could be available on behalf of the blessed sanctities and delights of Christian worship on the Lord's Day. Deny man's rights in this matter, and God's rights, even as to the hours of worship, will be endangered. Concede to man, as man, the rights which God's beneficent law vindicates for him, and then, but then only, our rights as worshippers of God will be preserved, and the claims of our Saviour as to his own day will be held safe from violation. Thus, as man's rights, as man, repose on God's law, so on the recognition of these human rights by man depends the security of those still higher rights and blessings which appertain to man in his relation to the covenant of grace. The Sabbath can only be maintained as the People's day, if it be indeed and to the full extent left free from human dominion, as the Lord's day. And, again, it can never continue to be held sacred, in any effective manner or measure, as the Lord's Day, unless it be held sacred as the People's day.

I may indeed be told that the right of man to rest must be determined by political science. I answer that, on the grounds of a true political economy, I have no doubt whatever that the necessity might be shown of setting apart for rest one day in seven. But political economy is one of the latest-born and most complicated of all the sciences. It would have been a poor case for man if he had had to wait for political economy to determine his right to rest. Moreover, selfishness would oppose such a determination, as it did the shortening of the hours of labour by the Factory Bill. Political and moral science would no doubt agree in deciding adultery or theft to be a crime; but surely a law on this point antecedent to merely human legislation was needed. Such a law has been furnished to us. And the same Decalogue which prohibits murder, adultery, and covetousness prescribes a seventh-day rest. These laws are happily in advance of legislation. They are the lessons of a primeval, Divine morality. Science afterwards justifies them; but meanwhile thousands of years have passed away. And at what late date science would have come to justify them—if it ever would—without a foregoing Divine law, who can guess: or at how much later a date legislation, ever following slowly in the track of scientific truth, would have embodied them in law? Man has ever needed the law of the seventh-day rest; man, it is very evident from a thousand signs at home, and ten thousand abroad, will still need it long. Take away the Divine law, take away religious conviction, and not long will an imperfectly-apprehended science, a science which is only known at all by the few, avail to secure for the toiler his seventh-day rest.

But, in truth, that only can be a day of worship which is a day of rest. Worship that is not merely formal or ritual implies meditation, implies preparation, implies that the mind and heart be given to it with such a concentration and fulness as to make it the chief business, as the great joy and privilege, of the day. A Romanist may rush from business or from dissipation to his superstitious ritualism, and again from his "vain repetitions" and theatrical worship may hasten to bury himself in business or to plunge into dissipation; because his worship is too commonly a mere performance. So also the Anglican ritualist, after his lip-worship and customary ritual was over, might go, according to the precept of his forefathers, to cricket on the green, or even to masque or morrice-dance, and thus close his day of mock solemnities; but it cannot be thus with the worshipper who feels that the Sabbath is his one great day for entering into the meaning of the Scriptures, for gathering and garnering, week by week, the lessons of the week, for rising to the utmost height possible for him of spiritual worship and pure and heavenly thought and aspiration; it cannot be thus with him who desires to worship God "in spirit and in truth," and in "the beauty of holiness." We cannot set hours of spiritual service of the highest style, in which body, soul, and spirit contribute their full powers and service, in the midst of a close hard framework of business and worldly thought. As little can such service, fully rendered, rendered as it must be the design of God that it should be rendered, be the "morning exercise," by which the appetite is to be edged for the evening dissipation. To realise any approach to the ideal of holy Christian worship, a day must be consecrated into which nothing harshly dissonant shall be permitted to intrude.

Any who desire to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness" must feel that such an end, seriously and religiously contemplated, as the great end of life, which is to be subserved and promoted by the consecration to it of one day in seven, in which the science, the methods, the spiritual motives and laws, proper and needful to its accomplishment, shall be the great object of regard and study, must imply that the heart of the day be given to this one object, that all throughout the day be so arranged and attuned as to harmonise with it, that the bondage of work, the care of business, and the pursuits of mere pleasure, be excluded from such a day. Hence a truly godly man who thoroughly acts on the principle that for him and his the Lord's Day is, by the Lord's own appointment, to be signalised as a high day of worship, will assuredly learn by experience that, in order to this, it must, for him and them, be a sacred day of rest.

And, indeed, as I have already intimated, some of those who hold the Lord's Day to be a purely Christian institution, having no organic or proper connection with the Sabbath of the Decalogue, and to be primarily a day for worship, nevertheless maintain that it is also to be regarded as a day of rest; and teach that the whole day should be religiously consecrated to worship and to rest. They regard rest, as we have just seen, as necessary to due and fitting worship. They also regard rest as necessary to man's physical and general well-being. And although they would scarcely contend that, viewed purely as an apostolic institute and a festival of the primitive Church, the Lord's Day can be regarded as properly a day of physical rest, yet, taking all things into account, and especially paying due respect to what they speak of as the analogy of the Fourth Commandment, they deem themselves fully warranted in contending for the sanctification of the whole Sabbath as a day of worship and rest. A very few of these even go so far as to recognise the observance of a holy seventh day as a part of patriarchal morality, and to maintain that, as such, it found a fitting place in the Decalogue by the side of the other commandments of the two tables. Such were the views of Dr. Pye Smith, to whom I have already referred; and such also, as explained by Prof. Fairbairn in his "Typology," would appear to have been the views of Calvin and of others among the Reformers. Such, also, notwithstanding a fling which he throws in at what he calls "the unspiritual, unevangelical bondage," of our British observance of the Sabbath, is apparently the view of Kurtz, the learned and able German theologian. "We regard," he says, "the Sabbath festival as ante-legal,—in other words, as an institution of Paradise. The institution received its legal character for the first time in connection with the giving of the law at Sinai, and lost it again through the love which, in the New Testament, is the fulfilment of the law; but the institution of the Sabbath continued to exist after the law was fulfilled, as it had already existed, or rather as it ought to have existed before the law was given, and it is destined to continue until it has attained to its fulfilment and completion in the eternal Sabbath of the creature." *

Now, when divines who go so far as this, refuse to recognise the law of the Lord's Day in the law of the Sabbath, refuse to base the claims of the Christian Sabbath upon the fourth commandment of the Decalogue, we scarcely understand them. The Decalogue was the embodiment for the immediate benefit of the Jews of a principle of primeval and patriarchal morality. It is admitted that the institution of the Lord's Day for the Christian embodies the same principle. It is admitted that physical rest and the worship of God were required by the Jewish law; and that the same are required by the Christian law; in each case also one seventh day is what is demanded. Where is the difficulty about identifying the Sabbath and the Lord's Day? It may be said that the principal thing enjoined upon the Jew was physical rest, worship being subordinate; whereas, for the Christian the principal thing is worship, rest being subordinate. Our answer is that, in the Jewish law, rest was but a means to an end, that end the refreshment of the whole man, and of course, most of all, the highest refreshment, which is that of "the inner man." Rest was the basis; but in the rest God was to be remembered and honoured, and out of the rest worship was to arise; and under the Christian law of the Sabbath, as we have seen, rest is needful in order to worship. The Jewish Sabbath was, in fact, a Sabbath for children; children need more rest and can sustain less worship. But even the Jewish Sabbath developed into a highly spiritual ordinance; as witness Isaiah lviii.; it became more spiritual as the ages passed on, and as revelation grew; it included more and more of worship. What the Sabbath of Isaiah was to the Sabbath of the wilderness; the Sabbath of "the Prophets" to the Sabbath of "the law," i. e., the Pentateuch; such is the Sabbath of Christianity to the best Sabbath of Judaism. Let the Sabbath-law be expounded by the light of our Saviour's teachings and actions, and pre-eminently of that divine maxim, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath;" let the true spirit and principle of the Commandment be attained to and put into practice, and the Sabbath and the Lord's Day will be found to coincide. In this Christian age there are still a vastly predominant proportion of those who must be more or less dealt with as children; their Sabbath cannot be all worship, but they need the charter of rest. Only, as the ages advance, the physical element will become more and more subordinate to the spiritual, and the character of the day will be more and more sublimed.

Except, then, the mere circumstance of the change of the day from the seventh to the first, we can find no difference remaining on which such devout Christian observers and upholders of the Lord's-day-rest as we have now been speaking of, can insist upon separating themselves from those who, with Christian intelligence and in the spirit of evangelical freedom and obedience combined, profess themselves to be upholders of the Lord's-day-rest as the veritable Sabbath of the Christian dispensation, to which the solemn sanctions of the fourth commandment in the holy Decalogue appertain. In respect to all but that single circumstance they and we are well agreed. How that circumstance could not but of necessity supervene; how the glory of the Sabbath could not but pass from the seventh to the first day; how there could not but at first be a season of transition during which the spirit of the Sabbath-law was strugglinga mid many embarrassments and against many barriers, to conquer for itself, as the bright Lord's Day, all the observance proper to the Sabbath-law, with more of gladness and of grace than had been known under the Jewish dispensation ; how the transmigration was at length completely effected, and the Lord's Day recognised as the lineal heir of all the high claims and honour and immunities which had belonged to the Sabbath, with added irradiation of the Christian glory; all this belongs to a later stage in this discussion.

THE WALDENSES.

Jerusalem alone excepted, no city can boast an interest so world-wide and varied as Rome. No visitor to that renowned city can view with indifference the Scipios' tomb, the forum where Cicero thundered, or the spot where Cæsar fell ; but if the stranger be a Christian, Rome will have to him other than classic memories ; and he will seek out with a yet deeper interest the spots associated with two men who have done more for the world than either Cicero or Cæsar, —Paul the Apostle and Luther the Reformer.

Writing to Timothy of Onesiphorus, Paul says, "When he was in Rome, he sought me out very diligently, and found me." But though we should seek ever so diligently, we cannot expect, after 1800 years, to find the "hired house" where St. Paul dwelt for "two whole years, and received all that came in unto him" ;—yet it may interest some readers to mention that, while residing in Rome last spring, the writer saw a house whose threshold it is at least possible Paul may frequently have crossed. Of the three hundred and sixty-five churches in Rome, one of the oldest and quaintest is that of St Pudentiana (of which, by the way, Cardinal Wiseman was the titular incumbent). The foundation of this church, if we remember aright, dates as early as that of Westminster Abbey—the eighth or ninth century—and the tradition has always been that it was built on or over the house of Pudens, one of Paul's Roman brethren, (2 Tim. iv. 21.) It was only, however, within a very recent period that excavations made beneath the church itself have revealed the curious fact that here, many feet below the level of the modern city, there does exist an ancient Roman dwelling of several chambers, which when first discovered were filled by the rubbish of centuries. This house we visited with no common interest : and as we descended by torchlight into its long-silent chambers, it was strange to think that these vaulted roofs, whose plaster still retains rude and faded frescoes, may have looked down on this early Christian and his family, and perchance resounded to the voice of Paul.

The so-called house of Pudens may after all have no better foundation than tradition. But the Appian Way needs no tradition to attest its identity : and as one treads that gigantic causeway, and with the eye follows its southward course straight as an arrow for miles across the breezy Campagna, through the vista of eighteen centuries we seem to see a group approaching. It is Paul and his fellow-prisoners in charge of Julius, the good-hearted centurion ; and with them that band of loving Roman Christians who had gone thirty long miles to escort the great Apostle from Appii Forum to Rome, (Acts xxviii. 15.)

Paul had appealed to Cæsar. Let us follow him to Nero's judgment hall. But can we identify the very spot? We believe we can. The colossal ruins on the Palatine Hill, known as "the Palace of the Cæsars," speak for themselves ; but until Napoleon III., some years since, purchased them from the Pope and commenced excavations which are still advancing, it was impossible to distinguish the chamber we are in search of amid the rubbish that encumbered the whole mass of building. The visitor can now happily identify the Tribunal of the Palace, the very apartment, in all probability, where Paul faced the emperor. Its walls and roof are gone. It lies open to the brilliant sunshine—exposed, as the unjust deeds once enacted there shall one day also be. But a semicircular bench of marble running round the upper end of the spacious hall, and a raised space in the centre for the imperial chair, reveal the intention of the chamber ; as does also the marble ledge which, traversing the breadth of the floor, supported a balustrade to separate the prisoner at the bar from his judges beyond. Of this balustrade, or railing, happily a portion four or five feet in length and about three feet high still remains in situ and entire—its pure white marble of admirably carved openwork well-nigh as fresh as if chiselled by living hands. Standing to-day against this marble barrier—standing, as it were, in the very footprints of Paul, one reads with an altogether new interest those memorable words, "At my first answer no man stood with me, but all men forsook me : I pray God that it may not be laid to their charge. Nevertheless, the Lord stood with me, and strengthened me ; . . . and I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion." "The second epistle unto Timotheus . . . was written from Rome, when Paul was brought before Nero the second time."

Nearly fifteen centuries have come and gone when a friar from Wittemberg is seen approaching the seven-hilled city ; and as in the distance he catches the first glimpse of the capital of Catholicism, he throws himself on the ground, exclaiming, "Holy Rome, I salute thee!" He is not long, however, within its walls ere he discovers his mistake. The Church which, in 1510, Luther found in Rome was very different from that to which Paul wrote an epistle, and whose members he instructed with his living voice. That visit to Rome had mighty consequences for Luther and for the world. "I would not take," said he, "a hundred thousand florins not to have seen Rome." And why? Because the sight opened his eyes to the hypocrisy and vileness which hid themselves under the purple and the scarlet within Rome's most sacred shrines. Luther learned in Rome itself how revolting was the contrast between the Paul and the Peter of his New Testament and their pretended successors. But the truth dawned on him by degrees. For a time he officiated in the churches of Rome, and we were specially interested by visiting one in particular, close by the Porta del Popolo, whose interior is crowded with ancient monuments, and where Luther often said mass, and sometimes preached. Nor could we leave Rome without seeing the "Santa Scala" for Luther's sake, if not for its own. This "Santa Scala," or Holy Stair, is believed by Papists to have been brought from Jerusalem, and to be the veritable staircase which led to Pilate's Judgment Hall, and therefore consecrated by the Saviour's footsteps. A sad spectacle it presented as we saw it one day last Easter. Some dozen of men and women (two French soldiers among the rest) were painfully ascending it on their knees, telling their beads at every step. In the very same act of blind devotion we remembered that Martin Luther was engaged 360 years ago; when there thrilled through his disquieted spirit a voice from heaven which seemed to call in trumpet tones, "The just shall live by faith." In that moment the "Holy Stair" lost all its virtue. He rose from his knees a believing man. The truth had made him free.

But what, it may be asked, connects Rome, Paul, or Luther with the Waldenses? Not a little, as we shall see. Papists in all ages have endeavoured to parry assaults on their faith and practice, by taking refuge in the alleged antiquity and universal sway of their church. They allege that our doctrines and worship are, so to speak, of yesterday. To this we reply; with all the Reformers, that the Church of the Reformation was no new church—that, on the contrary, the truths which in the sixteenth century broke the power of Rome in Switzerland, in France, in Germany and in Britain, were the same old truths which conquered the Paganism of Greece and Rome in primitive times. We utterly deny the claim of that church which has its seat in Rome to be the true representative of the Roman Christianity of Paul's day; and we affirm that the faith which Calvin and Luther proclaimed is the very faith in which the confessors of the Roman Catacombs lived and died—the very faith which early martyrs sealed in the Colliseum with their blood.

It is at this point, and to bear testimony to this very thing, that we wish to call a special witness into court. Who is this witness? She comes forth from her lone mountain home in Northern Italy. She is old, very old, but her eye is not dim, neither is her natural strength abated. She is poor, but she has ever borne an unsullied fame, and has come chastened out of many a sore tribulation. Our witness is the ancient suffering Church of the Waldenses. Possessing for long centuries her own standards, worship, and discipline, this Church maintains that she has never been subject to the yoke of Rome. Her very enemies cannot deny that she was alive not only at the era of the Reformation, but for many centuries previous to that great event. She herself maintains that she was alive long ere Rome acquired ecclesiastical supremacy in Europe—that her evidence, in fact, goes back to the times of the primitive Church. If, then, the Romanist ask contemptuously, Where was your church before Luther?—we reply, Its doctrines were in the Word of God, and its worship was preserved among the Waldenses.

It was in early May of last year that the writer had the happiness to spend nearly a fortnight among this interesting people, and to visit most of those historic spots in their territory which truly entitle it to be called "consecrated ground." And should any of my readers contemplate a visit to Italy, I may be permitted to suggest from my own experience how grateful a visit to the Waldensian valleys will be found after a sojourn in Naples and Rome. All who know anything of the inner life of Naples will mourn how truly of that city and its delicious environs we may say with the poet,

> "Here every prospect pleases,
> And only man is vile."

No doubt the Waldensians have the faults of other men; but among these simple mountaineers the traveller will be sure to find the utmost courtesy of manner allied to a high tone of moral purity. It is exceedingly refreshing, too, being wearied with the mummery and mere scenic display of what is called "Holy Week" in Rome, to get away to the quiet solitudes of these wooded mountains, and to join, when the Lord's Day comes, in the simple worship of these Christian peasants—a worship which, to one from Scotland especially, brings home-scenes vividly to mind. Or should one of my readers, whose tendencies are amiable and æsthetic, find an Easter week in Rome to have had quite the opposite effect from that which we have supposed: should he find (as some have done) his traditional horror of Popery melting away under the beaming smile of Pio Nono, as, borne shoulder high along the resounding nave of St. Peter's, he waves his paternal blessing on kneeling faithful and unbending heretic alike;—and, what with the music and the magnificence, should he begin to doubt whether the Church of Rome be so evil after all,—then a visit to the Waldenses will prove an admirable tonic and corrective to his moral system. Let our supposed friend acquaint himself with this people's history—let him, in sight of the very scenes themselves, learn what they have endured for righteousness' sake—let him, in the pages of Leger, read of the fiendish rage and bloody cruelties inflicted by Rome and her emissaries on an unoffending people, and he will know what an intolerant and intolerable system Popery is. Try to circulate the Italian Bible in Rome at this present hour, and you are imprisoned or expelled for your pains. But here, in the Waldensian valleys of Piedmont, every house has its open Bible in the people's own tongue; and as you worship God in their humble temples, and hear how faithfully the one Mediator is proclaimed, the stage-oratory of the preacher at the Gesu in Rome will seem a poor substitute for this bread of life; and the wild cadence of these poor mountaineers, as they raise their simple hymns, will touch a deeper chord in your heart than the best sung Miserere at the Vatican.

When one has himself become interested in a subject and studied it a little, he wonders to find so little information about it among persons otherwise well informed, forgetting that not long ago the case was his own; and perhaps I shall do no injustice to some of my readers if I take it for granted that their ideas about the Waldenses are somewhat vague and obscure. Waldenses and Albigenses, Vaudois and the Canton de Vaud—these perfectly distinct subjects are in some minds confused together. The locality of the Albigenses was in France, on the other side of the Alps, and as a distinct religious community they exist no more. The Waldenses again, though in the French language invariably styled Vaudois, have nothing to do with the Canton de Vaud, which I need hardly say belongs to Switzerland. The Waldenses or Vaudois are Italian Protestants, subjects of Victor Emmanuel while King of Sardinia, and now when King of Italy. The valleys where they dwell are in the north of Italy, and lie at the foot of the eastern chain of the Alps, known specifically as the Cottian Alps, which here separate Italy from France. The resemblance of Italy, as represented on a map, to a boot has been often remarked; and it may help to define the precise locality of the Waldensian valleys in the reader's mind to say that they occupy a little corner of the boot just where it would touch the knee.

This territory is small. Somewhat triangular in shape, about twenty miles in length, by some eighteen at the broadest parts, it is almost entirely mountainous in character, and encloses three principal valleys—by name Lucernæ, San Martino, and Perosa—with several smaller and wilder glens going off from these; the streams which descend these valleys forming some of the many ramifications which ultimately gather themselves into the great river of Italy, the Po. The present population is about 23,000 souls. Both Protestants and Romanists are found through the whole district; but taking an average of the entire territory the Protestants outnumber the Romanists in the proportion of seven to one.

Had these valleys no other charm than that of mere natural beauty, they would be well worthy our turning aside from the beaten track of tourists. We had been told they were very picturesque, but "the half had not been told" us. True, they do not admit of comparison with the grand passes of the high Alps in Switzerland, but they have attractions which in Swiss scenery we wholly miss. We have never seen in Switzerland umbrageous foliage to compare with that which clothes the mountain slopes of Piedmont, and while the eye is distressed in many of the finest Swiss valleys by the opaque and dirty white of their glacier water, here, the gushing mountain streams are transparent as crystal itself. But I shall have occasion again to speak of the natural features of this district in connection with localities memorable in the stirring annals of the Vaudois; and therefore, attractive as the subject is, I pass it for the present, to ask my reader's attention to two special claims which the Church of these valleys has on our interest and sympathy.

I. Her past history.

II. Her present position.

I. The past history of the Waldensian Church presents two outstanding features, on both of which I wish to touch, though my space prevents me doing justice to either. And here I may say that such of my readers as desire fuller information on the whole subject would do well to read some of the following books (and I mention but a few of those which are accessible): in English, Sir S. Morland's "History of the Churches of Piemont;" Dr. Henderson's "Vaudois;" Dr. Gilly's "Waldensian Researches," his article in Encycl. Britt., and Miss Williams' "History of the Waldensian Church":—in French, the works of Peyran, Leger, Muston, or Monastier.

The past history of the Waldensian Church embraces two points—her antiquity and her sufferings.

(1.) The antiquity of the Waldensian Church.

> "Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones
> Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold;
> E'en them who kept thy truth so pure of old
> When all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones."

So wrote John Milton two hundred years ago. The two latter lines discover to us that in his day the faith of the Waldenses was known to be ancient as well as pure. We cannot enter here into the much-controverted question of the precise origin and antiquity of the Waldensian Church, but we unhesitatingly claim for it the high distinction of being the oldest Evangelical Church that exists in Europe; and for the twofold proof of this claim we point to the pages of ancient history, and to the evidence furnished by the Waldensian manuscripts. Among the latter, an ancient version of the New Testament, in the dialect of the Waldenses (three MSS. copies of which exist, of dates between the 12th and 14th centuries) proves that in these remote valleys a vernacular version of the Word of God was circulating some centuries before it had been translated into our own tongue, or into that of any other people—a most striking fact! And when we point to what we are pleased to call the venerable standards of our different Churches here at home, we should remember that they are documents of yesterday when placed alongside of the yellow parchments, some in the library of Geneva, others in that of Cambridge, which are veritable manuscripts in the Waldensian dialect. Collected in the Valleys in the times of persecution, they had been handed down among these people since the distant time whose date they bear—a period of more than 700 years. I do wish that space permitted me to make some extracts from that most curious poem, the "Nobla Leyzon," which with the Confession of Faith, the Catechism, and the tracts called "Antichrist" and "Purgatory" set forth the truth and exposed the corruptions of Rome. The fact that such writings were at so distant an era as the 12th century composed by men living in these remote solitudes, plainly indicates that long before even that date a people existed there who were separate from the Roman Church and familiar in their own tongue with the Word of God. A conclusion this which is amply borne out by the statements of ancient historians—themselves Papists, and therefore not likely to give partial testimony in a matter like this.

Some of my readers doubtless have heard the origin of the Waldensian Church assigned to Peter Waldo, the merchant Reformer of Lyons in the twelfth century; leaving us to infer that, prior to that date, the people of the Valleys were sitting under the shadow of Popish darkness. The fact that Waldo's name bears a similarity to the designation Waldenses is probably the source of this, as we believe, untenable statement. Waldo was a French, not an Italian "Reformer before the Reformation," whose followers in his own day were invariably called "the poor men of Lyons," and never "Waldenses." Moreover, it does seem unaccountable that the Waldenses themselves never spoke of Waldo as their founder—(had he been so, they had no more reason to be ashamed of him than we of Knox in Scotland). On the contrary, they have at every period of their history asserted that the truth had been retained among them since its first proclamation in Northern Italy after the Apostolic age.

Let us now glance (and we can do no more) at what ancient history itself says in regard to this assertion. The following testimony on the point is most important:—"With the dawn of history," writes Sir James Mackintosh, "we discover some simple Christians in the valleys of the Alps, where they still exist under the ancient name of Vaudois, who, by the light of the New Testament, saw the extraordinary contrast between the purity of primitive times, and the vices of the gorgeous and imperial hierarchy which surrounded them."

It were vain to expect that we should be able to define accurately each several link of the chain which connects the existing Waldensian Church with the Apostolic age; but just as in a dark night at sea you can trace the direction of your landing-place by the lights planted at intervals along the winding shore, so do the scattered hints which come to light here and there of the existence during the dark ages of a "peculiar people" in the Cottian Alps, indicate a line which, if followed out, leads us to the conviction that the faith of the Waldenses has come down to them from primitive times. Their documents, as we have seen, go back to A.D. 1100. Then in the 9th century we find that remarkable man, Claude, Bishop of Turin, who may truly be styled a Reformer within the Church herself, accused in 840 by Jonas of Orleans, not only of personal heterodoxy, but of encouraging persons "in the neighbourhood of his diocese" in their rejection of image worship, and separation from what Jonas styles "Catholic unity." Ascending the stream of time to the 4th century, we find Jerome recording that Vigilantius, the opponent of ecclesiastical corruption in that early age, had taken refuge among the Cottian Alps (the very locality where the Waldenses still exist), because there he found a people holding sentiments similar to his own. This carries us up to the year 396; —and we know that towards the end of the 2nd century the Gospel had penetrated from Italy into Gaul, across the Alpine barrier that divides the two countries. Who can doubt that these early missionaries, carrying with them the seed of the kingdom, scattered some of it as they passed on their way across the Alps?—where, falling among those secluded valleys, it grew; and, sheltered by the encircling mountains, was preserved through long centuries in native vigour, unblighted by the blasts of error which swept across the plains of central Italy.

He must be strangely blind who does not perceive a special Providence in the history of this ancient Church and people: a Providence, whose wondrous ways we hope yet more clearly to unfold, when we come to tell how amidst persecutions almost unequalled, this bush of the wilderness burned, yet was not consumed—and how, also, through the liberation of Italy in our day, slips from this venerable tree are now being planted over the length and breadth of that most interesting land. SEEDS.

THE seeds of all the noblest plants
Take longest time to grow:
The acorns lie for many weeks
Before their first leaves show.

And children who have sown them come
And look about their bed,
And say, because they lie so long,
"Our acorns must be dead."

But when they sow their mustard-seed,
They need not wait for long:
In but a week, like rank young weed,
It grows up green and strong.

Dear faithless heart, among the seeds
A lesson thou canst find,
For growth's great laws are just the same
In them as in the mind.

Thine acorns, sown so long ago,
And watched so long with tears,
Still to fair spreading oaks shall grow,
In spite of all thy fears.

Still wait in faith, for nought is dead
Of all that thou hast sown:
Be not a child who roots up seeds
To see that they have grown.

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

V.—CHRISTIAN DECISION.

Invading armies always endeavour to leave their ships riding in a safe and sheltered anchorage. In the event of their enterprise proving unsuccessful, they thus secure the means of retreat; and to provide for such an emergency is regarded as a good stroke of generalship. Wellington fought Waterloo with the Forest of Soigné at his back; and the fleet which carried our soldiers to fight the Russians before Sebastopol waited the issue in the Bay of Balaclava.

The brave old Romans, whom Cæsar led, invaded our country after a different fashion. The first thing they did on disembarking, was to burn their ships; doing so in sight of thousands who were bravely mustering on the heights of England, to defend their homes, their wives and little ones, their freedom and native land. Not leaving the enemy to cut off their retreat, they cut it off themselves. Their own hands put the torch to the fleet which had brought them to Britain, and, in the event of failure, would have carried them back to Italy. With the glare of that brave conflagration on their eagles, banners, and serried ranks, we cannot wonder that, with such sons to fight her battles, Rome rose from a petty town to be mistress of the world. Both her destiny and their determination were to be plainly seen in the blaze of their burning ships. Bringing to the enterprise such an indomitable spirit and such decision of character, unless the stars of heaven fought against them as against Sisera, how could they fail to conquer?

Such is the resoluteness of mind and purpose the Christian's work requires; nor without some good measure of that, as well as of the grace and spirit of God, can it be brought to a successful issue. On engaging in our Father's business—entering on the trials and triumphs of the Christian life, we also are, so to speak, to burn our ships, nor so much as think of retreat. Abandoning for ever any idea of returning to sin, we are to leave no way open but that which, though beset with trials and swarming with foes, leads straight on to heaven—God's language to us being that He held by the Red Sea when he said to Moses, "Why criest thou unto me? Speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward!"

Decision of character and promptitude of action, qualities so important on board ship in a storm, in the manœuvring of troops in battle, are indispensable to the Christian life—both to our getting through the "strait gate," and our getting on in the "narrow way." How often, for example, does it happen that to hesitate even for one moment between resisting and yielding to temptation is to fall? The battle is lost in that moment of vacillation. In such cases, our safety lies in coming to an immediate decision; in promptly resolving to dally with the tempter not an instant, to flee if we can, and if we cannot flee to fight—so resisting the devil that if we cannot flee from him, he shall flee from us, and leave us, as when he spread out his wings and, vanquished at all points, relieved our Lord of his hateful presence, in possession of the field. That we may be conquerors, and more than conquerors, through him that loved us, our Lord calls for the highest decision of character, warning us against even a recreant thought. No man, he says, having put his hand to the plough, and looking back, is fit for the kingdom of God; and his apostles use expressions that almost warrant us to say that he opposes our return to the world and sin in a way to recall another grand and very remarkable incident in the history of ancient Rome.

Disheartened by the extraordinary dangers and difficulties of their enterprise, one of her armies lost courage, and resolved on a retreat. The general reasoned with his soldiers. Expostulating with them, he appealed to their love of country, to their honour, and to their oaths. By all that could revive a fainting heart he sought to animate their courage and shake their resolution. Much they trusted, they admired, they loved him, but his appeals were all in vain. They were not to be moved; and carried away, as by a panic, they faced round to retreat. At that juncture they were forcing a mountain pass; and had just cleared a gorge where the road, between stupendous rocks on one side and a foaming river on the other, was but a footpath,—broad enough for the step of a single man. As a last resort, he laid himself down there, saying, "If you will retreat, it is over this body you go, trampling me to death beneath your feet." No foot advanced. The flight was arrested. His soldiers could face the foe; but not mangle beneath their feet one who loved them, and had often led their ranks to victory—sharing like a common soldier all the hardships of the campaign, and ever foremost in the fight. The sight was one to inspire them with decision. Hesitating no longer to advance, they wheeled round to resume their march; deeming it better to meet sufferings and endure even death itself than trample under foot their devoted and patriot leader. Their hearts recoiled from such an outrage. But for such as have named the name of Christ not to depart from iniquity, for such as have enlisted under his banner to go back to the world, for such as have renounced sin to return to its pleasures, involves a greater crime. A more touching spectacle bars our return. Jesus, as it were, lays himself down on our path: nor can any become backsliders, and return to the practice and pleasures of sin without treading him under their feet. These, Paul's very words, call up a spectacle from which every lover of Jesus should recoil with horror: "If he," says that apostle, "who despised Moses' law died without mercy, of how much sorer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy who hath trodden under foot the Son of God?"

Decision of character in maintaining our Christian profession, adhering to its principles, and performing its duties, is of such value in our Lord's eyes, that He regards those as his enemies who vacillate between good and evil—hesitating which to choose; him or the world. "He," says Jesus, "who is not with me is against me;" and elsewhere, preferring open enemies to doubtful friends, he speaks to the same effect—"I would that thou wert either cold or hot; so then, because thou art lukewarm, and neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth."

It is not difficult to sympathise with our Lord in this matter. Seeing how a good cause may suffer worse things than opposition, and have to encounter greater dangers than any that come from declared and open enemies, we understand his feelings. If God temper the storm and restrain the remainder of wrath, there are worse things than persecution and opposition. When shepherds, to improve the pastures of the hills and cover them with sweet young grass, set the heather on fire, they choose for that purpose not a calm, but a breezy day. Fanned by the wind, and catching fresh fuel as it advances, the flame which under a serene sky might have smouldered and died out, is blown into a blaze; and borne on from height to height in rolling fiery billows, ere long it wraps the mountains in clouds of smoke and broad sheets of flame. Not less favourable to the progress and final triumph of God's cause has been the opposition it had to sustain.

For example, look at the reformation of religion in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. It was kindled into vehemence by the opposition that was made to it; and, advancing against Popery and its institutions with the rapidity and ravages of burning flames, it speedily spread over almost the whole continent of Europe. To correct some errors of the Popish system, to lop off one excrescence here and another there, was the utmost which Luther at the outset contemplated. Permitted to do that, the German monk would probably have resumed his cowl, and returned to his monastery, to waste his life amid its quiet cloisters, and at length expire, in what his Church called "the odour of sanctity." It was not so. We have to bless God that it was not so; and that Rome was left in judicial blindness to resist all reform. The monk must be crushed! Resolved on this, she launched her thunders at his head, and sought to quench the truth he spake in the blood of its dauntless advocate. This roused all the man in the monk. The opposition Luther met with drove him onward from one bold step to another. The more closely he examined Popery, the more rotten the whole system seemed; the discovery of its errors kept pace with the discussion; and, like a man borne on the bosom of a rapid and powerful stream, it was not long till Luther found himself far in advance of the point from which he started,—far a-head of the petty ends on which he was originally bent. The man who sought at first but to lop off some rotten branches, is ere long, to the astonishment of a world whom his blows have wakened from centuries of slumber, seen boldly standing before the tree itself—burying his axe deep in its sides, and making all Europe ring with the stout blows he delivered on its roots.

So, though intended for evil, the Lord has often turned opposition into good. Indeed, in observing how little Christ's cause has sometimes suffered from its avowed enemies, and how often the very means they employed to hinder have helped it on, I have thought of the eagle, which rises slowly amid the calm of serene and sunny skies; but, spreading its wings to the storm and turning even adverse winds to advantage, soars aloft in tempests that strike other birds with dismay, darken the face of heaven, and roar through the troubled air. God so makes the wrath of man to praise Him, and restrains the remainder of wrath, that the almost uniform experience of his Church and people has been that of Israel in the land of Egypt,—"the more they were afflicted, the more they multiplied and grew." The worst enemies of a cause are false friends. Give me the opposition that, acting like the wind, blows zeal into a brisk and burning flame, rather than that cold, callous, selfish indifference, which our forefathers denounced as "damnable neutrality." The only effect which they who hesitate, vacillate, show no decision of character, have on a good cause, is to injure it more than the opposition of its enemies. Though they do nothing against Christ, doing nothing for him, standing apart, and taking no side in the battle, they cool the zeal, and discourage the ardour of its friends. Such men Jesus regards as foes; saying, "He that is not with me is against me; and he that gathereth not with me, scattereth abroad."

On decision of character, man's best and eternal interests depend. Our position nearly corresponds to that of Israel on Carmel, when Elijah, standing by the mountain altar, addressed the people, saying, "How long halt ye between two opinions; if the Lord be God, follow Him; but if Baal, then follow him!" Christ with a cross, but heaven behind him; and Satan with the world glittering in his hand, but hell flaming at his back, stand before us, rival candidates. Each solicits our hands and our heart; and, though Satan would persuade us to the contrary, we must decide between them; the one or other we must serve. In the vain hope of making much of both worlds, unwilling to perish, but yet unwilling to part from sin, many postpone their decision, and attempt to compromise the matter by offering these rivals a divided allegiance. Futile and fatal attempt! Man can divide his time between them, appearing in church on Sabbath and following pleasure on other days in the haunts of vice; and even so divide his money, although I fancy it never was done, as to contribute a sum as great to churches, charities, and religious schemes, as what he wastes on selfish and guilty pleasures. Let him trim the scales so well that the balance shall stand even, and the one form a perfect counterpoise to the other, he cannot divide his heart as he can his time, wealth, influence. To divide a heart is to destroy it; and to those who engage in the vain attempt our Lord has the old answer, "No man can serve two masters; for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon." Judas tried it; so also did Simon Magus; and so did Demas; and the result in their case was not certainly such as to encourage others to repeat the experiment.

By such attempts Christ is more offended and his cause injured than by sceptics and scoffers, the profane and vicious, his open and avowed enemies. "I would," he says, "that thou wert either cold or hot; and because thou art neither cold nor hot, I will spue thee out of my mouth." Nor is the reason far to seek. One traitor within is more to be dreaded than twenty foes without a city. One cold, selfish, narrow-minded, illiberal adherent, by damping the zeal of others, and setting a bad example, does a good cause more injury than almost any number of fierce opponents. Lowering the standard of morals, of benevolence, and piety, they who render to Christ a divided allegiance, inflict the deepest wounds on religion; and so far as they are concerned, she has reason to say, Save me from my friends, and I will manage my enemies. If people are to love the world, let them wear her livery, and not assume the garb of followers of Christ. Let those who fight Satan's battles fight them under Satan's banners; nor, wounding Jesus by their conformity to the world, their self-indulgence, and their vices, give him occasion, in reply to the question, What are these wounds on thy hands and feet? to complain, "These are the wounds with which I was wounded in the house of my friends."

Many flatter themselves that, though they are not saints, they cannot be justly regarded as great sinners. They may not be lovers of Christ or liberal supporters of his cause, but they cannot be said to walk in the way of the wicked, still less to sit in the chair of the scorner. Believe them, they have done nothing against Christ. Now suppose that were true, it purchases no exemption from the curse, "Curse ye Meroz, curse ye bitterly the inhabitants thereof; because they came not to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty." The question remains, What have they done for Christ and his cause? This their plea, that they have done nothing against him, what better is it than the servant's, who, on his Lord's return, went and digged in the ground; and from the hole drew out a napkin; and from the napkin that he carefully unrolled, drew out a piece of money—which, the exact sum he had received from his master, he returned saying, Lo, there, thou hast that is thine! This man had not betrayed his trust by wasting his master's money; he had neither appropriated it to his own use, nor squandered it on his vices. Yet, what was the master's judgment on this case,—the case of one, who, it might be affirmed had done nothing against him. "Thou wicked and slothful servant," says his lord, "thou knewest that I reap where I sowed not, and gather where I have not strawed: thou oughtest therefore to have put my money to the exchangers, and then at my coming I should have received mine own with usury. Take therefore the talent from him . . . and cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness; there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth!"

With faith in Christ, we have an anchor to ride out the wildest storm; blood to wash away the darkest sins; a ground of confidence that will stand unshaken both in the hour of death and on the day of judgment. But, alas! for those whose religion is merely negative; whose hope lies in not having been great sinners like others—like the undisguised enemies of piety, of religion, and Christ. Alas for the day when they stand arraigned at the bar of judgment! See how the balance yonder turns not so much on the evil that men have done as on the good that they have not done. Fixing his eyes more in pity than in anger on the astonished sinner, the Judge says, "I was an hungered, and ye gave me no meat: I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink: I was a stranger, and ye took me not in; . . . depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels!" So perish the hopes of lukewarm, cold-hearted professors! Dealing with those who are not for him, as with those who are against him, the Son of God spues them out of his mouth.

Decision of character is indispensable for that choosing of God for our portion, of Jesus for our Saviour, of holiness for our life, and of heaven for our home, without which no man can be saved. These, like other objects, may be objects of our admiration, of our approval, and even of our desires, without becoming our choice. An old heathen said, "I see and approve the better, and yet follow the worse;" and how many who call themselves Christians could say the same? Here, good wishes, and even longing desires, are not enough. For example: I fancy that the drunkard does not live who, when he looks at his ragged children, and wretched wife, and the sad wreck of character and happiness he has brought on himself, and contrasts these with the prosperous, happy home of some temperate neighbour, does not approve of temperance, and wish with feelings of bitter remorse that he also were a sober man. Poor drunkard! His judgment, heart, and conscience are on the side of sobriety; yet a sober life, though his wish, is not his choice. His wish is to cast away the damning cup, but his choice is to drink it; and so, with eyes more open to the consequences than the fluttering bird which, fascinated by the serpent's gaze, walks right into its jaws, under the spell of this accursed vice he carries the cup to his lips; and repenting only to repeat the debauch, plunges deeper and deeper into ruin.

Nor are the blessings of salvation to be obtained, or progress made in the way of grace, by mere wishes or desires, or even resolutions. It is hard getting to heaven with such corruption as there is within us, and such temptations as lie without us; nor will anything short of the grace of God and strong decision of mind be sufficient to overcome the torrent and tide of evil. Our godly ancestors, many of them at least, when they engaged to be the Lord's, perhaps before going to their first communion, wrote out a solemn covenant, whereby, choosing whom they would serve and accepting of Jesus as their Saviour, they gave themselves over to God; undertaking through Divine help, at whatever pain or hazard, to depart from all iniquity and follow the Lord wholly. And in these marriage contracts between the Lamb and his bride, the Saviour and the sinner, as they might be called, there is a warmth of feeling, a tenderness of heart, an energy and decision which one cannot read without applying to the pious men of that olden time these words of Holy Writ: "There were giants in those days." Yet in our days as well as theirs, salvation is unattainable without, though not perhaps such a formal, an equally decided choice of Christ; such a preference of him over his rivals—sin, the world, and the flesh—as constrains the believing and happy soul to address him thus: Whom have I in heaven but thee? there is none in all the earth whom I desire besides thee,—dying for me on thy bloody tree, waiting for me with long-suffering patience, winning me with such love, caressing me with such kindness, loading me with such favours, blessing me with such peace, and crowning me with such honours, Thou art the chiefest among ten thousand and altogether lovely. Thou hast given thyself for me, can I do less than give myself to thee? Command, and I obey; lead, I follow—laying down my sins and taking up my cross to follow!

It is of the utmost consequence for men to know if they have ever come to such a decision. Happy those who have made Christ their choice; in whose life there was a day when with eyes divinely opened to behold all the graces and glory of his character, they held to Jesus the language of yon noble woman who bids farewell to home, farewell to friends, farewell to country, farewell to her own weeping sister, and says, as turning to Naomi she throws her arms around her, "Entreat me not to leave thee—for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge; thy people shall be my people, and thy God shall be my God."

Decision of character is indispensable to that promptitude and energy both of prayer and action which man's perilous circumstances imperatively require. The condition of an awakened and alarmed sinner resembles that of the shedder of blood to whom the cities of refuge in the land of Israel offered protection from the sword of the avenger. Patent roads led to these; and how were they travelled by him who, throwing fearful glances over his shoulder, descried the form of the avenger, saw the gleam of the naked sword, and by-and-bye, as the other gained on him, heard the panting of his breath and the tread of his foot? Many a lovely flower grew by the road-side, but none did he pause to gather; many a friend was met, but none did he pause to salute; the hill is steep, but he stoutly breasts it; the road is rough, but he presses its flints beneath his bleeding feet; nor draws breath, nor pauses, nor hesitates, till, approaching the blessed boundary, he gathers up his remaining strength into one great effort, and leaps across the line, to fall on the ground fainting, but saved. Did men thus toil, endure, run, fly for life—with this life in jeopardy? Then what should be their decision of character, what their promptitude of action, what their strong, earnest crying of prayer, who, having Christ to seek, pardon to obtain, souls to be saved, eternal life to win, have a far greater work to do—the time allotted them to do it in often very short, and always very uncertain? In earning their daily bread, in promoting the welfare of their families, in fulfilling the duties of their worldly station, men have, no doubt, other interests to attend to than those which belong to their souls and salvation. But in these last, which may specially be called their Father's business, their highest and most precious interests are at stake. To these, therefore, let them address themselves with the energy and decision of one who, charged with an important commission from his master, replied, on being invited to refresh himself, "I will not eat till I have told mine errand!"

So spake Eliezer of Damascus, Abraham's steward, when, seeking a bride for his master's son, he arrived at the tents of Laban, browned by the sun, covered with the dust, weary and worn with the toils of the journey. For long days his seat had been the camel's back; his only couch the dewy ground; his food, in dried corn or fruits, the barest sustenance of nature. Now, his journey is happily accomplished. A smoking board, tempting his senses, stands invitingly before him; and as this hungry man turns a greedy eye on the banquet, how many plausible reasons can he find for preferring the indulgence of his own appetite to the discharge of his master's business! Exhausted nature pled for a period for refreshment and repose; and these would require but a brief delay. What possible damage could Isaac's interests suffer by that? Nay, the business might prosper better for it; he himself being abler to tell his errand, and Laban, after pledging his guest in cups of generous wine, more inclined perhaps to lend a gracious ear to his proposals. Besides, it was hardly good breeding to decline this hospitable offer. What the one gracefully offered, the other should gratefully accept. Might not his refusal give offence to Laban? and since "he who believeth shall not make haste," might not the very piety of the good man regard such hurry as indicating a want of faith in Providence. Besides, it was contrary to the polished manners of the East to plunge at once into the heart of business. The highest examples might be pled against such indecorous haste. For did not the angels—one being God himself in human form,—who announced to Abraham the doom of Sodom, partake of his hospitality, and eat beneath the oak of Mamre, before entering on the awful business which brought them from the skies. Besides, no rival was there soliciting Rebekah's hand. Heaven seemed to have granted the good man's prayer—the maiden had met him at the well; she had shown him kindness; she had received his presents; and everything promising a happy conclusion, his business seemed one, if ever there was one, which could not suffer from a brief delay. Such reasons Eliezer might have urged for deferring his mission to his meal. Yet from all these, plausible as they appeared, this decided, resolute, singularly devoted servant, turned aside his ear, to say, as he stood by the untouched banquet, "I will not eat till I have told mine errand"—involving the happiness of my master, the preservation of a chosen race, the fulfilment of God's gracious purpose and glorious promises, my business brooks no delay; who can tell what a day or an hour may bring forth?

Would God that men with equal firmness and promptitude repelled the less plausible arguments with which Satan plies them through the lusts of the flesh, the pleasures of the world, and the pride of life? He persuades them to suspend their choice, and not at once embrace the offer of salvation and give themselves to Christ. But why should sinners who hang over perdition be persuaded to delay that?—or why should God's people postpone any good work they are called to by duty to their divine master, to other men, or themselves? We ought never to let a good resolution go to sleep; nor postpone till to-morrow what we can do to-day. Good in respect of earthly things, such decision is all-important in matters that concern either our own or others' souls. Let men make Eliezer their pattern. He stands by Laban's table loaded with tempting viands, as firm in purpose and prompt in action as if the success of his mission was suspended on his own indomitable energy; while, as if nothing whatever depended on himself, but all on God, he raises his eyes to heaven, crying, "Oh, Lord God of my master Abraham, give me good speed this day!" And God did it. He touched the maiden's heart; to her brother's question, "Wilt thou go with this man?" this her frank and ready answer, "I will go." The steward's prayer was answered; and so also will be ours, whatever we seek, be it mercy to pardon, or grace to help, if we seek under the pressure of these weighty words, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, nor device, in the grave, whither thou goest."

DAYS OF GRACE.

BY A BUSINESS MAN.

I HAD just turned round the corner of Old Jewry when our district missionary, Mr. Smith, almost ran against me. Mr. Smith is a good man whom we—that is, a few friends and myself—have engaged to visit the poor in the district in which our offices are situated. We thought it was only our duty to remember the poor of a locality where we earn our daily bread, and something more.

"Oh, I am glad to meet you," said he. "I have just been at your office to ask you to give me ten shillings."

"What for?" I asked.

"Well, I don't know whether I should tell you," he answered, with a smile. "Just give me the money and I shall tell you afterwards. It is urgently required."

What could I do?

"Well, here it is," I said. "And now tell me the secret."

"It is for William Hurt, then," was the answer."

"What? for that rascal!" cried I. "If I had known that——"

"He is dying," interrupted Mr. Smith, "and his poor wife and children are starving."

Of course, that settled the matter. I was disgusted with Hurt, but I felt that my anger could not follow him to the grave. Death is often a peacemaker where life is nothing but war. Hunt had from his boyhood been a clerk in my office, and a clever, active, pushing fellow he was. But he took to drinking and gambling, and married an actress from a penny theatre, and everything went wrong with him. It is a long story how I tried by every means in my power to keep him afloat, but it was impossible to repair the old holes as quickly as he bored new ones. Moreover, he turned insolent and neglectful, and even dishonest, till at length I felt compelled to give him into custody. After his release I again tried to give him a lift, as he seemed repentant, and I was successful in obtaining a pretty good situation for him, in which he behaved well for a short time. But he soon fell into his bad habits again, and his last state became even worse than his first, so that I withdrew my countenance from him in disgust, being determined not to waste one farthing more upon such a hopeless profligate.

"Is he dying?" I said, in a repentant tone. The whole of the poor wretch's story stood at once before my recollection. A shudder thrilled through me at the thought of what the end must be of such a life; and that end now so near! He had been well educated; he had, in his youth, been a regular attendant at the house of God; he knew his Bible as well as I knew it. Admonitions, warnings, entreaties to keep himself aloof from the paths of evil had not been wanting. The Spirit of God had not ceased repeatedly to knock at the door of his heart, but he had stubbornly resisted. And now the measure was full, and he was summoned to appear before his Maker and Judge to give an account of his stewardship!

"Is he in a condition to be spoken to?" I asked the missionary.

"He is, and I believe he is now accessible to good words—at least, he asked me to lend him a Bible, and he thanked me in a voice of emotion for my short address and prayer."

"I will go with you and see him," I said.

As we crossed Gresham Street, we were passed by a young lady who kindly nodded to Mr. Smith.

"Who is she?" I asked.

"She is one of my missionary agents," answered Mr. Smith, with a smile.

"Indeed!" said I, in a tone of surprise. "So you keep a staff of agents on your own account?"

"I do," was the answer; "they are of both sexes, you know. You, too, are one of them, and I have you on duty just now, you observe."

"Oh, I see," replied I.

"Ah," he continued, "she is a real angel of consolation; she is gifted with a rare talent for finding out distress where it is screened behind a respectable appearance, and for filling an empty lamp with oil without soiling its glossy outside. I daresay you have heard of that carpenter who fell from the roof of a house in Basinghall Street, and died instantaneously, a few months since; well, many heard of it, but it was soon forgotten, and we least of all thought of the wife and three children whom the man left behind. But Miss Rogers betook herself the next morning to the poor widow's house to remind her that she had a Husband still of whom death could not bereave her. She soon found out all about the woman's circumstances, and that all her sources of subsistence were on a sudden stopped; and seeing that she was an honest, respectable person, who kept her household in good order, Miss Rogers secretly collected subscriptions till she was able to put her in a little shop, where she now earns a livelihood for herself and her little ones; and nobody knows anything about it,—nor should I, had not the good woman herself made me her confidant."

While thus talking, we reached the quarter in which Hurt lived. A dark, wooden staircase in a dirty court led us to a back room on the second floor. If misery and destitution had taken up their abode anywhere it was here. Shabby remains of former affluence strangely contrasted with the most loathsome effects of poverty, neglect, and filth. A walnut bookcase, which must once have been an elegant piece of furniture, was placed against the dirty whitewashed wall; two of its four nicely-carved pillars were broken, and its much damaged shelves bore a broken soap-box, a bundle of false hair, a piece of a comb, a wine-bottle with a bit of candle stuck in it, a cracked wine-glass, a stuffed bird, a broken flute, &c. Chairs there were not, but I saw two wooden forms, one of which was occupied by two half-naked little children, who were playing with a dead fish and a pitcher of water. Four other children were at the Ragged School, which Mr. Smith had succeeded in getting them to attend regularly. A frame of a bedstead, covered with straw and rags, stood in a corner opposite the fire-place. I could scarcely recognise the pale, emaciated, unshaven face, or realise that it was that of a man who was once one of the handsomest persons I ever knew. Reclining on the edge of his bed was a tall, slender woman, whose regular features betokened past beauty. Her dress was a perfect illustration of the parable of the old garment patched up with pieces of new cloth. Still there was something in her attitude and movements which betrayed the former actress. She was the image of suffering and destitution. It was evident that it was from weakness that she had taken her place on the bed, as she was scarcely able to keep herself standing. After having risen when we entered, she again dropped down, almost fainting from the exertion.

Hurt covered his face with his hands when he saw me, and burst into tears.

"I will just leave you alone for a minute," whispered Mr. Smith into my ear, "as I am going to buy some refreshment for the woman and the children."

I took the wooden form which was unoccupied, and seated myself by the bedside.

"Don't be afraid of me," I said to the invalid; "I am not come to upbraid, but to comfort you."

"Oh, Mr. ——," he answered, casting a look upon me which I shall never forget—I cannot tell whether it was more indicative of remorse or of surprise—"I am unworthy of so much kindness. Can you forgive me all the evil I have done to you?"

I tendered him my hand, which he pressed spasmodically.

"With all my heart," said I. "But my forgiveness is a small matter, my friend. I am myself a sinner, and what is all the evil you have done to me, in comparison with what God in his mercy has forgiven me? The person to whom you have done the greatest evil is yourself. Are you aware of the condition you are in at present?"

"I am," was the answer. "I am a dying man. There is no hope for me, neither for my body, nor—nor—for my soul!" he added, in a voice choking with tears.

"There is for your soul!" said I, in a decisive tone. "As long as it is the day of grace, there is in Jesus an open door to escape, even for the chief of sinners."

"Day of grace," he repeated, mournfully. "You don't know, sir, how recklessly during my life I have played with that word. Do you remember how, when I was a lad, you one day ordered me to cash a three months' bill at the bank of Messrs —— and Co.? I made the remark that it was three days over the date on which the bill was due, and you seemed pleased with that observation. You then explained to me what days of grace are, and that after the expiration of them, there is no possibility of further delaying in payment. 'Now, Willie,' you then said to me, 'mind the days of grace which God has allowed you, and be sure to have the money when your life's bill is due.' This saying of yours made a deep impression upon me at the time, and I began to be thoughtful about the concerns of my soul. But pride and self-complacency took possession of my heart, and brought me into bad company; and after that, when my conscience rebuked me, and you remonstrated with me, I would often in a jesting mood say to myself, 'Ah well, the days of grace which the Lord allows are more than three; plenty of time before my bill becomes due!' But oh, it is due now, and the days of grace are at an end, and what have I to pay with?"

At this moment Mr. Smith re-entered, and placed the contents of a basket, which a boy brought in, upon the table. There was everything a hungry stomach could crave,—a jug with steaming soup, and a loaf, and half a pound of butter, and a plate of cold meat, and half a pint of port for the sick man, and oranges, and some sugar, and two woollen jackets for the naked children, and a box with soap, and a towel. I wondered how he could have got it all for ten shillings, and thought such a lucrative business was worth speculating in; so I again dropped something into his hand and whispered a few words about coal and a bed and a blanket. While he was away on this errand it was a luxury to see how the soup and a considerable portion of the other eatables disappeared under the hands of the woman and her two little children. Meanwhile, I took the cracked wine-glass from the shelf of the book-case and pressed an orange into it, and having mixed a little sugar with it, I gave it to the sick man. The whole scene was like a showery day after a long summer drought.

"William," I said, "the days of grace are not yet at an end. Suppose there is only one day to run, there is yet time to get the amount of your bill."

"Oh, it is too late, now," he sighed; "I have wasted my time."

"No, it is not," I answered. "Still it is the day of grace."

"My debt is so great! my sins are so great!" groaned he, covering his face with his hands.

"Not too great to be paid even this moment," I replied. "If you had to pay your debt in silver and gold, I should, with you, despair to collect such an enormous amount in one day. But you know the Apostle says, 'We are not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ.' That fountain opened for all sin and uncleanness is inexhaustible, dear friend, and accessible at every moment. As long as it is the day of grace, that fountain stands in the midst of the world's market-place, flowing on and on without stopping, and whosoever is athirst, let him take the water of life freely."

These words seemed to have a calming influence upon his mind. At least his nervous emotion abated, and he appeared more accessible to quiet reasoning.

"You do not know, sir," he said to me in a calm voice, "how impossible it is, at the end of a life such as I have led, to believe that there is still a way to escape its due reward."

"Impossible!" I exclaimed. "Is there anything impossible with God? Look at the thief on the cross. I know your life has not been what it ought, but his was not better at any rate. Yet, at the very last moment he was saved. Only one minute remained for him before he died to turn his face prayerfully to Jesus, and the whole list of his sins, long and black as it was, was swept away by one word of the all-merciful Saviour."

"True," answered he, "and I have often thought in these days of agony and despair of that wonderful story, trying to draw a ray of light from it, to comfort my soul in its utter darkness; but every effort has been paralysed by the thought that, great sinner as that thief was, yet he was but a child in wickedness compared with me, for he never knew the Gospel and the power of grace until he beheld the Saviour on the cross. But I have from my youth been trained in the knowledge of Christ; I even at one time pledged myself to his service, but I fell away and delivered myself up unto the service of the devil, rejecting so great a salvation, crucifying Christ again, and counting his blood an unholy thing. And now that the evil master whom I served as long as I had the power, abandons me, and leaves me in the hands of the tormentors, I wish to escape and avail myself of that grace which I once so recklessly insulted and rejected; but I feel that it would be a fresh insult to be impudent enough to apply under such circumstances and after such antecedents. No, sir, there is no hope for me. My days of grace have expired for ever!"

He buried his face in the rags that constituted his pillow and for a while continued to weep like a child. Alas! I could not help feeling that there was too much truth in what he had been saying. Looking at him only in the light of justice, what could be more righteous than his condemnation! He was like a tree which had wasted all its sap and strength in producing only leaves to please itself with, and poisonous fruits which had been obnoxious to everybody; and now, after having spoiled its strength, when it is about to wither away in the best of its days—what garden can it be transplanted to? But I could not allow justice alone to speak here. I could have allowed it had I found him a hardened sinner, trying to establish his own righteousness. But I found him bathed in tears, accusing himself, broken-hearted and at the brink of despair under the remorse of his conscience. This, at any rate, is not a work of his late master, I thought. This is a work of grace in his heart. The day has not yet drawn to its close. No, no, Jesus will not allow it to close before his Spirit accomplish the work He has commenced!

"William," I said, when he had resumed his former calmness, "I wish I could say that you are over-colouring your sad condition; but, alas! I must remind you that what you have been saying just now was said by me years ago when I spoke to you of the fearful consequences which your irregular life would necessarily lead to."

"Oh! I know, I know," said he. "You foretold me all I am experiencing now. You pointed to my deathbed and you asked me what would be left to console me with if I continued in that way? But I thought, the day of grace is long and I shall manage to be in good time yet."

"Do you remember," I asked, "how I once said to you, 'William, do not play with truth. It is like a steel spring: if once bent beyond its power it never acts again as it did before; it becomes lame and powerless to your mind, and even the most striking and consoling text of Scripture will lose its taste and flavour?'"

"Oh! I do remember it," replied he, "and it was so true. I know all the texts of the Gospel which speak of Christ's love towards sinners; but they are nothing to me, they have lost their meaning, they leave me comfortless. I knew them all by heart from my childhood, and during my wicked life they would rise thousands of times to my memory, even in the very moments when I was indulging my sinful passions; but I threw them away fretfully, laughed them down, or drowned them in drink. But now they come again to revenge themselves upon me, marshalling themselves in a file before my wearied mind day and night, looking at me, as it were, with cold, stern faces, as if saying, 'God judge between thee and us!'"

A shudder passed through my frame at these words. I looked upward to God and sighed, "Thou canst make them smile upon him again."

At this moment Mr. Smith re-entered, whispering into my ear that the articles he had bought were to be sent within an hour.

"Here lies a dying sinner without hope," I said to him. I then told him the topic of our conversation.

"Just so," he said, with a stern face; "these are the bitter fruits of sin. This man's sins are too great to be forgiven."

I started, and looked Mr. Smith in the face, to ascertain whether he was really in earnest. Even Hurt cast a look of surprise at him.

"Mr. Smith," said I, in a tone of deep disapproval, "do you know what you are saying?"

"I do," was the answer. "Scripture says, 'God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth; the Lord revengeth, and is furious; the Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries, and He reserveth wrath for his enemies.'"

"I know that text of Nahum," said I; "but in the next verse he says, 'The Lord is slow to anger.'"

"True," replied Mr. Smith, gravely; "but he adds, 'He will not at all acquit the wicked.' Here is a man who has spent all his life in wickedness. How then can he be acquitted? I have read nowhere in the Bible of such a great sinner being pardoned."

"Oh, misery!" said Hurt, burying his face in his rags.

I looked at Mr. Smith surprised and inquiringly.

"No, I don't recollect that I ever read of such a great sinner being pardoned," repeated Mr. Smith, taking no notice of my look.

"Take Peter, for instance, who denied the Lord three times with an oath," I said, sharply.

"Ah, that's quite a different case," replied Mr. Smith; "his was only a moment's weakness; here is a man who has denied the Lord all his life long. Of such sinners being pardoned there is no instance in the Bible, as far as I recollect."

"Well, then, I know one," cried Hurt, in a triumphant tone. "Take Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah, who made his son pass through the fire and wrought much wickedness in the sight of the Lord to provoke Him to anger, and shed much innocent blood till he had filled Jerusalem from one end to the other. Yet when he prayed to the Lord in his prison, he was pardoned, and restored to his throne in mercy. Now, I am a great sinner, I know, but I cannot see how there could be a greater sinner than he."

"Ah, but mind, that was in the day of the law," observed Mr. Smith, dogmatically; "and that was a time of great mercy, as it seems."

"Well, in what day are we now?" asked Hurt, quickly.

"Why, I don't know," replied Mr. Smith, drily. "What day do you think we are in?"

"We are in the day of grace!—yes, in the day of grace!" cried Hurt, passionately.

While saying so, in the fervour of his agitation, he raised himself up in his bed, and looked Mr. Smith in the face with eyes glistening like live coals. Then, overpowered by his weakness, he fell back on his pillow quite exhausted.

There was a pause. I now understood Mr. Smith's purpose.

"Well then," said he, clasping the dying man's hand in his, "if God pardoned a Manasseh in the day of the law, what will He not do with you in the day of grace!"

A FACE IN A DREAM.

She came but for a little while,
Yet with a wondrous gleam!
She left within my soul her smile—
The Darling of my Dream!

O face too clear for sorrow or tear;
Too real for masks that seem!
I seek, but shall not find you Here,
You Darling of my Dream!

I wonder, do you wait for me
Beside the glad Life-Stream,
Or under the Leaf of Healing Tree—
You Darling of my Dream?

O sometimes lift your veil of night,
And let one thrilling beam
Fill all my life, for days, with light—
You Darling of my Dream!

FIRST WORDS IN CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL IN 1866.

BY THE DEAN.

"I must be about my Father's business."—Luke ii. 49.

In dealing with this, the leading thought of our blessed Lord's childhood, I shall not enter upon the peculiar circumstances which brought out his utterance of it, but shall dwell on the words themselves, as carrying instruction to us at this present time.

We have passed the barrier, and the door of the year that is gone has closed behind us. Our thoughts are now not turned backward, as last Sunday, but forward, into the new space which has now opened before us. We are no longer gathered on the stern, tracking the wake which the vessel has left in the waters, but have passed into the bows, and are with anxious eyes scanning the distant horizon.

And as in the endings of things there is a charm, so also in the beginnings. An event gains in interest, as by being the last, so also by being the first of its kind. But the charm is not altogether the same, nor does the interest belong to the same class. That which is last is, so to speak, sealed up and safe. It has no continuance, and is therefore neither food for hope, nor material of disappointment. But a beginning necessarily implies a continuance, and the recollection of it becomes joyous or mournful, according as that continuance fulfilled or fell short of the hope excited. So that we do not cherish the beginnings as we do the endings of things in this world, because they are too often broken off mournfully, and are unpleasing to think upon. The bright morning, clouded over at noon, and forgotten in the tempest before night; the healthy and joyous childhood, paling before disease and infirmity as years go on; the fresh and promising spirit damped and chilled by the heartless world: these are of too common occurrence to need any calling to your remembrance. And in speaking of the beginnings of things, let us all through bear this in mind, that we are handling frail and fading flowers, and treating of matters on the permanence of which there is no dependence. Let us so try to tend the flower that, though it may drop, the seed may remain: so to build the fabric which may be overthrown, as to be mindful of the city which hath foundations, even our permanent and everlasting home.

Well then, my brethren, we are busy with the thoughts for the opening year, and are making each our beginning of its plans and interests. How ought those beginnings to be made? Can we gather from Christian thoughts and examples any sound maxims whereby such beginnings may be regulated?

To answer this question, let us look at the great example set before us in our text. We know that our blessed Lord had a mission to fulfil on earth, and we are therefore not surprised to find Him eager to be engaged in his Father's business. We do not wonder when we see Him, at twelve years old, with boyish ardour, anticipate his career of teaching. We are perhaps more surprised when we see Him, after such an outburst of youthful earnestness, go down to Nazareth and become, for eighteen more years, subject to his earthly parents. But, in truth, both these belonged to Him as our example: both, as true and very man. In the one, He was for entering on the fulness of his mission from the Father; in the other, He chastened his will as man, and waited the ripening of those human powers which He had taken on Himself, and also the fulness of the time appointed by the Father. I think we can see several wise lessons presented to us for our beginnings, in that beginning, in those earliest recorded words of his.

First, then, in our beginnings for this year, and in all our beginnings whatever, let us take heed that they be of that which is our Father's business. And this is a very wide term, bearing a thousand different meanings for different persons, and sometimes even for the same person. It is a term very much misunderstood, and especially misunderstood by persons who talk about and profess religion. Such persons often speak as if the business which God had set every man were to save his own soul, and nothing else; and so, while they enjoin in a man self-denial, they are, after all, teaching him the purest and most refined selfishness. No, my brethren: God did not send each of you into the world merely to save your own souls when you leave the world, but to glorify Him by your lives while you are in the world. And these words again take many meanings for many men. Our lives are very different. Some work with their heads, some with their hands; some not at all, but must serve God by patient endurance,—in weakness,—in darkness,—in decay of vital power. And it is somewhat curious to trace how men, in assigning their religious duties, will generally manage to leave out of the account just that very range of circumstances in which those duties really lie. Thy Father's business is to be done not only—not principally—on the Sunday, and with thy Bible open before thee: not only, nor principally, when thou speakest in a serious tone, and in long, unaccustomed words: not only, nor principally, when thou removest thy thoughts from this world to another: to think so, is to yield to the devil's temptation, who is contented if he can only get men to leave their common lives out of their religion, and so to serve him in reality, while their service of God withers up into mere confessions of faith, and forms of worship, and observance of days. No: thy Father's business is behind that counter, where thou standest from week's end to week's end: it is when thou measurest and when thou weighest, when thou describest thy goods, when thou givest thy greetings of the day, when thou talkest of the news of the day. And again, mistake not. No need of long words and solemn looks in order to do thy Father's business. Leave solemn times to Him, and take thou care of ordinary ones. There is not one of thy customers, whom He will not, in his own time, bring into the wilderness, and there plead with him face to face. He can do this better than thou canst. Besides, solemn looks and solemn words are not to be dragged gratuitously into every-day matters. If we take them in vain, we shall soon find that we use them in vain. A bell always tolling either is unheeded, or is a nuisance. Be courteous ever, be cheerful: or if thy spirits be not good, at least be natural. Even the sad look of a sorrowful man, is better than the made-up gravity of a sanctimonious man. Thy Father's business this year will also lie at that family board where thou presidest or where thou sittest as one of the household. If thou survivest the year, at least 700 of its hours will be spent at meal-times. What an opportunity for those that rule, what an opportunity for those that obey, in the family! In order to make an impression, time is wanted. Will there be any length of opportunity during the year equal to this, for impressing our social characters on one another? Great and striking occasions of example or of admonition may be compared to the storms which sweep the earth and the sky,—the revolutions which change the face of nature; and it is not to these that she owes the opening leaf, and the swelling bud, and the warbling of her birds, and the wealth of her fields,—but to the gradual dews and to the gentle showers, to the daily punctual sun, and the repose of her nightly darkness. Even so will it be with the example and the words which will really do good, which will really advance our Father's business. Not premeditated, not studied in the utterance: not known as examples, nor recognised as admonitions when occurring, but gently sinking into the mind, and lodging in the memory. The parent's thoughtful, cheerful kindness, showing the thorough knowledge, and at the same time the loving pretermission of the child's infirmity; the happy tact which can divert rising temper, or taking it at its tide, carry it forward into zeal for good; the open, unreserved heart, knowing no secret jealousies, even where disagreeing, all seen through, and all understood; the uniform kindly respect for things sacred, coupled with just enough of sportive familiarity to render them not disliked, but loved by those about thee; the wise and humble holding of the balance between reckless doubt and boastful certainty, which may keep the objects of faith where they ought to be with us, who are to prove all things and hold fast that which is good; in these things, and in such as these, lies our Father's business this year, for us, who have to preside in our families—parents, masters, mistresses, those to whom God has given the place and the power to influence from above. And for you, the rest, who hold subordinate places, there is at the family board your Father's business likewise. He went down to Nazareth and was subject unto them; He, with all that noble ambition swelling in his bosom; He, who had had that wonderful taste of his coming office on the very pavement and under the very arches which were another day to echo his heavenly tones; and for not one year, but eighteen:—all his boyhood, all his rising youth, all his early manhood. Such was his subjection. Shall yours be less? Will you, with all your ignorance, all your proneness to fall or to stray, refuse the humbler place, which He, the divine and sinless one, cheerfully accepted? Blessed as is the influence of a Christian father, mother, master, mistress, I half doubt whether it is more blessed than that of an obedient, wise, cheerful Christian subordinate in the family. And for this, as well as that other, to be at its best, there is no need for premeditation, none for studied utterance. Let the young spirits flow at their will, subject to no checks but those of modesty and family affection; where the heart of the household is kindly, the life blood in the members will be kindly likewise. And then, what blessings may result from the gentle returns of parental love—from glad concurrence; from unreserved loving discussion of points of difference; the crude freshness of the half-formed opinion of the young correcting the baneful tendency to frigid torpor which sets in upon the mind of age; the unchastened zeal of youth reminding the wiser that there is a better thing than wisdom: the ever-realizing objective belief of childhood infusing life and vigour into the more reasoning and less assured faith of riper years. In the Christian household, there is not a place nor a time which witnesses more unconscious progress made in their Father's business, than the family table and the daily meal: in the un-Christian household, or the mere nominally Christian table, there is no place or time where that work is more thwarted and hindered.

But we must be drawing to a close, with much left unsaid respecting the forms which our Father's business takes for different classes among us: in order that we may state a few lessons which seem to be given us in this utterance of our Blessed Lord, as to the ways in which our beginnings ought to be made. For whatever our hands findeth to do, there are certain ways of taking it in hand which are certain to lead to failure and disappointment, and certain others by which, though one may perhaps not succeed, we shall certainly gain what will eventually prove more than equivalent to the most signal success.

First then, begin whatever thou takest in hand earnestly, with all thy intention. Begin rather from the heart than from the head. Infinitely more mischief has been done, both to the Church and to individuals, from over-caution than from over-zeal. The great defects of Churches—of our own Church for example—have been owing to men hesitating to begin a decided course of action through timidity. Caution is a good balance-wheel, but a very bad mainspring. Had it not been for cautious and timid men, our Church would not have been so far behind her duties to our increasing and overwhelming population; all sorts of difficulties were thrown in the way of building churches and establishing districts, and the result is what we see and lament. And even so it is too often with individual men. There is some course of action which our Master has clearly pointed out; some business of our Father's which we know we are bound to undertake. Conscience speaks out plainly concerning it, and the heart and affections echo the voice of the conscience. But then come in those miserable second thoughts, which commonly revolve round self, as our first and third thoughts do round God and duty: What will men think? What shall I lose by such a course? Is it prudent? Am I exactly the person to begin it? And so conviction gets put out of sight and locked away, and zeal cools down, and the conscience protests in vain, and the world and the devil gain the day. Remember ever as a general rule, my brethren, that the heart is a safer guide than the head, love than calculation, penitence than pride, Christ's word than our own logic.

Again: whatever we begin, this year or at any time, let us begin honestly, in the face of realities, and with a single purpose. No artificial motives, no reserved purposes, no self-deceiving subterfuges, will stand wear in life. Like mere paper constitutions for countries, they will not work—they will fail the moment there is a strain upon them. Our Father's business, like the world's business, requires men of business to carry it on; not the visionary, not the speculator, is the man who succeeds in the market, or builds up solid prosperity; and so it is here likewise: the books must be punctually kept, and stock regularly taken, and an account must ever be ready to be rendered of every venture. And so begin with thy Father's business likewise: let thy belief be not mere words, but things and persons; prate not about doctrines of which thy life knows nothing; press not upon others as certainties things of which thou hast secret misgivings; but begin, and go on, honestly—with no more ardour apparent than there is inward fire to sustain; with no disingenuous suppression of that which burneth for utterance within thee.

Again, though from the heart, though with ardour, begin advisedly and discreetly. And here is no contradiction to what was before said. True zeal is not the wild crackling of thorns, but the steady flame of the wisely fed lamp. The mischief is, that because there is a zeal which is not according to knowledge, those whom the world knows as safe men are allowed to assume that there is no such thing as zeal with knowledge. Be both, in our beginnings, united, going hand in hand.

And it is also necessary to say, and to explain it when said, Begin all beginnings with prayer: to say it, because we are ever apt to forget whence our true strength comes:—to explain it when said, because there is hardly any injunction more liable to be misinterpreted. Formal prayer, the prayer of words on bended knees, is a necessary part of the Christian life, an ever recurring and never to be intermitted duty. But there are many beginnings of our actions and courses of action to which such kind of prayer would be unsuitable; nay, which it would tend to crush and annihilate in the very bud. And so the common course is, to preach and enjoin loudly the duty of beginning all things with prayer, and then conveniently to cast aside nine-tenths of the occurrences of real life as being unsuitable to be made subjects of prayer, and so the devil gets his way again. Let us try to be wiser—let us look at things as we find them, and at God as He has revealed Himself to us. What is He to us? Our reconciled Father, in whose presence we live and move as members of Christ. Though there must be set prayers at set times, yet the true prayer without ceasing is the consciousness of his blessed presence and the deference ever made to his holy will; and the true beginning everything with prayer is the undertaking of nothing as separate from Him, but of everything as members of his family, and heirs of his inheritance through Christ. Thus, my brethren, may we be found, this year and ever, about our Father's business; thus may we, each in his place, however humble, glorify Him on earth, and finish the work which He hath given us to do.

THE BOY MARTYR OF ROME.

A Roman lady sat, with her distaff in her hand, near the opening of the street leading to her noble and stately home. She was alone. Behind her was the hall, upon the walls of which were inscribed on entablatures of marble the stories of Roman days gone by. There was the tale in deep mosaic work of Romulus and Remus, of Horatius Cocles, and that young Mucius who, in the presence of Porsenna, thrust his hand into the burning coal; and there was the great Camillus striking the balance with his iron sword against the power of Brennus and the Gauls. Such were the pictures exposed to the clear atmosphere of Italy. In the midst of the marble hall which rose around the lady of whom we have spoken, one of those delicious fountains of water for which the Roman houses were famed, sprang with gladness towards the open sky above it, and fell with cool delicious sweetness upon the basin which encircled it. But amidst all these luxuries, the lady remained upon her couch near the doorway, continuing her work upon the distaff. Not that she was indifferent to the beauty of the atrium behind her, or to the refreshing sound of the splashing water upon a burning day. But her eyes were steadily fixed upon her work, and her attention was evidently attracted to something in the street. She waited,—the footstep drew near, it was that of a Roman boy. The youth reached the ostia of the atrium; he was a fine and manly boy, aged sixteen, although in our country he would have been reckoned younger. He stood before his mother; his olive-coloured legs were bare, his long dark Italian hair fell over his shoulders, his face was swarthy with the colour of a southern clime, and his figure clothed with the dress of a Roman lad. He had a satchel round his breast and shoulder, upon which hung the books with which he had left his school.

Well did that lady know the footstep of the schoolboy: she had been waiting long and anxiously for his return.

"Pancratius, where have you been? you are late from school; but more than that, you look sad and disheartened."

The boy stood before his mother, and dropped upon his knee. The next moment he flung himself upon her breast. And, as the tears trickled down upon her bosom, she said,—

"Oh! my child, have you dishonoured the name of Jesus? Have you given up, for any temptation, the profession of your religion?"

"My mother! oh, my mother! No; it was on account of that profession that I shed the tears which some boys in this city would not shed, and it is for that only that I am weeping upon your breast."

But still he hung upon his mother's shoulder.

"Tell me, Pancratius, tell me; there is something the matter: what is it? Have you given up your faith?"

"Oh! my mother, no. Hear the story. They have long suspected me at school of being a Christian: but by your direction, and by the advice of other Christians, I have never confessed my faith, though I have longed to do it. At the school there is a youth named Fulvius, older than I am by two years. He has always been my rival in school-work (but that does not matter), and, more than that, he hates me for my influence over the other boys, and, above all, because he secretly believes that I am a Christian. Yesterday he showed his hatred for me, his suspicion of me. I was prepared. To-day we were all in the yard, leaving the school, satchel on back, slate on shoulder. Fulvius met me in the yard. He came up to me as if in friendship. A little fellow, Caius, was holding my hand; he had loved me since he entered the school. Fulvius looked at the boy, and struck him on the breast. I raised my arm to protect the child, and Fulvius struck me in the face. All the boys drew near. They had not left the yard. There was an impression among them that a fight was going to begin. Very few stood by me, and the child was threatened by Fulvius and his party. 'You are a Christian—a vile, abject Christian,' cried the youth, coming forward towards me; and he struck me again. My mother, I doubled my fist, and I directed it at the face of the heathen youth; but, as I did so, I remembered Him who stood blindfolded before his accusers, stricken on the face, but answering not again. I withdrew my hand, and they called me a coward. But, oh! my mother, I am not a coward. I will bear everything for the name and for the sake of Jesus, but I am not a coward. Do you believe me?"

"I do, my beloved child, I do. I never can—I never will believe Pancratius to be a coward. No! my noble boy. Your father died a martyr for the cause of Christ, and I well believe that you will do so rather than yield the faith to which you have pledged yourself, or sully the glorious banner under which you have begun to march."

The boy remained silent upon his mother's bosom. Very beautiful was that boy's figure as he rested there.

"They called me coward; but I am not a coward," were the words which still echoed in whispers round the chamber.

It was night, a lovely Roman night, such as Italy and Sicily only know,—soft, warm, gently illumined by the tender lustre of the moon. "Go to rest, my boy," said Lucina, "you are weary and vexed with some matter of which you have not told me. But I am satisfied. Go and rest."

The boy rose, and went to his chamber. He knelt in prayer to God, and confessed the sins of the bygone day. The noble boy then lay down on his couch, and as he did so murmured to himself, "I am not a coward." He slept—lulled by the sound of the delicious plash of the fountain, and under the exquisitely soft lustre of the Roman moon.

The lady did not sleep so calmly. "Why did he so anxiously ask that question to-day? Could it be that he had in any way given up his Christian profession?" These were the thoughts that occupied her mind.

So they two slept—slept under the guardianship of the King of martyrs and the Lover of immortal souls.

Morning came. Lucina had not yet risen from her sleepless couch. The boy was gone—gone back to school—gone to bear greater suffering than the blow of Fulvius—more trouble than the shout of those who once were his earnest friends, but now his bitter foes. He returned, to go on with his daily work in school under the chill shadow of indifferentism and lack of notice from all around him. The suppressed laugh, the glance of the eye, scarce lifted over the page or slate, at the youth, as he took his place and pursued his work, were the trials of the young Christian that day.

But while Pancratius patiently suffered at school, the lady thought anxiously at home, "Why did my child weep last evening upon my breast? I scarce ever knew him shed a tear; so brave! so patient! Oh, my Lord and my God! has that child given up his faith in Thee? Has he cast a shadow upon his confession by wilful sin?"

As Pancratius left school that afternoon the cry of "There goes the coward!" added to his sadness. When he came to his mother, the same words were on his lips, though not uttered now, "My mother, I am not a coward." His calm face rather perplexed than settled the lady's mind.

On that evening, as the youth was standing near her, his dark Italian hair shading his intelligent brow, a distant sound was heard in the street. The lady did not move; in fact, scarcely seemed to notice it. Pancratius started; his slate fell to his side, his finger was on his lip. Lucina did not remark the movement of her boy, for she still worked on.

"My mother! did you hear that?"

"I heard a sound," said the lady, gently; "but were the evening not so still, the sky so cloudless, I should have thought it was thunder."

Pancratius leant close to her ear, and whispered the words—the old words, "My mother, I am no coward."

The very sound of this sentence had become like rhythm in his mother's ear. She smiled, but did not answer: when again the sound arose in the distance, but evidently nearer.

"Did you hear that then, my mother?"

The lady looked up this time. "It is singular, Pancratius," said she. "It is not thunder, certainly, and it does come nearer,—it may be wind."

"It is not wind, my mother; hark, listen, it comes nearer still!"

And it did.

There was the sound of a multitude approaching; there was the grating of heavy wheels upon the gravel; there was the shout of men who strove to gain the mastery—and the multitude came on.

The foremost object of this procession came in view—a cart, whose sides were covered by planks and boards piled up; another, and another. It was evident that the excitement amongst the people was great.

"What is it, Pancratius?"

The boy's eyes were fixed upon the back of the foremost cart or waggon. He pointed, but he did not speak. Underneath the lowest plank could be seen, extended, working and moving with energy, if not with fury, the furred claws of a beast of prey. The boy did not move: when again the thunder-sound rose on high. A little boy, clinging to his mother's arm, crying in terror, asked what it meant.

"Hist, Caius, hist! 'Tis the great Numidian lions who have come to kill the Christians;" and the little child trembled.

"Mother, I am not a Christian, am I?" said he.

"No, no, Caius! Hark! the lions roar again!"

And through the streets, and out to the distant hills, and up Aventine, and towards the calm, quiet, bright sky of Italy, rose the sound of the deep eternal roar of the now hungry beast of prey.

"And why—why have they been brought?" said a woman passing near at that moment.

A young man walking by her side answered, in a tone audible enough for the lady to hear, "Did you not know that one hundred and thirty Christians, now working in the mines, are by the order of the Emperor to be devoured by lions three days hence in the Flavian amphitheatre before the people of Rome? They are to be torn to pieces; and well do they deserve it, and far worse tortures still, if they could be invented, for they have insulted the gods, and strove to bring down a curse upon our glorious city. But, thanks to the gods, they will be torn by the lions, and suffer the torments they deserve. Those are the lions just brought from Numidia, and they are to be kept foodless and hungry until the day of the slaughter. Hark how grand and deep that roar is, as the waggons depart in the distance!"

And the man had told his tale—told it into the ear of the woman to whom he spoke—told it to the Roman lady, who listened to every word he said—told it (though unneeded) to the boy, who stood by his mother's side, with his eyes eagerly looking after the departing multitude. At length he looked up, and fixing his dark eye upon his mother's face, while he held closely her arm in his hand, he said again—

"My mother, oh, I am not a coward!"

The lady, when she lay down to rest that night, had many thoughts. She knew well what her child meant. "No coward." No; that she knew. But she anticipated more. She prayed—deeply, earnestly, patiently. "Lord and God, Jesus the King of martyrs!—my child—my only child is Thine, and only Thine." Silent were the next few minutes, and deep the "Amen" with which she then concluded her prayer. She lay down, but she slept not.

In another chamber, within sound of the plash of the fountain in the atrium, lay another occupant of that Roman home. His arm was lying thrown over his forehead, his dark hair outspread over his pillow, the sweet yellow light of the southern moon shining on his Italian face, his dark lashes fringing his sleeping eye. Pancratius had sunk into sleep, the thought of the lions and the martyrs in his mind, and the name of Jesus lingering on his now quiet lip.

It was night when the boy arose. The lady still slept. Pancratius went into the street. It was bright moonlight.

His white dress girt with its belt, his head uncovered, his sandalled feet upon the pavement of the great city, he was seen and noticed by no one. He went alone.

Sebastian the Prefect lived by himself. He was young; twenty-two years only had passed over his head; but he was brave, gallant, and devoted to his great work. It was to his house that Pancratius directed his steps. He knocked at the closed door.

"My master sleeps," was the answer.

"I must speak to him. Tell him that Pancratius would speak with him."

The old man grumbled, but he went, and he returned. The boy entered the room of Sebastian the Prefect; a lamp stood upon the table and shed its light upon his open countenance, and on the paper on which he was writing. He looked up at the opening of the door.

"Pancratius!" said he; "what now?"

The boy stood a moment before the Prefect.

"Sebastian," said he, "I want an order to go down to the mines where the Christians are at work."

"You!" said Sebastian. "No, Pancratius, not so hastily; you cannot have the order now."

"Sebastian," said the boy, "I must. You know what I mean. Nay, nay, do not refuse me."

"But consider; it is death to go there. You will be numbered amongst the condemned."

"Oh, Sebastian," said the youth, falling upon his knee, "let me go; they are thirsty, and friendless, and weary. Did not He say, 'I was thirsty and ye gave me drink?' And why may not I go and gain that precious promise?"

The young man looked with astonishment at the glowing face of the boy—his eye so full of the fire of enthusiasm, his whole breast heaving with eager longing.

"Wonderful!" said Sebastian to himself, "what has not the grace of God done for you!"

The Prefect drew out his waxen tablets, and wrote the order. Pancratius pressed his hand to his grateful lips. He stood one moment, with his eyes fixed upon his friend. "One pang," cried he, "one crushing weight of the cross, and then—life and joy for evermore." He threw himself on the bosom of Sebastian, and was gone.

The moon was still shining in clear silver beauty over the buildings and streets of Rome. Pancratius went swiftly on. The pits to which he was directing his steps were a little way outside the city. He reached the gate. The pass of Sebastian was enough, and he found no difficulty. He came to the mouth of the dark and dreary scene of suffering and captivity. Two soldiers guarded the entrance.

"What is your will?" asked they.

"I would go down into the mine, where the Christians are."

He held closely to him the little basket in which he had provided fruit and food for the martyrs. The men laughed.

"A precious berth of it you would find down there, young man; and fool, indeed, you must be to wish to go. But you cannot—no one is allowed to enter the pit."

"I hold a pass from Sebastian the Prefect," said he; "that will be sufficient." And he showed the order.

The two guards looked at it in amazement, and then in equal amazement on Pancratius.

"Young man," said they, "you do not know what you are going down to in those mines. Be wise, and go home."

"Here is the order of the Prefect," said the youth. "I must go."

The two soldiers again looked at the boy. They saw by the fringe on his dress that he was of more than ordinary birth.

"You will go?" said they.

"Yes," was the answer.

"Then here is the way," and they opened the trap-door which led down into the dungeon (for we can call it nothing else), and Pancratius was ready. A rope-ladder was all the means he had for descent. Below was utter darkness, while above was the sweet light of the moon. But Pancratius was determined. He placed his feet firmly upon the first step of the ladder, and he began to descend. He soon found that he had reached the end of the ladder. Below was an awful depth and darkness—but his mind was made up. He dropped from the last step, and he fell into the deep mud of the pit. As soon as he had recovered himself, he looked round—if look he could. He heard sounds in the distance, like the noise of an axe upon the rock; and presently he saw the slight, faint glimmering of a lamp, though far away. The sound of the axe was enough for the youth. He approached the spot. No words can describe the horrible condition of this filthy abode. It seemed as if all the ingenuity of Satan had been exercised to shake the constancy of the elect, and to torture those whose souls were anticipating the glory of the saints in light. Satan and their bitter heathen foes knew full well how firmly their feet were planted on the Rock of Ages. The sounds and scene around him had no effect upon the young Roman, except to make him lift up his heart in earnest prayer to God—praying that he might so live as to be a worthy companion of these His suffering people. The blows of the axe directed him towards a spot where the figure of an old man could be seen applying his strokes to the side of the cavern. The eyes of the youth had at length become accustomed to the dim light. The labourer was bowed down, not only by age, but by heavy chains which clanked upon his limbs. He paused as if exhausted. Pancratius heard him say in a low voice—

"'Take up thy cross and follow me.' Yes, my Lord, here I am; I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest."

"Can I help you with that axe," said the youth, "and share in your toil, for which my young limbs are more suited than yours?"

"Young man," said the aged pilgrim, "you are kind, very kind; but you know not what you say. I am a Nazarene, a follower of Jesus of Nazareth. It would be torture and death to you were you found aiding or sharing my labour."

"Good father," said the boy, as he fell on his knees before the aged prisoner, in whom he now recognised the old chief minister of the Roman Church—Quintus his name—"Good father, I too am a Christian. Bless me, and own me as belonging to the little flock. I am Pancratius, the child of the Lady Lucina, and of him who fell beneath the axe for the name of Jesus—Caius the martyr. It is long since I was baptised, although my mother has ever bid me not press forward the fact of my profession, but rather leave it to the moment when my Lord should see fit to require my confession."

"His almighty grace be praised!" cried the old man, striving to join and lift up his chained hands in prayer and praise. "And you then also, child of a noble father, are numbered amongst the followers of the Lamb. May He strengthen and bless you."

Pancratius rose. He took from his basket some bunches of grapes, and placing them against the parched lips of the old man, gave him that refreshment which he so much needed.

"God bless you!" said he. "They are refreshing indeed."

Pancratius seized the axe and went on with the old man's work.

"Stay, stay!" cried he; "let me go on. It matters not what befalls this worn-out frame, which He made, and which shall be given to his work and glory; but your young limbs may yet serve Him in his vineyard, for you may still be the means of bringing in more sheep to his fold. And, hark! he comes—the overlooker of the Christians in these pits. I hear the lash, and the flash of the torches is lighting up the dim distance. Oh! go, go, happy boy; return to your mother, and leave me to bear what my Lord will lay upon me. They come quickly nearer: go and leave me."

"Never!" said Pancratius—"never! Here I will stay by you, come what will."

"But," said the old man, "you said but now what was right and true, that till you were called, in these days of struggle and sorrow in the Church, you should wait your appointed work."

"I will not leave you," said the other, resolutely.

And scarcely had he said it when the sound of voices broke close upon their ears, and the glare of the torches burst suddenly upon them from behind the next point of the rocky wall.

"And who is this?" shouted the infuriated voice of the leader of the band. "Who is this, who dares to take the axe from the vile Nazarene? Bring him to me."

Pancratius was seized and brought before the captain.

"A Roman boy!" shouted the captain on seeing him; "and by his dress and appearance noble also. Who and what are you?—who dared to admit you here?"

The men had now eagerly gathered round the youth, while the aged Christian leant his head upon the rock and prayed.

"I am a Roman," said Pancratius, standing forward; "my name Pancratius; my father was Caius the soldier and the martyr, and—I am a Christian."

If a thunderbolt had fallen at his feet, the jailer could not have started back with more profound astonishment.

"Insolent boy! and you dare to proclaim that fact openly and defiantly to me! Still your position compels consideration. How came you here? By what authority or power?"

"By that of the Prefect, Sebastian," said he, producing his pass.

The captain examined it in extreme surprise. "Young man," said he, "be advised. I would not harm you. I remember the father you speak of well, and bravely did he fight in the wars of the Emperor. Give up this accursed sect: I can promise you the pardon of the Emperor, and advancement in his army. Your young limbs were never moulded to be torn in pieces by the Numidian lion, nor devoted to the cause of the accursed Nazarene. Be persuaded, and yield."

"Never," said Pancratius; "never, if He will give me grace to suffer and to die." And the eye and countenance of the boy glowed with youthful fire and determination. There was a deep stillness throughout the cave, save where the sounds of the instruments of toil broke it. The face and eyes of the captain worked with fury.

"The lash! prepare the lash!" cried he, "and bare the shoulders of yon presumptuous youth."

Pancratius was calm: he lifted his eyes, and his lips moved in prayer. The old man's eyes were on him. The men unfastened the collar of his dress, and his youthful shoulders lay bare and uncovered before the uplifted lash.

"Yield!" cried the angry captain. "Yield to reason, or the lash will immediately descend."

The boy did not move, and the whip fell upon his shoulder. The result was the rising of a blue mark upon his back. Pancratius turned pale: he shuddered. It was the effect of exquisite pain.

There was another cry of "Yield!"

"Never!" said the youth; "never! Eternity is too long,—the mansions prepared are too happy"

And again the lash descended. The bruise burst open under the second application of the lash. The blood streamed down, and fell upon his white dress. At the second blow he was calm, unmoved, and quiet. Again and again the lash descended upon the youth, until the dress of the noble Roman was saturated with blood. But he uttered no cry or word. His mind was on the sufferings of Jesus; his stay was the Cross.

"Enough!" said the captain of the guard. "Send him up to the entrance. He must go to the Emperor. He is nobly born, and he must be judged by the highest of all judges."

They replaced his dress upon the bleeding shoulders of Pancratius. There was a sign of pain caused by the pressure of the dress upon his wounded body. As he turned to go under the guidance of the soldiers, he again bent his knee before the aged Christian.

"May He bless you, my child," said he; and almost before the words had died away, the young Roman was carried off.

They reached the opening to the cavern, by the help of the ladder of ropes. When they reached it, the moon was still shining, but the morning had broken over the east so brightly, that her radiance had become quite faint. The boy and his captors stood outside the opening of the pit. He was now pale with loss of blood, and exhausted with pain. A youth was standing near. It was Fulvius.

"Are you here?" said his enemy.

"Yes," said Pancratius. "Fulvius, place your hand in mine."

"Never," was the answer.

The boy still held out his own chained ones, and said, "I go to my death, to my glorious, happy death; and there, by the grace of God, I will show that I am no coward, Fulvius. But let us not part as enemies: freely I forgive you all the ill you have done to me, and, oh! forgive me wherein I have ever injured you. Unbind these hands but for a moment, that I may bid farewell to this youth," said Pancratius, turning to the soldier.

"Unbind him not," cried the other, growing pale; "he only wishes to strike me; I know him of old."

The soldier laughed, and the young martyr was led away.

Fulvius watched him, scowling. "Go, thou fool! no longer shalt thou have power to taunt me. Not even thy high birth shall save thee. I knew thee long ago, and discovered that thou wert a detested Christian." And the youth laughed aloud, and followed at some distance the receding party.

Marks of blood, which fell from the still bleeding figure of Pancratius, spotted the way. With his hands bound before him, and urged on by the brutal taunts and insults of his companions, he kept his thoughts fixed upon his suffering Lord—his patience, his meekness, and the acts of his Passion; while his eyes were fastened on the still rising dawn of the glorious Roman morning—type to the martyr of the gradual rising of that morning which has no night. Happy boy! The world with all its objects was fast breaking up and passing away from him—mother, home, earthly rank and titles, all receding, like the shadows of night from the buildings of the imperial city, and the boundless, unfathomed calm of heaven alone lying before him. Pain and sorrow, the lion, the amphitheatre, all were as nothing. "Oh death, where is thy sting? oh grave, where is thy victory?"

They led him before the Emperor.

He was already awake. He was angry and vexed; nay, more than that, indignant that the accursed sect should disturb his rest, and cause him anxiety even on his midnight throne. More than a hundred were to be thrown to the lions in two days, and that day would be a high day and a holiday at Rome. But the Emperor was disturbed about the new sect, lest they might unsettle the peace of his empire. It was when his mind was in this state that Pancratius was brought before him.

He sat uneasy and restless on his couch. His large unwieldy form, his bloated face, told at once his history. With an anxious mind he met the disturbers of his short and hurried sleep. But he was ready; Pancratius stood before him. The statement was simple, the charge clear. The bound boy was a Christian. By his dress he was nobly born; by his appearance he evidently was possessed of all the intelligence which a Roman youth should possess. The brief introduction told the Emperor that another Christian was now added to the hated, if not dreaded sect. But the Emperor was arrested by the appearance and condition of the youth. After his first violence he strove to retain him as a member of his own bodyguard.

"The son of a noble Roman," said he, "having yourself the appearance of a young noble, why give yourself up to the accursed sect? why throw yourself to the lions? You shall be taken into the most honourable corps in Rome, and near my own person. Child of a noble Roman, give up your folly, and receive the offer of the Emperor."

"Never," said Pancratius, "never, sire. As emperor I honour you, as my father did. But never can I accept your offer. Never can I renounce my profession."

The youth stood boldly forward. His manner showed the bearing of one worthy of his country and race. The scene was terrible, but short. The Emperor was enraged beyond control, and Pancratius was consigned to the pit in which the Christians were confined. He did not see his mother nor his home. He was going to One who was more than brother, or sister, or mother, and to a home "not built with hands, eternal in the heavens."

And the lady sat alone. No distaff was worked by her hands. The fountain murmured close to her. The brilliant entablatures shone on the walls. But she sat alone. It was not that she waited for her child. She had heard, she knew where he was. Her face was pale, her hands were folded, but in prayer; not only prayer—in gratitude and thanksgiving. She knew that she was alone, yet not alone, for God was with her—He who had taken to Himself by the most glorious of all pathways her husband, and was now about to conduct over the same pathway her own, her one beloved child. His chamber was silent, his couch was desolate, his voice sounded no more in his home, or round the fountain's side. But she was calm—at rest. No more would she hear that dear voice, no more see the well-formed figure of the Roman boy whom she called her child, her only child, coming down the street, or crossing her threshold. Yet there was a world, a home, where they would meet, and where the mother would see the martyr's crown and palm-branch borne by her one and only child before the throne of Jesus the King of saints, and God the Lord of All.

It was a glorious Roman morning; the sun had risen with all its lustre and power; and Rome was early awake and active. It was a great and special Roman holiday; the streets which led to the Flavian amphitheatre were thronged with advancing multitudes; more than a hundred Christians were to be devoured by the lions on that day.

A woman in the midst of the vast crowd was fainting under the pressure of the great multitude. She held by her hand her little boy. But even their Italian blood could not endure the terrible heat and pressure; the child cried out with pain; a tall soldier raised him on his shoulder.

"We have come to see the Christians die," said she; "but the child cannot get through the crowd."

"Oh, mother, it is hot, so dreadful!" cried the child.

But he was nevertheless carried on, and they reached the gates of the theatre. It was crowded, but with some difficulty they gained a place.

The interior was laid out with sand, clean and pure. The enormous multitude rose tier on tier in sight of the new-comers; there was but one place vacant—that left for the Emperor and his company.

"Oh, mother, look! see what is coming! music, music, mother!"

And there was music.

"What is it?" said the child.

"It is the Emperor coming," said the soldier; "he is close by."

And the Emperor came with his long train of horses, which to the eye of the child appeared beautiful.

He took his place on the throne of the amphitheatre. Loud was the cry as he entered the circus; but the multitude who had gathered there were eager for the coming spectacle—the death of the Christians.

There was a roar, as of lions or wild beasts. The child trembled. "What is that?" cried he.

"It is the lions, it is the lions," was the answer. "The lions who are to kill the Christians."

"Oh! mother, mother—it is the lions! I will never be a Christian; never, never!" and the child hid his face on his mother's shoulder. They had reached the highest step of the stair.

Again the multitude in the street opened, again a wide space was made. "Mother, mother, what is this? Oh, listen!" Through the vast, unnumbered multitude, through the long ways of Rome, through the lane now opened by the vast multitude, came the Christians. "Oh! hark, mother—hark, it is music." It was a sweet song, which rose upon the soft Italian air. Higher and higher, softer and softer it rose; so sweet and pure that even the amphitheatre was more quiet, and scarcely one of the multitude drew breath. The long line came on. In front was an old man, who leant upon the arm of a little girl. She may have been twelve years old. He had numbered more than threescore years and ten, if you might judge by his long grey hair, and his wrinkled face. Behind these two came the long train; two by two, "young men and maidens, old men and children." "But see, see!—they have flowers on their heads," said the little child. And they had. As they came they sang hymns so beautiful that the deep silent air of the street gave clear tone to their voice, and the very amphitheatre echoed the accents. "Hark, oh mother! hark, what music! Is it the Christians?" But before the answer was given, the procession had passed on to the sand.

The iron bars of the cages were lifted up. The wild beasts were hungry, and they waited for their food. The fresh golden gravel of the amphitheatre was disturbed by the tread of men, women, and children.

"How many are there?" said the woman.

"One hundred and thirty," answered the soldier.

"But I counted more—one hundred and thirty-one," said she.

"There were one hundred and thirty in the pits for to-day's holiday,—that I know, for I was on guard many an hour. You are wrong."

"Nay, I am not," said she; "there is one more."

But the Christians were already on the sand. The lions had fastened their claws in hunger round the bars of their cages, while round the pole raised in the centre the band of Christians gathered.

Beautiful, most beautiful, did their hymn of praise and glory rise amid the deep silence. Every eye was lifted up towards the clear blue sky, which to them appeared as the pavement of the glorious home to which they were so soon going.

And then the lions roared with greater fury. And then the iron bars were lifted up. And then, on "young men and maidens, old men and children," burst the beasts of the Numidian desert. One tremendous roar, one sweet rising of the hymn of praise, one more breathless moment from the vast multitude, and then the cages were broken, and the birds were free.

But there were but one hundred and thirty there. For the last of that procession, he who made up the one hundred and thirty-one, was stopped at the gate. It was Pancratius.

He was stopped by a soldier sent directly from the Emperor.

"Not go in, and not be admitted to the arena where the martyr gains his crown, and wins his palm! Oh let me, let me go!"

But it was in vain. All entered, all went forward to win their reward of everlasting glory, except the boy, who was compelled to stay outside. Down his cheeks ran the tears of real sorrow.

"And may I not go with them?" cried he. "Oh let me, let me go!"

"The Emperor forbids it," was the answer.

And at that moment a message from the Emperor reached the youth. It was to the old effect. The Emperor would place so bold, so fine a youth, born of such parentage, next his own person; he should be a member of his body-guard; he should be, ere long, Prefect. It would be folly to die with the accursed Christians.

The youth stayed at the gate.

"Let me go," said he; "I have a place, if of his infinite mercy He will give it me, by the King of kings. I cannot, will not, linger here. Oh let me go!"

His words were carried to the Emperor, and the doom of Pancratius was pronounced.

"Carry the boy to death, and instantly."

Pancratius stood as yet at the gate, anxious, eager, but doubting. Crowds were round him, crowds were close to him, many eyes were fixed upon him, and if not all, it was because so many eyes were fastened upon the calm and motionless bodies of the martyrs. Pancratius stood calmly, but now full of hope. The last chance of earth had been offered, the great certainty of eternity had been gained.

As he stood at the gate a voice, full of scorn and bitterness, said in his ear—

"You fool, you coward, you more than brute, now at least you will die, and I shall be here to see you die. May every curse be on you!"

"Fulvius!" said the boy; "and even now! But oh, Fulvius, I am no coward!"

His antagonist had slunk away, and Pancratius still stood alone.

But again there was some one near the martyr boy. A hand was laid gently on his shoulder. Pancratius started. There was a look of distress in his face, as if he was vexed at interruption, and longed for his martyr's crown. But as he turned, his eye fell upon Sebastian. The look of the Prefect, full of love as it was,—full, oh! how full, of unuttered affection—nevertheless reminded the boy of a former conversation with him, the point of which was that even martyrdom must be met calmly and humbly, not eagerly. The boy's eye fell upon the sand of the amphitheatre, humbled by the look of Sebastian.

Again he turned, for another hand touched his shoulder. It was his mother.

"My child, my boy! my own, my noble boy! I only came to see you go to heaven. Go quickly on to yonder home of blessed martyrdom. I will pray—will try to follow you; and I will be standing here at this gate at the moment when you go. Go! yes, and be joined for ever and for ever with the glorious company who are safe—safe to all eternity. Go, my child, they wait for you. Look at me at the last moment on earth! and may the King of martyrs receive you presently."

There was no more time. The boy was summoned, and the lash had been already applied to his shoulder—and he went. He stood alone. The eyes of thirty-five thousand people gazed upon him, the eyes of the now infuriated Emperor—all eyes were upon him! Around him lay the now empty cages of those immortal beings who, like the freed eagle, had already ascended to, and gazed at, the sun—the "Sun of Righteousness." There Pancratius stood—his hands were joined, his eyes uplifted to the pavement of the Home above. One more cage was opened. A single tiger sprang on to the golden gravel of the arena of the Flavian amphitheatre—one tiger and one boy.

Every eye was fixed—every bosom breathless. The tiger wandered over the sand, and gradually approached the boy, but seemed not to see him. Pancratius sang, though alone, his song of praise. Now the beast of the jungle discovered him: it drew closer and closer to him, in narrowing, still more narrowing circles. Pancratius did not "look down, but up." He was calm and still. Another moment, and the tiger had sprung upon the bosom of the boy. One claw was fastened instantaneously into his shoulder; the other claw was under the other arm; the hind legs drawn upon the young martyr's body; the teeth were fastened in his neck.

There was one look over the body of the beast of prey, and that was fixed upon his mother. Her look met his. He fell upon the now bloody sand.

Yes! that cage was also empty, and that bird was free.

And above, far away beyond the clear bright blue of the Roman sky—far away beyond sun, and moon, and stars, a hymn, a glorious hymn, had been long singing, long raised to the glory of the Lamb. But to-day that hymn grew louder and louder, for "young men and maidens, old men and children," the aged minister of the early Roman Church, and Pancratius, her young martyr, had gone to swell the everlasting hymn of joy and gratitude, and to deepen by their presence the song of angels, who "rejoice" over every soul which is brought to the presence of Jesus, to reign with Him for ever and ever.

EDWARD MONRO.

THE CASTING OF JONAH INTO THE SEA.

IN all that is recorded of the Prophet Jonah, nothing appears to us so exalted as the combination of godly meekness and godly boldness with which he faces and accepts the tremendous punishment of his transgression. And it is questionable whether a crew of his own highly-favoured countrymen would have enacted a worthier part towards him than that which was adopted and carried out with so much propriety and dignity by the heathen sailors. Truly Jonah had even more good reason than Paul to use the language, "The barbarian people showed me no small kindness;" while they, on the other hand, as they were about to consign him to a doom which turned out to be a period of "three days and three nights in the whale's belly," might not unjustly say of the Prophet what the Centurion said of Jonah's Antitype when about to be committed for three days and three nights to the heart of the earth—"Surely this was a righteous man."

Altogether, there is in this scene, on all hands, an amount of deference and veneration rendered to justice,—to severe but pure and perfect righteousness,—that cannot fail to render it very impressive to every right-minded reader of the passage. There is a calm, judicial dignity exhibited by all the parties which speaks well for their character and bearing in a crisis so fitted to alarm and to unman them. And it forms a striking proof of the fact that it is righteousness alone that will bear men through the most fiery trials. Amiability, kindliness, capability of gentler and refined emotion, may grace and adorn the man; but it is righteousness, the love of truth and justice, which forms the foundation and the solid pillars of his character. In the hour of peace, and of gentle, undisturbed serenity, the amiable may be more acceptable than the sternly just. Nevertheless, while it is true that "scarcely for a righteous man would one die, peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die," yet in critical hours of destiny it is righteousness that towers aloft above the storm, and,—somewhat even like unto God himself,—is "mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea."

I.

The righteous procedure of the sailors in consulting with Jonah himself concerning the steps that were now rendered necessary, is the first thing that strikes us. Something must be done—and they put the matter to the Prophet. "Then said they unto him, What shall we do unto thee, that the sea may be calm unto us? for the sea wrought, and was tempestuous." The storm ceaseth not; the ship can hold out no longer; the cause of the storm has been revealed; for God hath disclosed it by the lot, and Jonah confessed it from his own conscience. And now that the cause is known, what shall be done for removing it? Evidently something must be done, if they are not all prepared to perish together. And they consult Jonah himself.

It says much for them that they do. He had been something more, and something worse, than a thorn in their side. And they might have been expected, as heathen men, to have had little scruple in taking brief-handed measures, and making short work with the troublesome stranger. For a perfect stranger he was to them. No ties of friendship, or acquaintance, or kin, or country could he plead; and the subject of a strange but strong God, bringing down his God's wrath on them—verily, they had little to thank him for! And why make any difficulty in getting rid of him?

God has imbued his creatures on earth with a natural and profound horror of shedding one another's blood. Nor is this confined to those who are in possession of the Scriptures, those holy writings in which God said—at the very constitution of the world and of society, on re-arranging that constitution after it had been obliterated by the flood—"Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." It is a feeling that has gone down all time with all the families of Noah, and that, whether the covenant with Noah,—whether the Scripture, or that special command in it,—has gone down to them or not. However much hardening through indulgence in sin may sear the conscience, and go far, apparently, to obliterate this horror at the guilt of murder, it is more proper to say that such searing and hardening rather overpowers than obliterates it. For it abideth still, and it affords one of a multitude of harmonies between the religion of the natural conscience of man and the religion of the revealed will of God. For,—whatever may be said by some who would seem to seek a character for good feeling higher than God himself,—as it is apart from and prior to the Bible, or any precept there, that man instinctively abhors the sin of murder; so, it was prior to any particular dispensation—any Mosaic economy, for instance, or Jewish theocracy,—and as applied to all lands and all times, that God, in starting the world anew in the ark-saved family of the patriarch, gave forth the unrepealed command, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." Nor should it be forgotten, as sufficient for ever to silence the advocates for the abolition of capital punishment, that God has not only given an unrepealed command which He might have been pleased to rest on his own authority and will alone, but he has condescended to give the ground and reason of it; and so long as both the command remains unrepealed and the reason remains a fact, so long is the proposed abolition of capital punishment a daring insult against the Most High. God hath given us the reason why the shedding of man's blood must be avenged by the murderer's death—"for in the image of God made He man." And until this truth becomes untrue, that is, until man cease to be a free, intelligent, responsible being,—fallen, indeed, and in a vast multitude of cases, alas! unrenewed, yet still responsible, intelligent, and free,—capital punishment, both by God's commanding will and by God's assigned reason, is the murderer's doom. And nature and reason sanction the sentence.

It was nature and reason, working in this very direction, that induced these sailors to pause ere they rid themselves of the source of their danger by casting their fellow-man to the waves.

But there was something more than this, doubtless, at the bottom of their judicious and righteous deliberation. They might be irritated by the rebellious subject of a strange God bringing all the anger of his God upon them in this fashion; but, behold, how great this new and strange God is! Evidently he is a strong God. May he not be the true God?—the one living and true God? Let them therefore pause and weigh well their doings, while evidently the Prophet's God is near.

For have they ever found such a God among their own gods? Have they ever found a God who sitteth above the floods, and ruleth in the raging of the sea, and telleth by lot with whom he is displeased, and followeth up his displeasure with quick and quickening tempest? Is it not a new experience to them? That this great God is near unto them, his marvellous works are emphatically declaring. They feel this. They will stand in awe and sin not. They will do nothing rashly to provoke his anger against themselves. They will rather consult his Prophet.

For, disobedient though he may be, Jonah, they perceive, is His prophet, and His servant still. Revering his God, they respect him. They feel that it is a solemn thing to have to do with anything that this God marks as his own—marks as his own even by his displeasure. Hence they pause. "With the well-advised there is wisdom."

For these reasons, then, the mariners put the matter to Jonah himself. If something painful has to be done, they will at least consult with himself. If possible, they will secure his own concurrence. It may be they may receive his own directions.

This generous and handsome style of procedure, how fitted was it to touch a chord in the Prophet's heart, and to make him bitterly regret bringing danger and risk of death on men who could deal so nobly with him! Stimulated to rival the righteous and dignified procedure of those on whom he had brought such impending ruin, and who,—in the very crisis of it, when they have discovered the instrument of that ruin and now have him in their power,—so forbearingly and respectfully abstain from retaliation, revenge, hatred, or haste; under the humbling and rectifying influence on his own mind which this fair and honourable treatment exerts, Jonah feels more inclined than before to emulate their rectitude and do them justice, as they are so disposed to do justice to him.

II.

Jonah's magnanimous proposal in reply next engages our attention. "And he said unto them, Take me up and cast me forth into the sea; so shall the sea be calm unto you: for I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you."

Could anything be more noble, upright, honourable? There is, first, a renewed acknowledgment—frank, free, and full—of his own obnoxiousness to the Divine anger, and of himself as the source and occasion of the present danger: "For I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you." There is, secondly, an unreserved surrender or appointment of himself to death, as the means of solving the appalling difficulty, and stilling the raging of the deep: "Take me up, and cast me forth into the sea." And there is, thirdly, what may be valued as coming from a prophet of that God "which made the sea and the dry land"—there is a prediction that the expedient will be efficacious: "So shall the sea be calm unto you."

In small compass, how complete is Jonah's reply! It meets the case; it meets all the case. Yet it has all the brevity of a sentence of judgment delivered from the bench.

And so, indeed, it is. Under God, and at the mouth of God, Jonah becomes judge in his own case; and he judges even in his own case with all the relentless righteousness which the sternest judge in any case could exhibit. No half measure, no compromise, no delay, no alternative; the one clear, immediate, complete, irrevocable, final doom: "Take me up, and cast me forth into the sea."

Now, try and conceive of the height of true moral grandeur to which Jonah at this moment rises. He is clearly and consciously facing Eternity; and, oh! how very far is he from doing so in the revolting blasphemy of one who can take the infinitely awful movement as one would take a leap on chance and in the dark! No: he "fears God." He has been a regular, habitual fearer of God; and he truly fears God still. He has offended the Most High of late. He has fled from him. He has seen, for some time, little of the light of his countenance. He has tasted little that the Lord is gracious. Nay, rather, the Lord's wrath has waxed hot against him; his hand hath pressed him sore. At this very moment he hath terrible experience of the power wherewith his Almighty God can prosecute an offence against his honour, and bring the offender to punishment. "Deep calleth unto deep, and at the noise of God's waterspouts all his billows go over him," while he flees in disobedience "from the land of Jordan." And yet he will "remember the Lord from the land of Jordan, and of the Hermonites, from the hill Mizar." And he will take no crooked way of dealing with God, or evading his hand and justice. The storm is to him the voice of God, more awful than in the garden and in the cool of the day, crying, "Jonah, where art thou?"—more terrible than the still small voice on Horeb after the strong wind, after the earthquake, after the fire, "What doest thou here, Elijah?"—"What doest thou here, Jonah?" Yet Jonah quails not: he denies not his own guilt. He denies not the Lord's righteousness.

When he entered the ship,—his conscience tumultuating with guilt, his heart throbbing with the hurry of his flight,—worn out with agitation and excitement, and going down like a hunted and harassed one to find rest in "the sides of the ship," how wide the contrast between the storm in his soul and the placid sea on which the happy bark, unconscious of its burden, set sail! Now the sea storms and is tempestuous: but the contrast is as great; for, as the result of repentance and returning duty, Jonah's soul is as placid, meek, and mild as a weaned child—as calmly strong in righteousness as a man rising above all impending evils.

Are you thus upright before the Lord? Are you truly penitent for all sin, for the sin that doth more easily beset you, for the sin which God may be pursuing with his displeasure? Do you own the justice of all his dealings with you? Do you indeed yield the victory to God, according to that oracle, "Yea, let God be true and every man a liar, as it is written, That thou mightest be justified in thy sayings, and mightest overcome when thou art judged?" You can do so only through the intervention of the great atonement and your faith therein. Never can you face all righteousness till you flee to the cross of Jesus. There, He, by whom all things were made, both in heaven and in earth, whether they be thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers, suffered under the hand of divine justice, and satisfied divine justice. That cross is the only school where an immortal, responsible man can face all righteous questions, and solve them, and accept the true solution. Have you been there and settled all your own case with the Judge of the quick and of the dead; settled it on the terms that are so honourable to the character of God, and that must now and ultimately be so remedial to yours? Have you fled for refuge to the hope set before you in the Gospel? Have you the anchor of the soul within the veil, designed and fitted to enable you to ride out the storm? In one word, have you peace with God on the righteous footing of an imputed righteousness, and a perfect reconciliation by sacrifice? Then see that you evermore face what is righteous, and turn to no crooked way, no evasion, no subterfuge, no refuge of lies, no path of compromise or of deceit. Walk humbly, yet walk boldly and firmly, with God. Though He slay you, still trust in Him. Your chiefest trials are designed to teach you this. Your agony of conflict with infirmities is designed to teach you this. The apparent contradiction between providences very sore and promises most sweet is designed to teach you and train you to this. Though the fig-tree shall not blossom, though there be no fruit in the vine, though the labour of the olive fail; though your house be not so with God; though heart and flesh faint and fail; though God himself slay you with his sore displeasure; still it is a faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation that his own Son died for sinners and rejoices to save them, that he that believeth in Him shall never die, nor from such an one shall the covenant of God's peace or the promise of God's presence and protection be removed, world without end. Therefore, in any circumstances, never fear but that the path of duty, though it seem to be the path of anguish, of agony, of darkness, or of death, is yet the way of life, light, and comfort; and however to flesh and blood it may be hard, hold to the motto which men of the world may have devised and may admire, but which men of God alone can rightly go through with, "Let justice be done, though the heavens rush to ruin."

"It is the Lord: let Him do with me as seemeth good in his sight." It is the Lord: the same who hath counted me faithful and put me into the office of his Prophet; the same to whom I have been unfaithful, from whom I have fled, from whom I have deserved so ill. "Righteous art thou, O Lord, yet let me talk with thee of thy judgments." Yea, let me ask from thee faith and courage and strength to bear them. It is the Lord: the Judge of all the earth, and "He will do that which is right." It is the Lord: and if his hand is strong to smite, 'tis also strong to save. Let Him do with me as seemeth good in his sight. Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him. "Take me up and cast me forth into the sea."

III.

This emulation of generous and righteous and extremely handsome action between Jonah and the mariners goes forward yet another stage. The mariners admirably meet the Prophet again. If he responded splendidly to their righteous and dignified deliberation in consulting with himself, or rather in leaving the matter in his own hands, they reciprocate no less beautifully to the meek and subdued spirit of the Prophet when he prescribes his own death as the only means of appeasing the sea.

Touched with kindliest feelings of humanity, and touched with admiration of the mingled solemnity and righteous boldness with which the Prophet can propose the sacrifice of his own life to their safety, the men evidently resolve that only in the last and direst extremity shall they act as he has indicated to them; and that extremity, they rule, has not yet come. Till then they will make every effort. "Nevertheless, the men rowed hard to bring it to the land; but they could not, for the sea wrought and was tempestuous against them."

It was well that it was in their heart. The Lord denied them their desire, but it was well that it was in their heart. It showed their humanity, their solemn fear of shedding innocent blood, their profiting under that fear of God which Providence had been inspiring into their minds; it gave Jonah the opportunity of being still more satisfied that the proposal he had made was the only one that could meet the case; and it brought more clearly to light the solemn fact that God was indeed pursuing this matter to his own appointed issue, and would allow no effort, however well meant, to baffle his purpose. God had righteously destined the Prophet to be cast into the sea—yea, we may say, to suffer death for his offence in fleeing from his duty. For however God interposed at a later stage, and miraculously saved the Prophet's life, it was nevertheless so much an interposition of miraculous goodness and miraculous power, that the preservation of his life was more a resurrection than an escape. For this certainly is one clear inference we may draw from the analogy suggested by our Lord, "As Jonah was three days and three nights in the whale's belly, so shall the Son of Man be three days and three nights in the heart of the earth." Surely it was a resurrection-life that Jonah afterwards possessed as well as the Son of Man. Surely Jonah, like the Son of Man, was appointed unto death. With death then, we say, had God resolved to punish Jonah's sin. And the strength of the Divine purpose is more terribly brought to light when every effort to save Jonah's life comes to nought. "The men rowed hard to bring it to the land, but they could not."

No, they could not. For the counsel of the Lord, it shall stand; and He will do all his pleasure. And the Lord executeth righteous judgment.

Young man! bear this in mind. You may go certain lengths aside from the ways of wisdom, integrity, temperance, truth; and to some extent, and in a certain sense, your friends may interpose and bring you off. Hearts beating somewhat towards you like God's heart—"How shall I give thee up, O Ephraim!"—may be at your service, even in your evil plight. Prayers and intercessions, counsels and rebukes, and kindliest efforts of righteousness and love, may take your feet out of the net, and place you in a somewhat even path again, giving you a fresh start and a new chance for better things. But beware. Embrace it if it is so. Embrace it now, and improve it. Thank God for it, and improve it. Cast yourself on Him—his grace, his word, his Christ, his Spirit, his providence, his fatherly love and righteous will. "As for me, I will serve the Lord." "Depart from me ye evil doers, for I purpose to keep the commandments of God." And let this be vigorous; in lively fear before the Lord; in humble penitence and firm faith of that mercy which is in the heavens; and let it be daily, dutifully, faithfully, manfully followed up.

For, turning aside again, or going certain other lengths, may land you, ere you are aware, in a position from which no one will bring you off. However many more true friends you may have than you deserve, and with whatever zeal and love they lay all oars in the water in your service, it may utterly baffle them to bring you off. For there are laws physical, social, moral, from the effects and influence of which no one can bring you off. Remember that word of the Spirit: "Every man shall bear his own burden." To your own master in the long run you must stand or fall. Bless God that He is able to make you stand. But also, when finally provoked, He is able to seal your doom. And if you so provoke Him, then—as to the interposition and efforts of friends—"the men rowed hard to bring it to the land, but they could not."

IV.

The admirable bearing of all parties in this drama becomes, if possible, still more engaging.

It becomes manifest that Jonah's doom is inevitable, that Jonah's hour is come. "The sea wrought and was tempestuous." And its "tempest," and its "working," and its demand were—for him. Doubtless while the men had betaken themselves to pains, Jonah had secretly been engaged in prayer. But the pains taken by them are useless, for still "the sea works and is tempestuous." And to the prayers of the Prophet every thundering billow, as "the sea works and is tempestuous," gives him back his stern and ominous answer, as if saying for God, as God himself said to Moses, "Speak to me no more of this matter, for thou honouredst me not."

So Jonah's hour is come.

It is a solemn moment. Apart even from some of its most appalling circumstances, it is a solemn moment. The funeral of the dead at sea is solemn. Though the waters around and the heavens above be all serene, it is a trying hour when the remains of the much-loved friend, or of the mere acquaintance, or even of a very stranger, have to be committed to the deep. And hardened indeed must that heart be that can pass unmoved through the hour when, with mournful funeral service, and from the hands of comrades or of crew, the sea receives another to "the dead that are in her." But when we try in imagination to stand on the reeling deck beside this man of God, offending yet honourable and honoured, and see alike the firm resignation, combining meekness and moral majesty, with which the Prophet faces the waves roaring for him as the lion ravening for the prey, and the mournful admiration and regret with which these heathen men look upon their guest,—revealing that high appreciation of his character which, even though known to them only in connection with his offence against God and his occasion of extreme distress to them, they have irresistibly been drawn to entertain,—we are overpowered with the impression that high above the floods sitteth an unseen One who is carrying out a righteous award, and who, while He hath said, "Touch not mine anointed and do my prophets no harm," would appear to have said so, not merely to procure them protection when they are right, but because He will himself, and with His own hand, expressly and severely chastise them when they err. One feels inclined to accept silence as the best expositor of the consummation of this deed, inevitable though deeply undesired. Another such funeral service truly neither the sea nor the dry land ever witnessed until this day. For here are men, not accustomed to call on Jehovah's name, and from whom little, in a sense, could be expected, going through with a duty the most agonising that can ever fall to a creature's hand in a spirit of godly deliberation and, one almost feels constrained to think, a spirit of truly gracious prayerfulness—and following it up with sacrificing and vowing to the Lord, as if they now gave themselves as wholly to his grace as they have given his offending servant to his justice. "Wherefore they cried unto the Lord, and said, We beseech thee, O Lord, we beseech thee, let us not perish for this man's life, and lay not upon us innocent blood: for thou, O Lord, hast done as it pleased thee. So they took up Jonah, and cast him forth into the sea: and the sea ceased from her raging. Then the men feared the Lord exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice unto the Lord, and made vows."

Thus did these men. They awoke to know the living and the true God. They prayed to Him. They appealed to Him. The storm, they clearly saw, was in his hand: a reason for it, they saw, was in his heart. And that reason they saw as clearly as they saw the storm. His hand, they saw, was almighty. His heart, they saw, was righteous. In brief time, they learned not a little of the living and the true God. They fel this anger. They even became executioners of his wrath. They emphatically justify their deed as being constrained to become executioners of the wrath of the living God. It is a solemn initiation into the knowledge of his name.

And now their guest, their passenger, is gone. The sea has closed over him; and the sea has "ceased from her raging." Yes, if they doubted that a Living One was moving the storm by the power of his hand and according to the purpose of his heart, they can now, at least, doubt no more. The sudden appeasing of the tempest tells its own tale. They fear God in the calm "exceedingly"—more than in the tempest. And now, under no stress of weather, under no strain of terror, they vow, not an extorted, mercenary vow, but a free and voluntary dedication of themselves to the Lord. One would fain say these men were converted to the God of Israel. One would fain hope they lived and died in his fear and in his favour.

* * * * * * *

It is a calm. The clouds have parted. The waves are hushed. The heavens are beautiful and blue. Onward the strange vessel flits, beating her quiet tack, unconscious of her matchless story, but her crew aware that a prophet of the Lord has been among them!

And thus died Jonah. To them, at least, thus died Jonah; the death of a criminal pursued by justice; yet the death of a repentant and righteous man, triumphing in death, and over death; committing himself in singular meekness and faith, acknowledging the justice of his doom, and relying on the pardon and protection of his God, committing his body to the sea and his soul to the God whom he feared, the God of heaven, and of the sea, and of the dry land. Thus died Jonah.

So the story reads. And—save for the inspiring Spirit of God continuing his revelations—so the story would end. To all this the mariners could bear witness; and here their witness-bearing, their story would end. And in this there is a precious lesson, a great general fact.

In God's people and his prophets, their offence and their chastisement may be capable of being reported, the knowledge of them common property: for, their offence and their chastisement may be upon the surface, and upon the surface there may be nothing more. But the story may not end thus. There may be deliverance, forgiveness, marvels of grace and prayer and love and joy and communion with God, beneath the surface or behind the scenes. Beneath the surface and behind the scenes, there may be such salvation as the world shall never know.

Thus died Jonah;—so these mariners, on reaching land, and rehearsing the story, would say as they brought the marvellous narrative to a close. Literally, beneath the surface, God carried on the marvellous story more marvellously still; bringing in his own unique, peculiar work of—life in the midst of death; his ever glorious work of justice satisfied by being executed, and grace reigning through righteousness unto life from the dead. "Now the Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah."

Oh, fear the Lord at all times. There is no want to them that fear Him. Accept no deliverance at the expense of righteousness or truth or duty. There is a better deliverance for you. On, therefore; on, rather; fronting the righteousness, facing your duty, trusting your God. Is anything too hard for Him? and is not his faithfulness in the very heavens? Not his dark dispensations, but his clear and ever bright word of covenant grace and truth, is the ground and warrant of your faith. And, therefore, though He slay you, you may trust in Him still.

In his hand, a raging storm, relentless, waiting for you! On his face, a frown of deep displeasure for your offence! Could your case well be worse? Thus much upon the surface. Thus, to sense and reason.

But to faith—what? Beneath the surface, while

He held the storm in his left hand, with his right hand "the Lord HAD prepared a deliverance." And behind the frown, in the depths of the Lord's heart — what? Protecting, redeeming, life-giving love.

Oh love the Lord, all ye his saints, for the Lord preserveth the faithful. Be of good courage, and He shall strengthen your heart, all ye that hope in the Lord. For Righteousness and Peace have kissed each other.

HUGH MARTIN.

A CHURCHYARD IN SPRING.

THE purple fells against the sky shut out the misty East,
Where winds the stream beneath the hill, the stately oxen feast;
The bashful flowers are peeping out into the glittering air,
The tender grass is shooting fast for baby hands to tear.

Yet while the rapture of the Spring bids all the Earth rejoice,
The Autumn leaves that linger still, whisper with solemn voice;
The path, on which the sunlight falls, hath felt the mourner's tread.
Around, beneath, where'er we turn, repose the silent dead.

Here by a little infant's head the daffodil is growing,
Over her mother's grave, hard by, the soft west wind is blowing.
I do not grudge the birds their song, the lambs their gambols wild,
But can they fill a home again, or bring us back a child?

No: for they sleep the blessed sleep, which only He can break,
Who, when He comes, shall all his joy with his elect partake.
The Winter then will quite be past, the world shall have its Spring,
When in the Easter of her life the Risen Church shall sing.

Oh, who, that knows what Christ hath been, or thinks what Christ can be,
Would dare to summon back his dead, this Earth once more to see!
Rich as we were, when human love we daily learned to prize,
The love of God is sweeter still, the Saviour never dies.

And if for us our blessed hoard of holy joy is grown,
If Faith can sometimes rise to say—With God I'm not alone;
If loss to us, who lose, is gain, when to our Lord we cling,
If in the night our wondering lips with sudden joy can sing,—

For those who stand before his face, and see his glory there,
And walk in white, and on their brow the name of Jesus wear;
How can we mourn, who we ourselves desire on Christ to gaze?
How shall we mingle sighs of ours with their exulting praise?

Leave them with Him, who loves us all with tender love and true,
Trust them with Him, who did for them what you could never do.
Their death is died, their tears are shed, empty their cup of pain;
No trouble now can vex their heart, no sin their garments stain.

Soon, soon, to us our Lord will send; but first our work be done,
Our battle fought, our victory sure, our course in patience run.
Others will then be mourning us, as we are mourning now,
And while they put us in our shroud, a crown will press our brow!

Be cheerful, for the time is short. Watch, for the night is long.
To finish well the given task our Lord will make us strong.
This be the thought to nerve our hearts, till in our home we stand—
"I wish to be a pilgrim, bound for Emmanuel's land."

THE ARK OF NOAH.

A VISION OF THE PAST.

Once upon a night I dreamt, and in my dream it was to me as if a man with a sublime, heavenly expression on his countenance, approached me and said :—

"Follow me, and I will show you things that have happened, that you may know the wisdom of God, and the folly of man, and the power of grace."

And I rose in my dream and followed him, and he took me by the hand and conveyed me through the air with the speed of light, till we alighted at a beautiful spot, surrounded by high mountains. And I saw a vast forest of gigantic cypress trees, at the entrance to which a large area was cut out, where a great number of people were engaged in building a ship. A crowd of curious onlookers was assembled, men and women, and children. Some of the men were giants of a monstrous size, and of such ferocious appearance, that I was frightened at them. They often shook their huge fists in a threatening way at the builders, and roared scornfully at them with such powerful voices, that it was as if the forest echoed with peals of thunder. And the other onlookers also laughed and mocked, and made themselves merry at the expense of the industrious labourers, who peacefully continued building the immense vessel, that seemed to grow under their busy hands.

While I was looking at this scene with amazement, my guide said to me :

"My name is Chizoniël. I am the angel of the visions which God shows to men to teach them wisdom. The venerable, grey-headed man whom you see superintending the work is Noah, the beloved servant of God. Near him you will notice two noble-looking young men, who assist him in his arduous task. They are his two eldest sons, Shem and Japhet. Another young man, whose face bears a strong expression of sensuality, you will observe sitting on the trunk of a fallen tree, axe in hand, but wasting his time in merry gossip with the gay people that mock at his father's work. He is Noah's youngest son, Ham. The weather, you observe, is most beautiful. The sky is as clear as crystal, and the sun shines with uninterrupted brightness upon the luxuriant landscape. At a short distance a little rivulet purls along and winds like a silvery serpent through the verdure of the meadows. It is the Ormon, a tributary to the Pison ; for we are in the charming land of Havilah. Now let us approach the crowd, and listen to what they are saying. Do not be afraid, for we are both of us invisible to them, nor are they able to hear anything of what we are saying to each other."

Accordingly, we approached the crowd so closely that I could distinctly understand every word they said. I saw one of the giants take up a trunk of a tree, which he brandished aloft over his head as if it were but a cane, and I heard him shout to his companions, the other giants :

"Up, ye men ! take each of you a tree, and within a minute we shall have ground those fools and their toy to dust."

There was an appalling rush, and a band of giants, with uplifted trees, prepared to attack the ship and its builders. A panic paralysed the poor labourers, who dropped their tools and cried for mercy. But Noah stepped forward, and, stretching out his hand over them, cried, "Do not be afraid ! This is God's work, and no man can destroy it !" And at the same time I saw an angel, who was invisible to all the people, stretch out his hand over the giants, and they were smitten with terror and confusion, so that they threw away their trees, and ran trembling with fear.

"Christian," said Chizoniël to me, "do not marvel at this. It is nearly one hundred and twenty years since Noah began his work, and during that period the giants have times innumerable tried to destroy him and it ; but God has always protected him, because he continued believing that God's word and work should stand for ever, though strong bulls of Bashan encompassed him about like bees. You have seen the angel who came to his assistance. Noah never saw him, but he believed in the Invisible One ; and through that faith, as you have seen, he was stronger than all his adversaries, formidable giants though they be. It is a true saying of the Spirit, 'The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them.'"

"May I believe the same with reference to myself ?" I asked. "I am not a man like Noah."

Chizoniël smiled.

"Christian," he said, in a gentle tone, "how can you ask such a question ? It has pleased God to make you a member of the chosen blood-bought Church of his only begotten Son ! Are we not all ministering spirits sent forth to minister to you who are the heirs of salvation ? You are a member of the Divine royal family. We are your loving and faithful servants, to the glory of the sovereign grace of Him who made us and begat you."

I covered my face with my hands. I could not fathom it. I adored in silence.

Meanwhile, the labourers resumed their work.

"Who are those people who assist Noah in his work ?" I asked.

"They are a Cainite tribe," was the answer, "who were driven from their homes by the giants, and would have been destroyed by them, had not Noah taken them into his service, and thus protected them. They serve him for their own safety's sake. They all look upon him as a fool, but since he gives them their daily support, they abide near him for the sake of the meat that perisheth. Not one of them believes that they are engaged in building the only means of salvation from the wrath which is to come—that they are preparing the only means of safety from the coming judgment."

"Poor blind fools!" I said. "What horror will strike them by-and-bye, when they discover that they have helped to save others while they themselves perish!"

"There have always been such fools in the world," replied Chizoniël. "The number is great of those who, the more they assist in building up the Church of Christ, accelerate the more the day of their own condemnation."

The giants having now left the place for a time, the scene assumed a much less riotous aspect. It is true the crowd continued mocking and scoffing, but this was all. Some of the tribe of Jubal took harps, and cymbals, and flutes, and played merry tunes, to which the bystanders danced gay and licentious dances. Ham, Noah's youngest son, joined them, but at such a distance, as to be out of his father's sight. It made a strange impression upon me to hear the merry noise of the dancers blending with the strokes of the workmen's hammers, each of which sounded like a thunder-peal of condemnation on the light-minded and reckless throng.

It now seemed to be the hour for the labourers to take their noon-day meal and to rest themselves. During this pause, Noah stepped forward and addressed the noisy crowd.

"How long will you harden your hearts against the Spirit of God?" he cried. "One hundred and twenty years have been given to you to repent, but ye will not. Only a few months now remain, and then the wrath of the Almighty will be poured down upon you from heaven. The waters shall cover the earth, and you shall all perish, with your wives and children, because your wickedness is as high as the mountains and your iniquity is as deep as the sea. You see this ship? As truly as God liveth she will soon be floating over your heads, unless you repent and turn back from your evil ways, and come to God, who is plenteous in mercy, and has no pleasure in your death. I beseech you, for your souls' sakes, do consider. Still it is time. It is not too late yet. Oh! humble yourselves in the dust at the feet of God, if perchance He may repent Himself of the evil that He is about to bring upon you."

There were some amongst the crowd upon whom these words seemed to make an impression; but it was at once drowned in the roar of laughter that rose from the rest of the multitude. Noah thereupon retired. As he did so, stones and pieces of wood were flung at him, some of which nearly struck his head. The people then took to eating and drinking and making merry.

"How is it possible," I said, "that they can cast such grave, well-intentioned warnings to the wind? And this, too, in the sight of the very ship which is erected as a testimony against them and as a witness of the truth of what they are hearing?"

"Such is your opinion, because you believe in the word of the prophet Noah," answered Chizoniël; but they do not believe it; and so that same ship which you look upon as a silent witness of God's truth is to them the most foolish and ridiculous object ever seen in the world. But let us hear what they themselves have to say about it; and I am sure that after having heard their reasonings you will not wonder that they laugh at every word which Noah speaks to them. Do you see a little group of middle-aged and old men sitting on the trunk of a hewn tree at a distance? They appear to be more accessible to calm quiet intercourse than the gay tempestuous crowd. We will change our appearance, and approach them in the form of artisans, as if we were two of the ship-builders."

In a moment my guide and myself were transformed into carpenters, hammer and saw in hand. In this disguise we took our place beside the elderly people, who were chattering together about Noah and his big ship. Our appearance evidently attracted no notice, as the builders, in their leisure time, often used to mix with the people round about.

"Certainly," cried a grey-headed man, whose name was Hubal, "it is a madman's work to build such an enormous ship in the middle of a forest! How is he to launch it? If it were a little boat, such as the one I have swimming in the Ormon over there, it might be carried on people's shoulders to the river-side. But where is the water broad and deep enough to keep such a monstrous vessel afloat?"

"Ah, but mind you," said a middle-aged man of the name of Cholem, "Noah expects the water to come to the ship, don't you see? He tells us that the whole of this land, and the forest, and the mountains yonder, shall be covered with water. So he might have built the ship on the top of the highest mountain quite as well. He thinks she will be sure to get afloat, no matter where he builds her."

Hubal laughed uproariously.

"And where in the world is all that water to come from?" he cried. "I have crossed the country in all directions several times in my life, and I am pretty sure I have seen all the rivers there are under heaven—viz., the Pison and the Gihon, the Phrath and the Hiddekel. But even supposing those streams could be rolled back and gathered into one basin, I am assured that our giants would be able to wade through it as easily as you can wade through the Ormon."

"Does he know nothing of the ocean?" I asked my guide.

"He does not," was the answer. "He never saw it. This land is surrounded on all sides by vast boundless deserts, covered with sand, thistles, and thorns, which no man can cross. These people know nothing of what there is beyond the limits of the little piece of land which they inhabit. This is their world, and old Hubal, you see, is a man rich in knowledge and experience. He is to these people what you would call in your country a professor of natural philosophy, a scientific man. He has crossed 'the world' in all directions, and knows exactly how much water there is, and what the water is capable of doing. You understand that Noah, who is two hundred years younger than this man, must in his eyes be an arrogant fool, because he ventures to maintain that all the water which Hubal saw is but a drop compared with the flood that is to come. Thus you see that the strife between infidel science and faith is as old as the world itself. But let us continue listening. You shall hear more yet of that kind."

"Ah, but remember, Father Hubal," said a man in the prime of life, of the name of Baal-jared, "the prophet tells us that the water is to pour down in streams from heaven."

"Nonsense!" cried Hubal. "Look up to the sky. Is it not bright, and clear, and pure as silver? Can you discern even so much as a spot of the size of my hand? Where, then, are those terrible streams to come from? Can there come floods out of nothing? or do you expect the fiery sun to turn some day into a fountain of water? You might quite as well expect the source of the Pison to throw up jets of fire. I am nearly eight hundred years old, but old as I am I never yet saw the sky different from what it is now, and I never witnessed even so much as one drop of water falling down from heaven. And what never happened in the course of nature during eight hundred years, my children, will never happen at all, be sure of that."

"How is that?" I asked my guide. "Did he never see rain?"

"He did not," was the answer. "Rain is quite an unknown phenomenon to these people. You have read in the record of the creation that 'the Lord God had not caused it to rain upon the earth,' but that 'there went up a mist from the earth, which watered the whole face of the ground This state of things was not altered till the flood came."

"So these people never saw a rainbow either?" I said. "I now understand how the rainbow could be a token of the covenant which the Lord made with Noah after the flood. Noah then saw that brilliant bow for the first time in his life!"

"Just so," said Chizoniël. "But you will perceive now that these people must think they have quite reasonable grounds for their disbelief in Noah's assertions. They never saw an ocean, nor did they ever see a drop of rain. Those things were perfectly unknown from the days of Adam till this time, a period of at least sixteen hundred years. How then, they ask, can there possibly come such a terrible flood as will be sufficient to lift up this huge ship? You see they apparently have nature, experience, and common sense on their side. Must it not seem to be a madman's work, under such circumstances, to build such a vessel in a forest!"

"Indeed," said I, "it must look very odd to them. I should almost feel inclined to ask, Are they to be blamed? It seems rather unjust to require of them to believe one man, when creation itself appears to stand up as a witness against him."

"But," replied Chizoniël, "there is another witness who stands up in his favour; and they are to be blamed because of their shutting their ears to his voice. That witness's name is Conscience, and his testimony is stronger than that of creation. Just let us enter into a conversation with them, and you will see how unfairly they deal with that witness's testimony."

"Father Hubal," said Chizoniël, "you are a man of great experience and knowledge, and you have seen the works of creation. Now creation is a grand work, but you know it is not of itself, but is created by God, who made heaven and earth. Well, Noah tells us that we have all grossly sinned against our Creator, and that to punish us for our wickedness He will bring a flood over us. We know that God is almighty, and can easily cover our land with water, though we do not know how He can do it. Now, if it is true that we really have sinned against that great and mighty God, is it not reasonable for us to consider? If Noah told us that God intended to destroy us without there being any cause whatever for it, I think we should be justified in calling him a fool. But he tells us that there is a cause, and he points at our manifold iniquities and at God's long-suffering in bearing with them; and he tells us also that at length God's patience is exhausted; and that He has resolved to destroy us, unless we repent. May there not be truth in that? And is it not quite possible that God should take some extraordinary means to sweep away from this earth a generation which He is angry at?"

"Sins! iniquities!" answered Hubal scornfully. "What are they?"

"I will tell you," replied Chizoniël. "For instance, you killed many a man who never did you any harm, because you desired his wife."

"Ay!" cried the assembly, merrily, "there is truth in that, old fox!"

"Well," cried Hubal, "what about that?"

"Why," answered Chizoniël, "Noah tells us that, when Cain had killed his brother Abel, the Lord said to him: 'The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the earth.'"

"Ah!" answered Hubal, sneeringly; "Noah tells so many things. He is a fool!"

"Still, he never killed a man," quoth Chizoniël.

"He is a madman."

"Yet he never took another man's wife or property."

"True, true," cried the other members of the company.

"But you all of you have other men's wives," cried Hubal, angrily; "and so has every mighty man of renown amongst us. Is there any one here who has not slain a man to his wounding and a young man to his hurt? Only Noah has not; but that is exactly why I call him a fool, because he behaves like a coward, and opposes the generally-adopted manners and customs of society. He thinks he is wiser and better than the whole of us. But his folly has at length come to light. Only look at that ship between the trees! Ha! ha!"

"Still," interposed Cholem, "it must be acknowledged that it is a clever piece of workmanship, after all. I am quite amazed how he could manage to get it put together. We never saw such a thing before, and I am quite sure that we could not make it in a thousand years, wise and mighty men as we are."

"Ay," said Chizoniël, "and it appears to me that a man who can do a work like that cannot be such a very great fool."

"He says his God has taught him how to do it," quoth Baal-jared.

"Well, I am quite sure that must be the case," said Chizoniël, "for this is no common human work. And how often have not the giants tried to destroy it, but they never could? An invisible hand evidently always held them back."

"Of course," cried Hubal; "he is in alliance with some mighty spirit, no doubt. But so are we. The sun, moon, and stars—the whole host of heaven which we adore, stand by us in the grand battle against the god of Noah."

"And which of the two do you think is the better?" asked Chizoniël; "your gods, who teach you to kill and rob one another, or the god of Noah, who teaches him to do good to everybody, to protect the widow and the orphan, and to succour the oppressed?"

"Well, I do not know," answered Hubal, doggedly. "I am perfectly content with my gods; they never put a straw in my way, but leave me at liberty to do just what I please."

"I believe they do," said Chizoniël, "because they have no power to prevent you. They are no gods at all. They are dead gods. This ought to be quite clear to you. They have not even so much power as to prevent Noah from building his ship. And, when Noah's God one day brings the flood over you, they will not be able to prevent that either. I think it is high time for you to consider, for it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of such a God as Noah's!"

Here the whole company rose in a rage, and drawing their swords they filled the air with roars and shouts of "Kill him! kill him! Who is he? He is a traitor!" But before they could pounce upon us we had disappeared before their eyes, and resumed our place near the ark.

"Christian," said Chizoniël to me, "you must now have observed that the fault of these people is not only in their heads but also in their hearts. If Noah were a murderer and adulterer, as they are, they would not call him a fool; but as he is a good and just man, they hate him. It is true that the building of this ship must look like folly to them, but if they had not seared their consciences they would acknowledge that this apparent folly has reasonable grounds. Had any sense of the good, the true, and the divine been left in them, they would not merely look at the forest, and the rivers, and the dry sky, but they would also give attention to the fact that a man, whom they cannot help acknowledging to be better than they are, and whose admirable work proves him to be anything but a madman, has most seriously warned them against the consequences of their wickedness; and they would perceive that such a man would not, for upwards of a hundred and twenty years, submit to the toil, the vexations, and the persecutions connected with such a stupendous work, if he had no reliable grounds for the fearful expectation which urges him to persevere amid all these sufferings. They do not even give themselves the trouble of examining these grounds, because they instinctively perceive that such an examination would lay bare their own wickedness and condemn them. Having expelled God's Spirit from their heart, moral integrity and spiritual wisdom have no more any authority to them. Infidelity, in whatever form it may present itself, is always the sequence of moral decay. The moment people refuse to feel God's work in their hearts, they also cease to see God's work in history, and all that is left to them to see is the sky, the forest, the sun, the moon, and the stars. And the moment a man refuses to listen to God's voice within, he also begins to stop his ears to that voice coming to him by the mouth of a servant of God. Such a servant then becomes a fool or a fanatic in his sight, and he will soon finish by declaring the whole Divine revelation to be a fable or an imposture. And certainly God's words and works, if looked at without faith, cannot but appear to be foolish and absurd, because they stand in connection with moral principles, which infidelity does not admit, and with future facts which nature cannot foresee. It stands to reason that a man who denies the guilt of sin cannot but sneer at a ship which points to a future flood that is to punish the sinners. In the same way the cross of Christ cannot but be a folly in the sight of those of your fellow-beings who deny that they are guilty of any crime. They are quite right if their premises are true. But that these are false they cannot see, not because their understanding is darkened, but because their heart is blind."

While Chizoniël was speaking in this way I saw in my dream that the ark was finished, and that with the assistance of invisible ministering angels the beasts of the field and the fowls of heaven were led into it according to God's commandment. And when Noah and his wife, and Shem and Japhet had got in, I saw Ham standing at a distance, doubting whether he would go in or not. The crowd round about mocked and scoffed uproariously, so that the air reverberated with their roars of laughter. A band of gay girls took Ham in their midst, dancing with him, and telling him not to be such a fool as to leave this beautiful place, the flowers, the trees, the sunshine and the pleasures of life, to shut himself up in that close, dark box, with the elephant, the donkey, and the pig for his companions. And I saw Ham, now struggling against them, now yielding, now taking a few steps towards the ark, now allowing himself to be pulled back, till his father's voice, sounding from the ark, reached his ear, entreating him to make haste lest he should perish with the multitude. Then, disconnecting himself with a jerk from the arms of the girls, he fled to the ark, which he no sooner had entered, than an invisible hand shut its entrance, so that no man could open it again. A roar of laughter rose from the crowd, and at once hundreds of hands carried straw and wood to the ark to set fire to it. And already the flames were rising, when on a sudden heaven was covered with darkness. Terrible thunder-peals roared through the air; streams of water poured down, which in a moment quenched the fire. A general terror seized the crowd, which dispersed in utter confusion. Gradually the ship rose on the increasing flood. I heard the tempest rage and the waters of the deep gush up with fearful noise, and the weeping of the women and children, and the roaring of the beasts of the field, when on a sudden I awoke. And lo! it was a dream.

HEROES AND MARTYRS OF THE REFORMATION IN ITALY.

BY W. L. ALEXANDER, D.D.

I.

At a time when the attention of the civilised world is deeply fixed on the Italian peninsula, when all free nations are waiting to hail the social and political regeneration of its nationalities, and when Christian people in all lands are hoping and praying that the new order of things may be so arranged as to secure the interests of society there on the only solid, safe, and abiding basis of national freedom,—the free circulation of God's Word and the free preaching of the Gospel; it may not be uninteresting or unprofitable to look back to a time when Italy seemed about to take a place among the free nations of Europe by casting off the yoke of Rome; and when for a season the fruits which the Gospel, faithfully and freely preached, has produced in all the world were seen in hopeful richness and beauty there also. The season, in truth, was short, like a gleam of sunshine breaking forth in a dark and cloudy day; but just as such a gleam may discover to the eye of the observer many hidden spots of beauty or of grandeur, so during the brief period in which the principles of the Reformation struggled for ascendancy among the Italian people, not a few noble characters were brought to light and many scenes of heroic fortitude, devotion, and piety were exhibited, which it is alike interesting and profitable to contemplate, and which at any rate ought not to be forgotten.

The history of the Reformation in Italy has occupied more than one able pen, and all that diligent research and faithful narrative can do to set forth its course and character has been done.* Following in the footsteps of those who have worthily surveyed this field, and availing ourselves of their materials, without aiming to emulate their endeavour, we propose in a series of papers to make our readers acquainted with the history and working of some of those noble men and women whom God raised up to testify for his truth around the very centre of papal domination, not a few of whom had to maintain their opinions in the face of fiery persecutions, and some of whom were counted worthy to seal their testimony with their blood.

As preparatory to this, it may be not without its use nor uninteresting that we should present a brief survey of the general state of the Papacy in relation to free thought in Italy at the era of the Reformation.

It is impossible to study the Papal system without being impressed with the conviction that it is a master-piece of policy for the end at which it aims—the subjection of the soul of man to the despotism of a hierarchy. The skilful adaptation of its provisions and methods to the prevailing tendencies of human nature, the adroit subordination to its service of all the motives that most powerfully govern the heart of man, its mingling of the sacred with the secular so as to bring the solemnity of the sacred and the interest of the secular to bear on one common end, and its perfect organisation, whereby all its agents are made to work in harmony and in obedience to a single will, conspire to render it the most perfect engine of spiritual rule the world has ever seen. But it is not given to any human institution to be absolutely perfect, either for good or for bad ends; and when its design is evil it often happens that its very completeness at once provokes and facilitates assaults which tend to its injury. So it proved with the Papacy. It had not long existed in its full development as it came from the hands of Gregory VII. and Innocent III., when its very perfection as an engine of spiritual domination induced courses which stirred up hostility against it in various quarters.

Uncontrolled power leads not only to tyranny and extortion, but is apt to foster the reckless indulgence of all the baser passions of our nature. Men, who find they can trample with impunity on the liberties of their fellow-men, are not slow in finding their way to a contempt for all restraint, and become a law to themselves, though, it may be, the mere slaves of evil lusts, and led captive by the devil at his pleasure. Especially does this result emerge in systems that foster indolence, and afford peculiar opportunities for sensual indulgence.

The history of the Papacy during the three centuries which preceded the Reformation supplies a continuous and startling illustration of these remarks. In almost every European nation the rapacity and tyranny of the Papal See had made themselves painfully felt, and had excited in the bosom of prince and of peasant a feeling of indignation, which, if it did not break out into open revolt, was not, on that account, the less bitter and deep. The extent to which the Popes laid Europe under contribution to supply the means of their personal luxury or the aggrandisement in temporal rule and power of the papal throne, almost exceeds belief. Nor were they careful to cover over their rapacity by any hypocritical pretence, or to soothe the objects of it by any prudent policy. In the directest and most imperious terms, and without the slightest regard to national rights or popular prejudices, they issued their demands and levied their exactions. They drew wealth and power to Rome also by appointing Italian ecclesiastics to the richest benefices in other countries; and so regardless were they of appearances that, of those thus appointed, some were mere children whom, in the face even of their own canons and in some cases of the determined protests of the ecclesiastical authorities of the place, (as in the case of Grosteste, when he received the mandate of Innocent IV., to induct an Italian boy into a Much may also be gathered from Ranke's "History of the Popes," and from such works as "Bayle's Dictionary," the "Vitæ Theologorum Exterorum" of Melchior Adams, and Schelhorn's "Amœnitatis Historiæ Ecclesiasticæ." vacancy in the diocese of London) they insisted upon being duly and formally installed ; that, though it was impossible for them to do, or pretend to do the duties of the post, they might be at least entitled to draw the revenues accruing from it. Nor was the private character of the clergy in general such as to command respect, or counteract the bad effect on the minds of the people which the tyranny and extortion of the papal rule had produced. For the most part they were illiterate, ignorant and indolent ; in many cases sensual and vicious in their habits ; and in some very monsters of depravity and pollution. In this respect the Italian ecclesiastics seem to have had a bad pre-eminence. There is still extant a letter from Æneas Sylvius, who afterwards became Pope, under the title of Pius II., written to his father, in which he describes his own vicious life in terms of the grossest indecency, and in a tone of most disgusting levity, adding that he does not care to conceal his vicious habits, because he sees no man who is not as bad as himself. John Francis Picus, Lord of Mirandola, in an oration to Leo X., delivered in 1517, in which he earnestly entreated that pontiff to bestir himself to heal the diseases of the Church, says : "With the greater part of the chiefs of our religion, by whose example the ignorant commonalty should be regulated and formed, there is either no worship of God, or at any rate, very little ; no method and order of good living, no shame, no modesty ; justice has given way either to hatred or to favour ; piety has almost wholly degenerated into superstition ; and men of all ranks sin so openly that frequently virtue in good men is held to be a vice, and vices receive the honour due to virtue, by those who have come to regard their unheard-of petulance and long impunity as fences and walls of protection for their crimes."* It would be easy to fill pages with similar testimonies from the writings of men who were themselves attached to the Romish Church. But it is unnecessary. The sad fact is sufficiently known. The corruption which had invaded the Church in every part of Christendom displayed its greatest virulence around the centre, and reached its culminating point in the lives of such men as Popes Sixtus IV., Innocent VIII., and Alexander VI., and those by whom they were immediately surrounded.

The effect on the character of the people of such an example on the part of their religious guides, may be easily imagined. Religion and morality might almost be said to be banished from Rome and the larger cities of Italy. "Rome," writes Cardinal Bembo, who knew it well, "is a fœtid pool, full of the wickedest scoundrels in the whole world." Luther used to express his thankfulness that he had been induced to visit Rome ; for had he not seen and heard for himself, he would never have believed the extent to which the Pope and his cardinals had corrupted the Church, and so would not have been led to assume the bold position as a Reformer to which he was thus driven. Among the more cultivated classes, practical and, in many cases, openly avowed atheism prevailed. "If you are in search of atheists," writes an author of the time, "you will not find so many anywhere as in Rome." "In the house of the Duke of Parma," writes another, "atheism is much affected (in deliciis habetur)." Melanchthon's retort on an Italian theologian is well known :—"You Italians," said he, "are ready to contend that God or Christ is in the Eucharist whom you do not believe to be in heaven." Luther repeatedly tells a story of two persons who at the table of Leo. X. fell into a debate as to the immortality of the soul. Their arguments being expended they agreed to refer the decision to the Pope ; who, on being appealed to, replied, "Though you who have maintained the affirmative have adduced good arguments and reasons for your opinion, I rather give in to your opponent, for your view makes one melancholy, whilst his is favourable to jollity."* Where such undiluted epicureanism reigned in the most influential quarters, we need not wonder that unbelief and all ungodliness characterised the masses. We can believe that the satirist hardly exceeded the truth when he wrote :—

> Vivere qui sancte vultis, discedite Roma ;
> Omnia hic ecce licent, non licet esse probus.

But whilst the people were only too ready to take encouragement from the conduct of their spiritual guides to rush into all irreligion and iniquity, they were not by this led to regard with any esteem those whose example they followed, or to treat with respect the system to which they belonged. The very opposite effect, as was natural, followed ; the men who had done despite to the sacred office with which they were invested became themselves objects of contempt ; and this was extended from them to the rites they administered, the doctrines their Church professed, and the entire system to which they belonged. Nor was this confined to mere secret feeling or private conversation ; it broke out in manifold forms of open and avowed attack. Angry denunciations, bitter satire, stinging sarcasms, ridiculous stories,† and comical songs, combined with the skill of the caricaturist to give expression to, and at the same time to increase and exacerbate the feeling of contempt and indignation with which the conduct of the clergy had inspired the masses. One has only to glance over such a collection as the Poggiana, the work of one who, as he himself tells us, had lived fifty years at the Court of Rome, and under several pontiffs, to see with what gusto every story that could place the clergy, regular and secular, in a ridiculous or hateful light, or bring contempt on their institutions and rites, was received and circulated in Italy. The effect of all this in sapping the foundations of popular respect for the papal system, and preparing the way for a revolt against the papal authority, should circumstances occur to call it forth, is too obvious to require to be pointed out.

The revival of letters struck a heavy blow at the influence of the ecclesiastical power in Italy. In an evil hour for herself the Church had espoused the cause of ignorance. For several generations her tendency had been decidedly retrogressive in respect of culture and liberal learning. During the fourteenth century everything betokens a degeneracy on the part of her clergy in literary tastes and pursuits as compared with the clergy of two or three centuries before; their Latin more barbarous, their taste more corrupt, their matter more inane, their whole style both of thought and expression more puerile and mean. The complaint which Trithemius, Abbot of Spanheim, utters over the degeneracy of his own monks, might have found an echo in every monastery in Christendom, and in none more so than in those of Italy. "The study of Scripture our priests repudiate; erudition they neglect; in place of books of Scripture they breed and train dogs and birds. . . . They are blind leaders of the blind, who, instead of teaching the people righteousness, rather seduce them."* The gross ignorance and illiteracy of some of the clergy almost passes belief. Luther's story of the monks who resolved to keep their old "Mumpsimus" in preference to the new "Sumpsimus" is well known.† Luther asserts that "the greater part of the clergy, especially the occupants of the cloisters, were very unlearned blockheads, some of whom could hardly read,"‡ and of those who could read he says that they, for the most part, contented themselves with babbling the words of the service without understanding them, alleging in defence that "the Holy Ghost understood them, and the devil was scared by them."§

† Many of these stories are too gross to be repeated now, but of those which are simply ridiculous not a few are still in circulation, and it is somewhat amusing to find how in successive generations they have been fastened on individuals who were certainly entirely innocent of the deeds or words narrated, but whose peculiar eccentricities presented points on which the unscrupulous story-teller found he could make the old story stick.

Of himself he records that he was twenty years old before he had seen a Bible, or knew that there were any more of the Gospels or Epistles than are contained in the Postils. The Poggiana are full of ridiculous stories of the ignorance of the clergy; and every one acquainted with the writings of Erasmus knows how with him and the rest of the Humanists this was matter of constant and poignant ridicule. In Italy this, like all the other discreditable characteristics of the Romish Church, manifested itself in an exaggerated form. Ignorance there was assured the dignity of an institution. The "Fratres Ignorantiæ" made it their boast that they knew nothing, and would learn nothing.

The Church having thus gone over to the side of ignorance, there naturally emerged a state of hostility more or less pronounced between her adherents and those for whom culture and literature presented attractions. Indeed, from the very dawn of modern literature in Italy, a decided anti-papal spirit manifests itself in the writings of its cultivators.‖ Dante, Petrarcha, Boccaccio, Ariosto, to say nothing of less famous names, have, each after his own fashion, indicated unmistakeably the antagonism which they felt to exist between their tendencies and pursuits, and the spirit, practices and influence of the hierarchy. The language they sometimes employ in denouncing both individuals and classes passes the bounds of moderation. With Petrarcha Rome is constantly "Babilonia;" and both in his poetry and his epistles he inveighs against it and its rulers in the strongest terms. In one sonnet (91) he speaks of having "escaped for his life from impious Babylon, whence all modesty is fled and all good is gone, hospice of evil, mother of errors;" in another (106) he describes her as filled to bursting with the wrath of God and all kinds of vices, having Bacchus and Venus for her deities; and in another (107) he denounces her as "the school of errors, temple of heresy, forge of deceit, dire prison, where the good dies, the evil is fostered and engendered, hell of the living, against which it will be a great wonder if Christ do not come forth in wrath."* If these should be thought the exaggerated utterances of a poet under the excitement of the muse, we have only to turn to his epistles, where, writing to friends, he gives expression to his sincere convictions, to find many statements in which, with fuller details of the evils complained of, he uses language even stronger than that we have quoted.† Dante, a higher and purer spirit than Petrarcha, uses language not less severe in reference to the corruption which reigned in the Church. Take the following two passages from different parts of his great poem. Addressing the Popes, some of whom he represents himself as finding in hell enduring the most frightful torments he says:—

> "Trampling the good and raising up the bad,
> Your avarice overwhelms the world in woe.
> To you St. John referred, O shepherds vile,
> When she who sits on many waters, had > Been seen with kings her person to defile.
> Your gods ye make of silver and of gold;
> And wherein differ from idolators,
> Save that their God is one, yours manifold?
> Ah! Constantine! what evils caused to flow,
> Not thy conversion, but those fair domains,
> Thou on the first rich father didst bestow."‡

Again, speaking of Florence, he exclaims:—

> "Thy city . . . . . the accurst,
> Floren produced and issued; whence have strayed
> The sheep and lambs away from the right track,
> Since of the Shepherd a Wolf hath made.
> For this the Gospel now is laid aside,
> The Fathers too; and the Decretals sought
> Alone, as by the margins is descried.
> To them both Pope and Cardinals are given;
> Nor turn they e'er to Nazareth a thought,
> Where spread his wings the Messenger from heaven.
> But soon the Vatican and parts of Rome
> Most cherished in the pious memory,
> Where Peter's faithful converts found a tomb,
> Shall from the foul adulteress be free."§

Many more such passages might be culled from Dante, whose severe and lofty spirit could ill brook the levities and corruptions which characterised the court and clergy of Rome in his day, and whose intensely religious feeling led him into sympathy with doctrines which, at a later period, would have been signalised as "Protestant;" such, for instance, as the sole supremacy of Scripture as the final rule of faith and duty; the denial of the validity of priestly absolution;

the repudiation of prayer for the dead ; the upholding of Christ as the rock on which the Church is built, and the sole foundation on which all must rest ; and the assertion that the temporal authority is not to be derived from or dependent on the spiritual.* One feels grateful to hear from amidst the gloom of the 16th century a grand voice like that of Dante, proclaiming, in support of the doctrine of the soul's immortality, such words as these :—"It is certified to us by the most true doctrine of Christ which is the way, the truth, the life ; the way, because by it, without impediment, we advance to the felicity of that immortality ; the truth, because it suffers no error ; the light, because it illuminates us in the darkness of mundane ignorance."† When we consider the giant grasp which Dante laid upon the opening intelligence of Italy, we can easily believe that the bold utterances to which we have referred were not without a powerful effect in preparing for a revolt against the supremacy of the Romish see.

Mere antagonism, however, to evil is not always in itself positive good ; and, unhappily, irreligion so predominated throughout Italian society, that rebellion against priestly domination assumed to a large extent the form of an entire renunciation of Christianity. The consequence was, that when the ancient classics came to be generally read by men of culture, it was not their poetry and philosophy merely that took hold of the minds of such, but their morality and their religion also. Hence, with the revival of letters, came into Italy a resuscitation of the ancient heathenism. Men, like Marsilio Ficino, Pietro Pomponazzo, Angelo Poliziano, Pietro Aretino, and others, if they believed anything, believed after the fashion of Plato and Aristotle, and not after that of the Apostles. In the court of the Medici at Florence, Plato and not Paul reigned as the supreme authority in religion ; and it is not without reason believed that even under the papal tiara beliefs that were more heathen than Christian found a nest. Things must have been tending very far in this direction when it could be currently reported of a Pope, that he had said, "How much this fable about Christ has profited us, all men know." In good society at Rome it was thought necessary to the character of a gentleman and man of fashion to avow opinions contrary to those taught by the dogmas of the Church.‡ Luther, who, while a monk, believed in transubstantiation, and thought it his duty to go honestly through the whole service of the mass, was petrified with horror, when performing this office at Rome, to find a priest at his elbow making a mock of it, and telling him to make haste and get done with it. Even Erasmus tells us he was confounded by the blasphemies he heard on every side, and the open advocacy of heathen opinions, especially the non-immortality of the soul. § On this subject, as we have already seen, Leo X. could jest scoffingly at his own table, and so far had the belief in this fundamental doctrine of religion become unpopular that, in 1513, it was thought necessary at the Lateran Council formally to affirm anew the doctrine of the soul's immortality.*

We have been the more particular in describing this state of society in Italy, because whilst it shows how the minds of the people were loosened from that reverence for the Papacy which would have entirely excluded the Reformation from Italy, there was wanting that basis of religious earnestness which in other lands furnished a permanent foundation on which the new spiritual life could erect its structure. Whilst, therefore, it is true that in Italy, as elsewhere, successive generations had been little by little dropping in the powder which might have blown up the superincumbent mass of papal domination,† there were other influences at work which mingled with it such ingredients as prevented it, when the match was applied, from producing more than a very partial and interrupted explosion. In other lands (to borrow the quaint words of a recent writer) "if the fire ran over the country with wonderful rapidity, it was because the trees were all dry."‡ But in Italy, unfortunately, the trees, though sufficiently withered, were rotten and damp, so that the fire could not run, and was soon extinguished.

But whilst the shadows predominate in the picture which Italy presents to us at the beginning of the 16th century, let it not be supposed that nothing but darkness reigned. From time to time earnest spirits had arisen who not only lifted up their voice against prevailing corruption, but were faithful witnesses for "the truth as it is in Jesus." There can be no doubt that the doctrines of the Waldenses had extensively spread in various places of Italy, and that many who did not dare openly to profess these doctrines nevertheless held and valued them. The fiery eloquence and religious fervour of such a man as Savonarola, though he cannot be justly regarded as aiming at any such reformation of the Church as Luther and his confederates effected, could not fail to awaken in men's minds a sense of the reality of religion, and the necessity of being in earnest about it, as well as to lead them above the sphere of ritualism and superstition in order to find what would meet their spiritual wants. Certain it is that even at Rome itself there were men who held and taught truths usually distinctive of Protestantism. An association was even formed, including a number of men of high position in the Church, which, under the name of "The Oratory of Divine Love," sought to counteract the unhallowed tendency of the tone of society under Leo X. This association met for the worship of God, for preaching, and for spiritual exercises ; and from it proceeded an influence which greatly prepared the way for the progress of evangelical truth among the more cultivated classes. After quoting some passages from the writings of some of the members of this association, Ranke, who was the first to call attention to the fact of its existence, says justly,* "It would be difficult to announce the Lutheran doctrine in language more orthodox." It was from this society also that the first translation of the Scriptures into Italian from the original text, that of Bruccioli, proceeded;† and there is every reason to believe that translations of some of the writings of Luther and Melanchthon were issued, sometimes under fictitious names, by members of this association, and widely circulated over Italy.

Such was the general condition of society, in relation to religion, in the Italian peninsula at the dawn of the Reformation. With much that seemed to invite and favour the introduction of a new state of things favourable to Christian liberty and evangelical piety, there was more that was hostile to such a movement, and threatened it, if made, with opposition and disaster. Subsequent events showed that it was even so. The Reformation spread much farther in Italy than many suppose. But it was met everywhere with the violent hostility of the dominant powers, whilst it found but little response in the bosoms of the masses, sunk as they were in superstition or infidelity, and enslaved by sensual lusts and habits; and at length the light that had been kindled was trampled out or quenched in blood, and Erebus and Night once more resumed their reign.

COTTAGE POEMS.

BY A CURATE.

II.—MIRIAM.

"Miriam—the miller's daughter—to my cost,
I knew her well! My darling boy she crost
In his first love: she did not draw him on—
I can't say that—but still she jilted John.
She might have known his looks: I cannot say
That he said much: he had his father's way,
Had John.
I knew her since she was the height
Of that white lily: she was just as white—
And she was still and stately in her ways,
Her looks were meek although she fed on praise.
I won't be hard, but she drove John away,
Who was so fond of me: and to this day
We've never heard of him. 'Tis sore, but, sir,
He's in God's keeping.
And what came of er?
She ran away, against her father's will,
With a poor portrait-painter, who fell ill
Down at the inn, and hung about the place.
I saw them once together; and his face
Was like a woman's, and his hands were thin,
And little fit he seemed his bread to win.
His speech was soft-like, and his clothes were fine—
Not working clothes like John's. Though he was mine,
Whatever he might wear, my John was twice
The man he was: and yet he was her choice.
It's ten years since I met them in the lane,
And saw the last was seen of them. A pain
Shot through her at the sight of me, I know
And he was speaking to her quick and low.
What have you heard of her?"
"This letter gives
Her story. Where our Rector's daughter lives,
In London, in the East (a fearful place,
Where she has seldom seen a happy face,
Her husband's parish is), are streets on streets,
Where hopeless vice with reckless misery meets—
Our Devilsbye is but a little rill
To the great choking tide those streets that fill
With Sin's black river. They go hand in hand,
Striving to save some souls upon its strand,
With few to help. The doctor at his post
Fights there with fever and a kindred host
Of foul distempers. All the rich have flown,
And left the parish to the poor alone.
With cast-off rags, and offal food it teems,
Until like one vast rubbish-heap it seems.
Cast off and tainted seem the beings there—
Cast off from love and hope and peace and prayer—
Women and men, who like demoniacs seem,
And infants who, in innocence, blaspheme."

"Ah sir! I've heard that men their lives once gave
By thousands for the Saviour's empty grave—
His body suffers there!"
"Aye, it were well
A new crusade against the powers of hell
To preach. To rouse the Queen upon the throne,
The nobles, all the several ranks that own
Our country's wealth and power, to sweep away
Our cities' plague-spots from the face of day.——
But to the story of poor Miriam's life.
Entering a shop one day the Rector's wife
Saw one, with a fair child who held her hand,
Bring in her work and meekly waiting stand.
The figure drooped—the child was drooping too,
With that sad look of early care she knew;
Yet something in them both, (and both looked ill,)
Recalled fresh country faces and the mill;
The leaping, laughing water, lipped with green;
Sweet noises and sweet silences between;
May blossoms; roses; apples on the trees
In the mill gardens;—each and all of these Rushed through her mind, she knew not how or why.
The obsequious shopman meanwhile standing by.
The master took the work the woman brought,
Examined, grumbled, paid. And she who wrought
Asked, eagerly, if there was nothing more
To take home with her?
'Nothing!'
To the door

She moved, and went. And she who watched her then Remembered, rose, and called her back again :
But had to hasten after. In the street
Stood Miriam ! heedless every gaze to meet—
Heedless and hopeless ! In her open hand
The scanty payment of her toil she scanned—
And thus the letter runs :—'Despair was here !
Down the sad face there ran a single tear.
I touched her on the shoulder, and she stared,
And knew me not—for this I was prepared ;
And told her who I was, and who I guessed
That she must be. Reluctant she confessed.
"Where do you live ?" I said. She flushed with shame.
"Let me come to you, Miriam !" Her name
Softened her, and she said, "Yes, come to me ;
Thank God ! no worse than poverty you'll see." '—
She went, and found her, where, in cheerless gloom,
Close street and crowded court and stiffling room ;
Each is so like the other, it would be Relief to find a worse variety.
In a small room she sat, and with her there
Her dying husband. Even the outer air,
Such as it was, denied her. In distress
He seemed to show a gentle selfishness.
His wife and child were toiling in his sight,
His breath enough their breathing lives to blight ;
And yet he would not bear the slightest breath
Of air. It shook his wasted lungs, and death
Was very near. And, gracious Lord of Life !
All was not darkness in that mortal strife.
Out of these hearts a tenderness divine
Rose and was nourished by the strength of thine.
The wasted hands had tried her woman's task,
And fretful lips the kiss of peace would ask ;
And feeble knees were bent, and thanks were given,
For less of earth that left the more of Heaven.

"To Miriam's heart there year by year had come
A deeper yearning for her early home.
'I'll never see it more ; but would,' she said,
'They'd take my little Miriam in my stead.
In the old garden she would grow so bright ;
Here,' and she shuddered, 'there is such a fight
For life. May God forgive me ! I could pray
We all might go together.'
The next day
Her husband died. A letter has been sent To Miriam's father, and the Rector went To plead with him this morning."
"May the Lord
Open his heart to take his child restored !
My John, too, may come back. God sends us rain
Of weeping ; then his sun shines out again
To make our hearts grow. This I learned the day
The last of my great trouble passed away.
My man and I were parted three long years :
Serving as nurse, it was the bread of tears
I earned for many a day, up at the farm,
Another's rosy infant on my arm ;
While John, as under-gard'ner at 'the Main,'
Was striving hard to win me back again.
Well I remember, 'twas mid-summer day
He brought me home. The sky was red and grey,
I' the early morning when we took the start,
My man and I, together in the cart.
The rain began to fall—the sweetest rain—
I never saw the living earth again
With the same eyes. As sweet the world may be
To others, it was ne'er as sweet to me.
These fields are green, but those we passed that day
Are greener in my memory than they.
The larks sing merry here, but ne'er before,
Or since, they seemed to sing at God's own door,
For joy of singing ; like a silver cup,
The briony held each big white blossom up ;
The trees held out their leafy hands to catch
The blessing : I held up my face to match,
And shut my eyes. John had an arm, of course,
To spare for me—one served the sober horse ;
And so he held me closely to his side,
And screened me with his coat. A while our ride
Was up and down and over ridge on ridge,
And by the water dancing through the bridge.
At length the sun shone. We were passing through A planting of young birches, when the blue
Showed all above and in between. The sun
Making the rain-drops glitter every one,
Like the great stone in Lady Mary's ring ;
And the wind shook them, and they seemed to fling
Whole lapfulls upon us who passed below.
They sprinkled John, whose face was in a glow ;
At which I laughed. And John said, 'Wife, you seem ' enjoy a ducking ! '
And it stayed, that gleam
Of sunshine—stayed and brightened more and more ;
It was full shining on this very door
When John first led me in. 'Now, little wife,'
My dear man said, 'this is our home for life.
I've bought it and I've built it stick and stone ;
And more, the ground it stands on is my own.'
'O John !' I answered, 'God has been so good.'
'Ay, wife,' he said ; 'but I have understood
What faith means better since things went so hard.
We must not serve God for a poor reward.
Every good thing is his : but for things good
We need to work and wait ; and if there should Come ill instead, believe that better still,
Even best of all, is in our Father's will.'"

WATCH-NIGHT.

BY THE EDITOR.

Half-past twelve a.m. 1st of January, 1866.

I HAVE just returned from holding "Watch-night" with a congregation of Wesleyan Methodists. Never having witnessed its services, perhaps ignorant even of the existence of such a custom, many of my readers may be ready to ask, "Watch-night, what is it?" If Churches knew each other better, it might promote their mutual improvement, and also the interests of brotherly kindness and Christian charity. With this view I shall tell my readers something of the very impressive and solemn service, called Watch-night, with which, standing on the line that parts them, the Wesleyans take farewell of the old year and hail the advent of the new.

It is a fact, though by many sound Protestants and Christians who observe them never so much as supposed, that some of our old customs had their origin in Popish, others in older and Pagan times. Let me relate two remarkable examples of this which I saw some years ago when making a tour in the north and north-west of Scotland. In Loch Maree, where, next to Switzerland, the exquisite beauty of the lake, and the magnificent mountains that frame it, raise one's mind from nature up to nature's God, there is an island—one of the many that lie like gems on its bosom—which once boasted a well of healing virtues. Till the Saint whose name it bears took offence at a man who dipped a favourite dog into it to cure him of madness, its waters, so say the people, were a panacea for all the ills our flesh is heir to. On being so profaned, the well, which owed its miraculous virtues to the merits of the Saint, became dry. Partly in consequence of this belief, and partly in consequence of the progress of education, it has now ceased to be resorted to; but a tree which stands by it, proves to what a late period this old popish superstition retained its hold of this Protestant and Presbyterian district. It presents a sight one would expect to meet only in benighted Ireland. I saw the branches that hang over the empty well covered with votive offerings—a relic of Popery among a people who would have been as loth to trust in the merits of a dead saint, as in the demerits of a living sinner.

Such another well, but associated with an older time, stands near by the house of Culloden in Inverness-shire. Its waters at a certain period of the year, like those of the Pool of Siloam at the descent of the angel, were believed to acquire a miraculous virtue. This was on the first Sunday of the month of May. On the morning of that day, hundreds resorted to it, either to drink and be themselves cured, or drawing water, and taking care that not a drop was spilt lest the charm should be broken, to carry it to sick and bed-rid friends. May was a month sacred to the god of the sun; that being the period when Baal's rites were performed by our rude and savage ancestors, long before the introduction of Christianity. Though our country has no sturdier Protestants, or people who have a higher regard for the Sabbath, than the inhabitants of the surrounding district, down to a recent period crowds of them resorted to this old pagan well. I found many votive offerings on a tree which drooped over it—in buttons and copper coins that were stuck in its bark; and worsted threads, bits of cloth and ribbons of all colours that hung fluttering from its boughs. From these wells, whence I drew no water, I drew a lesson of charity. The strong hold which these old popish and even pagan superstitions long continued to maintain over a devout and serious people, taught me to wonder less that churches should retain, on the one hand, forms which, though they have no sanction in Scripture, are of a venerable antiquity; and reject, on the other hand, improvements in the services of public worship, merely because they are innovations on old established customs.

How long, like the remnants of the Hittites, Perizzites, and Canaanites in the land of Israel, heathen customs will survive in a Christian country, has no more remarkable illustration than those supply which, in strong contrast to the Methodist "Watch-night," usher in the year. Little do good Christians, when they take part in these, think that they are engaging in pagan rites. But so it is. For example, on the last night of the year the ancient Druids went forth in solemn procession; the high priest at their head carrying a golden bill-hook or sickle. Reverently approaching the sacred oak, he cut the mistletoe from its gnarled boughs; and this, being brought into the towns and carried to the houses of their chiefs, was distributed among the people. Cut down on the proper night with golden instrument and by priestly hands, this curious parasite became sacred to their god, and acquired the virtues of a potent charm. As such it was hung up in the rafters to preserve their houses from evil, and worn also as an amulet to protect their persons on the field of battle. And now, in the nineteenth century, a thousand years and more after heathenism had disappeared, in a country of bibles, churches, schools, and sabbaths, here we are in the use of the mistletoe that at Christmas and New Year's time garnishes our houses and looks down on happy meetings of gathered families and loving friends, observing an old pagan rite. The term "Yule," and the cry "Hogmanay" with which our boyhood was familiar at New Year's time, and which is of universal usage, at least in Scotland, are both relics of heathenism—it being by this cry that the people were summoned to the sacrifices of their god, and to his festival, which they celebrated with revels and universal conviviality. We might wonder why a period of the year specially calculated to excite solemn and serious thoughts should ever have been set apart for entertainments calculated rather to dissipate than excite such thoughts, and for convivial indulgences which often equalled, perhaps exceeded, in their drunken excesses those of heathenism. But this accounts for it. Nor is it difficult to explain how these and also other customs survived the pagan worship to which they originally belonged. It is well known that the term Easter is taken from the worship of the old goddess Astarte, or Ashtaroth: it is equally well-known that the robes of the Roman Catholic priesthood, and very many of the forms through which they go, were copied from those of heathen temples; and the door by which these and other corruptions came into the Christian Church, was the well-intended but unwise policy of her early missionaries. They sought to convert the heathen by accommodating the new worship to the seasons and fashions of the old. Impatient, animated by zeal, but in many instances zeal without knowledge, the good men who found it difficult to abolish the pagan rites and forgot that "he who believeth shall not make haste," endeavoured to give them a Christian turn. So, finding it hard to wean the people from their old habit of cutting the mistletoe, they sought to baptize it to Christianity, and to win or please converts by hanging it up in their churches; while they winked at, if they did not encourage the feasting and banqueting, the eating and drinking, the fun and folly, with which the pagans at New Year's time celebrated the festival of their god.

It was not long ere the Church found out her mistake, in acting on expediency rather than on principle. The feasting and merriment which, for the purpose of reconciling them to Christianity, she allowed her converts to continue indulging in at New Year's time, reached a vast height in France, for instance. Strong complaints were made to the Gallic Synods of great excesses being committed on the last night of the old and the first of the new year. It appears that companies of both sexes, dressed in fantastic habits, and called bachelettes or guisarts, ran about the streets, and entered even the churches, disturbing the devotion of the worshippers. Crying, "Au gui menez, Tire-lire-Mainte du blanc et point du bis," they demanded both money and wassail. This will recall to Scotchmen (I know not if to Englishmen also) the name of guizards, given to those who in our early days went about painted and masked, singing songs, and also their cry, "Give us your white bread and none of your grey?" The Bishop of Angres, who says that the cries of the guisarts were derived from the ancient Druids, makes grievous complaints of the licentiousness of the people at New Year's time. To such an extent indeed was their bacchanalianism carried in his day, that the French Government had to step forward and repress it by the strong arm of the law.

This history teaches us, as do many things else, that there is no reformation so good in its ultimate results as what our fathers called a "root and branch" one. To win over the heathen, by removing impediments which interpose between them and Christianity, some missionaries in our day have lent a sort of sanction to polygamy, and permitted their converts to continue practices that properly belong to idolatry. And when we see good men even now persuading themselves that such measures are lawful, need we wonder that in earlier and less enlightened times the apostles of Northern Europe endeavoured to compromise matters by engrafting the new religion on some portions of the old? Compromises in worldly affairs which involve no question of truth and principle, cannot be too much commended. In moral and religious matters, they cannot be too strongly condemned. Let the Churches beware of establishing any such truce between truth and falsehood. Many of these are separated on what might be called points rather than principles; on matters of remote and doubtful inference rather than of plain and direct revelation. But though I therefore think that union among Protestant denominations is not only exceedingly desirable, but much more attainable than many suppose, yet no schemes toward it, toward the conversion of the heathen, or toward reconciling worldly men to religion, to Christ and his cross, should be entertained that involve the smallest compromise either of the doctrines or the morals of our holy faith. This were to sew a piece of new cloth into an old garment, to pour new wine into old bottles.

Though I have traced the peculiar and convivial customs of the new year to paganism, I should be sorry that anyone supposed that I regard otherwise than with favour the kindly greetings and gifts, the family gatherings and innocent convivialities which make the shortest among the happiest days of the year. Happy the homes where songs as well as psalms drown the roaring of the storm, and affection and mirth diffuse such light and warmth within the house as to make us forget the biting cold and darkness without. In foretelling the return of God's banished people, Jeremiah says that "in all their dwellings shall be heard the voice of thanksgiving and the voice of them that make merry," and so should our homes be, when, saying with the poet—we hail the advent of its successor. But it is sad to take farewell of the old year without any grateful remembrance of its mercies, and sorrowful thought of its sins; to have the mirth without the thanksgiving; and reckless of the temptations, and trials, and sorrows, and difficulties and deaths the new year may bring, to allow that to run into excess, and our convivialities into debauchery. The time is one for enjoyment; but not certainly more for enjoyment than for suitable reflections on the past, and good resolutions for the future. And it is shocking to see these drowned in the drinking bowl—the voice of conscience lost in riot and uproar!

But without anxious and even prayerful care, the customs of the season were very apt to lead to excess. For instance, in the old times in England, the head of the house assembled his family round a bowl of spiced ale, and, drinking their healths, handed it round to the others,—every one as he lifted the bowl saying in good old Saxon, "Waes hael," or "To your health;" an expression in which we find the origin of the word wassail,—the wassail-bowl. A similar custom prevailed, and to some extent still prevails, in Scotland. When the clock struck twelve the members of the family drank to each other's health in the hot pint, as it was called; following this up with dances and mirth and merry-making. Nor was this all; it was succeeded by what proved a much greater temptation to sobriety and virtue. Carrying this bowl, replenished with ale and spices, they sallied forth to visit their neighbours, entering each house with uproarious cheers, and exchanging friendly greetings in drink given and received. A very common result of this first footing, as it was called, and of the drink besides friendly greetings which they exchanged with all whom they encountered on the road, was that ere the new year had almost begun, conviviality had run into riot, and brutal drunkenness lay in the gutters, or went staggering along the streets. And, though the habits of this age are a great improvement on former times—not indeed because the whisky bottle has been substituted for the hot pint—our towns still present many disgraceful spectacles at New Year's time. In walking the streets of Edinburgh how have I been filled with disgust and sorrow!—thankful, however, that it was not the season when foreigners visited the city, else we must have blushed for our country and its religion as we looked them in the face.

Edinburgh, more perhaps than any other place, used to celebrate the New Year with Saturnalian rites. The principal streets were more thronged between twelve and one o'clock on New Year's Day morning than at mid-day in the full tide of business; and, as if to make up for their usually strict and grave, if not stern, demeanour, the people, like a bow too strongly bent and suddenly unbent, sprung into the opposite extreme. Even women relaxed not a little of their usual modesty; and grave citizens became bacchanalians. So soon as the Tron Church steeple rung out the midnight hour, a tremendous shout rose and rent the air. At that signal the crowd rushed into the wildest excesses; and orgies were begun, with little distinction of sex, age, or rank, that, traceable to the days of paganism, were a disgrace to Christianity. Happily, this pagan institution, as it might be called, has never recovered from a blow it received some fifty or sixty years ago. The city roughs and blackguards of that time combined together to turn the occasion into one of plunder. The least resistance offered them was met by assaults, so violent and bloody that in several instances they resulted in death. Justice had to draw her sword: and the end of the Saturnalia was a spectacle which filled the city with pity, and grief, and horror. Three boys, who had been engaged in the robberies and violences of that night, were brought out to the scaffold, and hanged up in the face of the sun. The stern and terrible lesson was not lost. These three young corpses, turning slowly in the wind, made an indelible impression on the mind of Edinburgh; and as the drunken orgies of the season have ever since then been checked—we cannot say altogether eradicated—the event was one of many which show how God in his providence makes good spring out of evil, and crime find a cure in its own excesses.

Whether it was for the purpose of checking the excesses of this season by a better and more Christian way, that John Wesley established a "Watch-night" at New Year's time, I know not. Probably it was. The revival among the Methodists of this very ancient custom was not due, however, to the new year, or to its excesses. The earliest notice of it in Wesley's Journal is in these terms:—"Friday, Jan. 9, 1742. —We had the first watch-night in London. We commonly choose for this solemn service the Friday night nearest the full moon, either before or after, that those of the congregation who live at a distance may have light to their several homes. The service begins at half an hour past eight, and continues till a little after midnight. We have often found a peculiar blessing at these seasons. There is generally a deep awe upon the congregation, perhaps in some measure owing to the silence of the night, particularly in singing the hymn with which we commonly conclude—

> 'Hearken to the solemn voice,
> The awful midnight cry!
> Waiting souls, rejoice, rejoice,
> And feel the Bridegroom nigh.'"

Elsewhere he writes, "About this time I was informed that several persons in Kingswood frequently met together at the school; and when they could spare the time, spent the greater part of the night in prayer and praise and thanksgiving. Some advised me to put an end to this; but upon weighing the thing thoroughly, and comparing it with the practice of the ancient Christians, I could see no cause to forbid it. Rather, I believed it might be made of more general use. So I sent them word, I designed to watch with them on the Friday nearest the full moon, that we might have light thither and back again. I gave public notice of this the Sunday before, and withal, that I intended to preach; desiring they, and they only, would meet me there who could do it without prejudice to their business or families. On Friday abundance of people came. I began preaching between eight and nine, and we continued till a little beyond the noon of night, singing, praying, and praising God. This we have continued to do once a month ever since in Bristol, London, and Newcastle, as well as Kingswood; and exceeding great are the blessings we have found therein: it has generally been an extremely solemn season, when the word of God sunk deep into the heart even of those who till then knew Him not. If it be said, 'This was only owing to the novelty of the thing (the circumstance which still draws such multitudes together at those seasons), or perhaps to the awful silence of the night,' I am not careful to answer in this matter. Be it so: however, the impression then made on many souls has never been effaced. Now, allowing that God did make use either of the novelty or any other indifferent circumstance in order to bring sinners to repentance, yet they are brought. And herein let us rejoice together. Nay, may I not put the case farther yet? If I can probably conjecture that, either by the novelty of this ancient custom, or by any other indifferent circumstance, it is in my power to 'save a soul from death, and hide a multitude of sins,' am I clear before God if I do it not?—if I do not snatch that brand out of the burning?"

"Sir," says Wesley elsewhere in repelling the attack of a Rev. Mr. Baily of Cork, "you charge me with holding 'midnight assemblies.' Sir, did you never see the word 'Vigil' in your Common Prayer Book? Do you know what it means? If not, permit me to tell you, that it was customary with the ancient Christians to spend whole nights in prayer; and that these nights were termed Vigilæ, or Vigils. Therefore, for spending a part of some nights in this manner, in public and solemn prayer, we have not only the authority of our national Church, but of the universal Church in the earliest ages."

So wrote John Wesley. To those who blamed him for setting his hymns to tunes that, though of great merit, were in many cases associated with profane songs, he had replied, "I see no reason why the devil should have all the good music." No wonder that this same man, like soldiers who dash boldly on a park of artillery to seize it and turn on the enemy their own guns, should conceive and carry out the idea of turning a night of debauchery into one of devotion—at least of such services as would by God's blessing guard people from excess, and teach them to join trembling with their mirth. Wise in his generation as the children of this world in theirs, Wesley did not think it enough simply to denounce the drinking and debauchery of the time. He knew human nature better. He was not ignorant of the principle which Dr. Chalmers illustrates in one of his noblest sermons, this, namely, "the expulsive power of a new affection." So, without attempting to altogether abolish an old custom, he said, By all means celebrate the advent of the New Year, not, however, with the dissipation of pagans, but the devotion of Christians. And in this exercise we resolved to take part, with a congregation of his followers, on the last night of 1865.

We repaired to their chapel a little after ten o'clock. The riot of the streets had already begun; and it was a great relief to escape from them, and find ourselves quietly seated amidst a congregation whose countenances, as became their position, bore a mingled expression of happiness and solemnity. It was pleasant to see so large an assembly on such a night and at such an hour; and to recognise numbers who though, like ourselves, belonging to another than the Wesleyan communion, had gone to unite with their brethren of that Church in the solemn, striking service which I proceed to describe.

The minister appeared in the pulpit punctually at half-past ten, robed in gown and bands—a costume, by the way, not used by the Methodists in England, though their Conference has too much good sense to quarrel with its use in Scotland, or to insist in such minor matters on a rigid and unnatural uniformity. He began the services by reading out a hymn, which the people sang with Methodist spirit to the music of an organ. The full burst of their earnest and ringing voices all but drowned the sound of its pipes, and demonstrated that an organ, whatever objections people may have to instrumental music as an aid to psalm singing, does not always, and need never, supersede or interfere with vocal praise—the song of grateful hearts rising from hallowed lips. They sung:—

"Jesus the Conqueror reigns
In glorious strength arrayed,
His kingdom over all maintains,
And bids the earth be glad.

Ye sons of men, rejoice
In Jesu's mighty love;
Lift up your heart, lift up your voice,
To Him who rules above.

Extol his kingly power;
Kiss the exalted Son,
Who died, and lives to die no more,
High on his Father's throne.

Our Advocate with God,
He undertakes our cause,
And spreads thro' all the earth abroad
The victory of his cross.

That bloody banner see,
And in your Captain's sight,
Fight the good fight of faith with me—
My fellow-soldiers, fight!"

After this, Mr. James, the minister, offered up a very impressive prayer, acknowledging the mercies and also the sins of the past year—seeking grateful hearts and pardon through the blood of Christ—in view of the year about to enter, renewing vows and dedications to God, with earnest prayer for grace to do its duties, to meet its trials, to resist its temptations, to bear its burdens, and to be ready for the deaths it might bring. Another hymn was then sung, and the 90th Psalm, beginning with these words: "Lord, thou hast been our dwelling-place in all generations," read,—and read impressively. After the congregation had again sung, the minister, choosing for his subject these words of 1 Samuel vii. 12, "Samuel took a stone, and set it between Mizpeh and Shen, and called the name of it Eben-ezer, saying, Hitherto hath the Lord helped us," delivered an appropriate address. At its close the congregation sang:—

"How many pass the guilty night
In revellings and frantic mirth!
The creature is their sole delight,
Their happiness the things of earth;
For us suffice the season past;
We choose the better part at last.

We will not close our wakeful eyes,
We will not let our eyelids sleep,
But humbly lift them to the skies
And all a solemn vigil keep:
So many years on sin bestowed,
Can we not watch one night for God?

We can, O Jesus, for thy sake,
Devote our every hour to Thee:
Speak but the word, our souls shall wake,
And sing with cheerful melody;
Thy praise shall our glad tongues employ,
And every heart shall dance for joy.

Oh may we all triumphant rise,
With joy upon our heads return,
And far above those nether skies,
By Thee on eagle's wings upborne,
Thro' all yon radiant circles move,
And gain the highest heaven of love!"

The minister now descended, and resigned the pulpit for half an hour to a local preacher; and I may remark, by the way, that his address, directed chiefly in warning words to young men and women, proved that though a liberal education is of great value to ministers, he may be an effective speaker who has never been at College. A few minutes before twelve o'clock this worthy man brought his remarks to a close. Mr. James returned to the pulpit; and having addressed the congregation in a few solemn and weighty words, he said that there were now only some two or three minutes of the old year to run, and these he would recommend them to pass in secret communion with God. Then the whole congregation, following his example, bowed the head, and fell on their knees in silent prayer. During these few minutes an awful solemnity filled the house,—a stillness on which the hour, as it struck one beat on the clock, announcing that one year was gone and another begun, broke with startling effect. At Manchester, where I first witnessed this most impressive service, the effect was still greater. There, the clock rung out its full twelve beats; and as they slowly and solemnly succeeded each other, they sounded like the last dying throbs of the expiring year. So soon as the ringing out the old and ringing in the new year had brought us to the end of one, and the beginning of another, stage in life's journey, the whole congregation rose to their feet; and, like men who spring forward anew, on a heavenward race, for a heavenly crown, they burst out into this song:—

"Come, let us anew our journey pursue,
Roll round with the year,
And never stand still till the Master appear.
His adorable will let us gladly fulfil,
And our talents improve,
By the patience of hope, and the labour of love.

Our life is a dream; our time, as a stream,
Glides swiftly away;
And the fugitive moment refuses to stay.
The arrow is flown; the moment is gone;
The millennial year
Rushes on to our view, and eternity's here.

O that each in the day of His coming may say,
"I have fought my way through,
I have finished the work Thou didst give me to do."
O that each from his Lord may receive the glad word,
"Well and faithfully done;
Enter into my joy, and sit down on my throne."

Ere the echoes of the hymn had died away, the minister rose to pronounce the blessing; and, the service closed, we went out into the starry night to hear the sound of revelry and riot—but to see nothing incongruous with our devotions in many of the congregation tarrying at the door to salute their acquaintances with a "Happy New Year!" and much hearty shaking of hands.

The most remarkable and impressive feature of this service was perhaps the depth and solemnity of the silence that filled the house, while the congregation engaged in secret prayer during the last moments of the old, dying year. It reminded me of scenes I had witnessed abroad at one of the most solemn parts of Roman Catholic worship. When the priest, after working the miracle of the mass, turns round to hold aloft at the full stretch of his arms, not in bread and wine a symbol of Christ's body, but, as the people are taught to believe, the very flesh and blood of the Son of God, the effect is quite remarkable. It is exceedingly impressive indeed, if the scene be a vast and noble cathedral, with its lofty pillars, and solemn aisles, and dim religious light, and full to the door with thousands of worshippers. At that moment, as if with one soul, the mighty congregation drop on their knees, and every head is bent adoring to the ground. Standing near by the high altar, with the sea of faces before us, it is wonderful to look out over these thousands,—all motionless as statues, amid silence deep as the grave's. There is no such silence outside, in nature; not on the shore, where in the quietest day wavelets break, and sea-birds scream; nor in the gloom of the forest, where the wind goes whispering among the branches, and withered leaves fall whirling to the ground; nor in the loneliest glen, where the distant baying of a watch-dog, the murmur of a hidden stream, the hum of bee or beetle, relieves the silence. Yonder, with their God held on high before prostrate thousands, no sound whatever—rustle of gown, ruffle of moving foot, lowest whisper—falls on the ear. Each one, penetrated with awe, seems to hold his breath—the scene, the deep stillness such as to remind the spectator of these Scriptures, "There was silence in heaven," "I fell at his feet as dead."

"Watch-night" among the Methodists, outraging neither human reason nor God's Word, as the other does, is, even in its outward aspect, not less impressive. At the solemn midnight hour, and on the eve of another year, the voice of man is stilled; and, amid the deepest silence, the whole living assembly, each as if he were alone, engages in inward prayer. The time, the place, the awful stillness, the vast multitude around, each holding secret communion with God, presents a scene that might sober a bacchanalian, and move the most indifferent to prayer. And now may I not ask, why should not all other Churches, in the Methodists' new-year's night service, take a leaf out of their book, wherever circumstances render it both practicable and convenient? The bigotry of Papists is not worse than, or indeed so inexcusable as, that which maintains we have nothing to learn from others in the ordinances of God's house and worship. It were ludicrous, if it was not sad, to find good Protestants who deny infallibility to the Pope, and yet, resisting all change, seem to regard their fathers or themselves as infallible; and their own old system as so perfect that it is incapable of improvement. What else is that than to say, "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are we!"

Very seldom have I worshipped with Christians of other denominations, either at home or abroad, with my countrymen or with foreigners—French, Swiss, Germans, or Italians, without seeing something in their churches which I would have been happy to engraft on my own. And this is a feeling, I venture to say, common to all who, while enjoying the privilege of worshipping with other denominations, have sought to see in their services not what they might condemn, but might admire and imitate. It is good to be conservative, but not of defects. In these days of bold attacks, from unexpected quarters, on our most sacred and cherished beliefs, let all on the watchtowers of Zion sound forth, "Thus saith the Lord, Stand ye in the ways and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." But though it is our duty to keep by the old roads, it may not be our duty to keep by the old ruts. Between old roads and old ruts, there is a great and too much forgotten distinction. What is commendable in Churches other than our own, why should we be such bigots as not to copy? Who can afford to dispense with what other good, intelligent, and pious Christians have found to be aids to devotion? The tide runs strong the other way; and we need to crowd all sail on the mast to advance in grace, and at length arrive in heaven.

To the lateness of these Watch-night services, no one can justly object. They occur but once a year; and hours as late are not held a valid objection to balls, to theatres, or even to the occasionally protracted social meetings of such as would frequent neither the one nor the other. Where can we so well take leave of the old year with all its sins to answer for, or enter on the new with all its trials to encounter, as in the House of God? The solemnities of the service are eminently calculated to restrain the excesses of the season. They teach us, what we are prone to forget, amid its festivities to rejoice with trembling. Nor can I doubt were all our congregations, where convenient, to meet after the fashion of the Methodists,—as is done in some Episcopalian churches in London—many of our people would bless God, and say with Wesley, "EXCEEDING GREAT ARE THE BLESSINGS WE HAVE FOUND THEREIN: IT HAS GENERALLY BEEN AN EXTREMELY SOLEMN SEASON WHERE THE WORD OF GOD SANK DEEP INTO THE HEART."

THE BURDEN OF DUMAH.

"He calleth to me out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, The morning cometh, and also the night: if ye will enquire, enquire ye: return, come."—Isaiah xxi. 11, 12.

THE words are so elliptical and so enigmatical that we might naturally look to the context for their explanation.

But there is no context. The words read are themselves a complete whole. "The Burden of Dumah" stands between two other "burdens," forming by itself an entire utterance, an entire chapter of prophecy, utterly alone and isolated as to any connection or any coherence with the rest.

And how little, at first sight, can we make of it!

"The burden of Dumah." What is Dumah?

"He calleth to me." Who calleth?

"The watchman said." Who is the watchman?

It was a custom of ancient times—illustrated for us by the Prophet Ezekiel—to set a watchman on some frontier height of a country threatened with invasion, to give warning of the enemy's approach by sounding a trumpet-note of alarm.

Now it is evident, I think, that in this passage the watchman of Dumah is the Prophet of Israel. Across the ridge of Seir comes the voice of enquiry to him in Jerusalem. God had entrusted to him many burdens, many oracles, concerning surrounding nations. To him therefore, in the prophetic imagery, these nations are represented as turning for information. It is as though they had taken him for their watchman, and now called to him, in the anxieties of a calamitous time, "Watchman, what of the night?" how goes the night? what hour, what watch, are we in? is the dawn near? is the darkness soon to pass? In other words, God has told thee his secrets concerning us: tell us then, what hope is there? is the judgment yet far spent? is the calamity which oppresses us soon to be overpast? The neighbouring nations are to share in the overthrow of Israel under the giant strength of Babylon: then let Israel's Prophet show them how far the tide of distress is to go, and at what point God shall say to it, "No further!"

But the answer is a mere riddle.

"The watchman said, The morning cometh, and also the night." They could have told that without him! Yes, day and night succeed each other—and that is all that he will say! It is night now: it will be morning: and then after a time it will be night again. Make of my words what ye will! The vision is sealed. God vouchsafes to you no other answer. "If ye will enquire, enquire ye," but there is no response: "return, come"—go back, and come yet again—still there shall be no voice, nor any to answer, nor any that regardeth!

This is not perhaps the common interpretation; but it seems best to express the absolute blank and silence of the prophetic information. Morning cometh, and night cometh: daylight and darkness will have their vicissitudes and their alternations: but when or how—with what relief from trouble, with what access of consolation—this I say not: God has no message for you: enquire if you will—go if ye will, or come if ye will—no Divine utterance shall be given you: humble yourselves only beneath the mighty hand of God, if perhaps He may exalt you in due time.

Now, if this be the spirit of the passage, it will make the first application of it to ourselves somewhat different from that commonly given.

Why has the watchman no better answer for the enquiry from Dumah?

Simply because it comes from a race which has no habitual dealings with God.

Edom, if so it be—or else Arabia—is out of the pale of Israel, a foreigner to the covenants of promise. And if Edom, or if Arabia, wants an answer from God in its hour of anxiety or of distress, it must begin by coming over to God's side, and incorporating itself with the people of his choice and of his adoption.

I. The direct applications of this principle are many and various.

(1) How often, in these times, do we find persons utterly irreligious and worldly, entering into questions concerning God and his truth, concerning Revelation, Inspiration, Miracle, and Prophecy, as though they had a right to all the enlightenment and all the comfort and all the assurance which the saints of God have for their guidance and for their upholding. The cry comes from Dumah, it echoes across the ridge of Seir, it sounds in the ear of the solitary watchman on the afflicted heights of Zion, "Watchman, what of the night? watchman, what of the night?" Tell me, thou man of God, how stands the matter between faith and scepticism? Give me on the instant, give me in brief compass, give me in terms concise and conclusive, a reason for the hope that is in thee, and for the faith once delivered to the saints! Assure me of the eternal verities brought to earth by One who had seen them and even framed them in heaven—and then send me back—for I am in haste—into the world which I love, or to the sin which I cherish, a firm believer, a hopeful happy Christian, as safe for eternity as tranquil for time!

What saith the answer of God to the demand thus addressed to Him?

"The morning cometh, and also the night: if ye will enquire, enquire ye: return, come."

To the careless questioner all truth is an enigma. Yes, day comes, and then night again. What of the night? O, it is far spent—the day is at hand! What of the night? O, it is dark and cloudy—the rain falls, and the dew is heavy—the moon has set, and the houses are darkened! What of the night? O, it is running its course: it may be midnight, it may be near the cock-crowing—what is that to thee? thou sleepest—sleep on!

"Ye will enquire?" Enquire ye! Yes, ask all your questions: go, and come again: spend your day in slumber, your night in dancing: and yet put in between times your half-meant half-jesting questions, "What is truth? and evidence what? and what the Bible?" if ye will enquire, enquire ye: but the response must at last be a riddle to him who so questions!

Not in the tone of ridicule—God forbid—and not in the spirit of arrogance, as though the watchman cared not for the miseries of Edom; but rather for the sake of Edom—because such questioning cannot profit—because an answer to such questioning could be only for evil—because it is not well for man that he should combine God and the world, a frivolous life with a calm assurance of salvation—are the words here written, and do we seek so to use them, as if a prepared mind were a first condition of religious knowledge, an earnest resolution after God a necessary prerequisite for the study of his truth and the reception of his salvation.

It is not very uncommon for a person by no means earnest (in general) in his desires after God, to find himself so placed at a particular moment as to be in extreme want of guidance and direction. Some decision has to be made, which evidently involves serious consequences; consequences to the success of a life—consequences, incidentally, to the safety of the soul. He wants counsel. If he had lived in the old days, he would have gone to an oracle. As it is, he must do the next best thing: he must somehow or other, if it be possible, ascertain the mind of God. He kneels down: O God, direct me! He opens his Bible: he will see what verse his eye first rests upon: it may give him the clue he looks for! He goes to a Clergyman: "Watchman, what of the night?" how stands my case? direct, guide, rule me!

And what is there wrong in this? Ought not men to seek God in perplexity? Is not that the very use of the ministry, of the Bible, of prayer—to give counsel? How is it then, that I kneel, and get no answer? that I read, and get no direction? that I ask, and obtain no light? How is it, that all I can learn is that which I knew already, "The morning cometh, and also the night?" that my application seems to be flung back to me with the taunting mocking rejoinder, "If ye will enquire, enquire ye"—yea, come, and come again, and it shall be all even as now?

This is because the cry comes not from the holy city, but from the field of Edom: because he who asks, asks just for once, but seeks not habitually God's instruction: because he asks in indolence, asks in superstition, or asks in presumption; cares not to stay in the sanctuary; scarcely even intends, scarcely even professes, to meditate a change of life or a resolution of soul. The best thing for him is, to find that God cannot be trifled with, cannot be taken by halves, cannot send his oracle across the mountains of Seir, to be made merchandise of in the tents of Kedar. He who would ask, "Watchman, what of the night?" must not ask from Dumah, must not call out of Seir, but come himself with his question, and come to stay!

(3) And so is it in a third case, of a more general kind than either of the former.

It is no rare thing to hear the complaint that a man finds no comfort in his religion; that it gives him no support in trial, no comfort in trouble, no strength in temptation, no life in death. He reads every day in his Bible; he prays at night and in the morning: but it is as if the only answer he ever received was that discouraging and daunting one, "The morning cometh, and also the night"—"if ye will enquire, enquire ye"—but it shall be all one as if ye enquired not! Ah! there are many who go through life with this sort of constantly damped and evermore repelled hope. When they pray, it is like speaking in some empty Cathedral, where, from gallery and roof and vacant aisle, there comes back to me just the echo of the voice I uttered, and nothing else or more: it is as if they asked the question, "What of the night?" and the only reply was the vague unmeaning intelligence, "The morning cometh, and also the night—if ye will enquire, enquire ye!"

There is no doubt at all why this is: and would to God it were as easy to remove as to discern the cause! In these cases the prayer comes from Dumah—the cry sounds out of Seir: the religion, such as it is, is a thing loose and external, a thing put on and put off by hours of the day and by days of the week; something which does not enter into the whole being; something which is a mere adjunct and circumstance, a propriety, not a necessity, of the life; not an expression of the heart, and not a characteristic of the man. Therefore its only answer is the rebound and echo of the question. "Watchman, what of the night?" "The morning cometh, and also the night." The counsel of the prophet can only be, Come out of Dumah, cross the ridge of Seir: "Come ye and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob:" yea, come ye to dwell in Jerusalem, and let us walk day by day in the light of the Lord.

II. And now turn to the brighter aspect of the subject, and see how the same question would be received from one of the redeemed and faithful people.

"Watchman, what of the night?"

(1) Let the Christian minister hear himself thus addressed, by one of Christ's humble watchful disciples, in reference to the condition of the Church and the signs of the times.

St. Paul justifies such a use of the figure when he says in his Epistle to the Romans, "The night is far spent." The present state has more in it of night than of day.

Night is the time of slumber. And where is he amongst us, whose soul is quite awake? Where is he, who is always wakeful? never overtaken with weariness in well-doing? never forgetting to watch unto prayer? never flagging in hope, and never fainting in effort?

Night is the time of illusion. It is then that fancies, which daylight would dissipate, hold possession of the morbid imagination and the over-wrought brain. And where is the Christian who in this life is the sport of no illusions? Where is he who does not sometimes mistake phantoms for substances, and the fleeting for the permanent? Where is he who can at all times judge of things important and things trifling quite as Christ judges; quite as he will judge himself when he once reaches heaven?

Night is the time of danger. It is then that bad men wake, and lay snares against the innocent. It is then that deeds, emphatically called of darkness, are done upon this earth under cover of that shaded light which God meant for the repose of his beloved. Even so is time the opportunity of evil; and they who are still in the body—even Christian men—are exposed to ten thousand temptations which the day of a cloudless changeless future will dismiss into nothingness for them for ever.

Time is night: eternity day.

And what of this night? How speeds it? Are we in the first watch of it, or the second? Are we at its cock-crowing, or close upon morning?

St. Paul said, even in his day, This night of time is far spent.

Were the words not true? If true then, are they not true now?

Can the watchman tell us anything of this great, this urgent question? Must he answer us, as he would have to answer the careless enquirer, "The morning cometh, and also the night?" May he not say a little more than that—that which is nothing?

He must not indeed take it upon him to say that we are thus or thus far advanced, in years or even in centuries, towards the great final Advent. We have not so learned Christ, as to count it safe or true to profess to tell of times or seasons which the Father hath put in his own power.

But may we not just say this—that many of the signs of the latter days are upon this age? many of the characteristics of that era of which St. Paul says again that men shall then be "selfish, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof?" and St. Peter, that "there shall come in the last days scoffers walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming?" Do we not see in every new form of scepticism, in every new device of ungodliness, in every new craft and assault of the devil, a symptom—not decisive it may be, yet real and significant—of the approach of that last end of which it is written, "Nevertheless when the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?"

We shall not answer only, "The morning cometh, and also the night:" we shall bid, rather, even the wise virgins to arise, and trim their lamps: saying, "The day is at hand: let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and let us put on the armour of light."

And we shall add also, in a sense different from that hitherto put upon them, the following words of the text, "If ye will enquire, enquire ye." We shall urge upon the dutiful servant the fitness of that spirit of enquiry, that searching and pondering and comparing of God's Holy Word, that attitude of vigilance and of expectation, which becomes those who are looking for and hasting unto the coming of the day of God. We shall say, "Return" from every wandering, whether of act or thought, and "come" home, one and all, to the centre of peace and strength, of wisdom, of holiness, and of happiness, to be found only in that Divine life which is hidden for us with Christ in God.

(2.) And so, finally, the question, "What of the night?" will have a seasonable and serviceable application to the individual life.

What means, it may be asked, this "night" of depression? Why is my heart thus heavy? Why go I mourning all the day long, and find no help for me in my God? Why is it, that, seeking Him all the day long, I receive no answer? never know what it is to feel myself safe or at rest, or even making progress towards the haven where God knows I would be? What of this night? Shall it be for ever? Shall there be no rest and no comfort, or none on this side of the grave? What of this night? Has it any explanation, any use, any purpose of love? Can the watchman answer? May he not say, to such a questioner, All is of love—and all shall be well? To humble thee, and to keep thee humble—that He may do thee good at thy latter end—therefore doth God thus deal with thee. Be still, and know that He is God—and He shall exalt thee in due time. Dwell not too much upon frames of soul, which change and vary, recur and pass away: "the morning cometh," with its bright gleam of comfort; "and also the night" again in its season, with a lowering sky and a threatening to-morrow: but, amidst all these, God is the same. He changes not. Commit thy way unto Him—tarry his leisure—and "at evening time"—if not before—"at evening time it shall be light."

Or what means this night of bereavement? Why this heavy, heavy sorrow? the desire of mine eyes taken away with a stroke—this child, so full of promise, so full of comfort, so full of love—this friend, this brother, this parent, this pastor, who was as needful at least to my welfare as to my happiness? "What of this night?" this dark, dark night? O, it is the easiest of all questions for the Christian watchman! He is gone, because God loved him: he is gone, that he might be taken away from evil to come: he is gone, because God would draw your hearts upward, and because He would make heaven for you more home-like! Yes, He chides not your tears; but He will one day wipe them from your face: certainly, if not sooner, when you go to the departed, and He stands ready to welcome you into the everlasting habitations. Go forth, yet a little longer, into the work-field of your earthly day, as those who have more stored above, and less risked below!

And "what of the night?" it may be asked of the watchman yet once more, in reference to the shortening days of each one of us, and the approaching close. What can we do, each one, to improve the remaining days or weeks or months or years? How can we so number our days as to apply our hearts unto wisdom? What is there, let each one ask himself, on his knees in the secret chamber of his worship, what is there which I can yet cast out of me of evil, and what is there which I can yet bring into me of good? Not as a duty, not as a burden, not as a mere condition of safety, but rather as a bright hope and a glorious aspiration, How can I get nearer to God? how can I glorify Him on the earth? how can I so live as to remind men of Him, and so die as to make them love Him? "What of the night?" not now for the Church, but for me, even for me? How stands the reckoning of its swiftly passing hours? Am I near in time, then am I also near in state, to that solemn dawn, to that blessed day, which shall be for me the end of earth and the beginning of heaven? If "the morning cometh," so "also the night:" the bright morning for these, the dismal night for those! O let me be found of Him in peace! Let me not be ashamed before Him at his coming! "Enquire, enquire"—"return, come"—while yet the Bridegroom tarries, while yet the dying lamp can be rekindled! "The night is far spent:"—O see that "the day" be heaven!

C. J. Vaughan.

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.

The winter of 1865-66 would seem to have been given to the angel that poured out his vial upon the sea. On land, the mildness of the season has been the subject of universal remark; but the average of severity has been more than reached by the extraordinary gales that have raged on the ocean. The most exposed parts of our shores, from which disaster is seldom long absent, have lately witnessed an unprecedented number of casualties. Forty wrecks, and the loss of not less than seventy lives, at Torbay, during single gale, attest the fatality of the storm at that spot. In the middle of January the Board of Trade reported between 300 and 400 shipwrecks, and the number must have been vastly increased during the gales that have followed. Of all the memorials of this terrible season, none has left such a mark on the public mind as the loss of the Australian steamer, the "London." Even the proverbial rapidity with which, in these times of daily newspapers, one event of public interest succeeds another, has failed to obliterate, almost even to lessen, the vivid impression of that terrible tragedy. Many things have contributed to deepen the interest in the "London." The terrible warning which the passengers had of the coming catastrophe; the earnestness with which they strove, while a ray of hope remained, to avert it; the calmness with which at last they met their doom; the almost miraculous escape of the boatfull, but for whom conjecture would have been on the rack for months as to the fate of the vessel; the calm courage with which the captain clung to duty, even when hope had gone; and, above all, the noble manner in which both Dr. Woolley and Mr. Draper sought to guide all their fellow-passengers to Him whose grace is so precious in the hour of unexpected death—such things have all contributed to give pre-eminent interest to the story of this ill-fated vessel. Of the mercies which were mingled with this terrible disaster, not the least to the 220 who were drowned was the circumstance which gave them the presence of Mr. Draper, a Wesleyan minister, returning to Australia, who had been advised to pay a visit to Sinai and Palestine, but had declined the advice, through eagerness to return to his colonial work. It will be long before such scenes vanish from recollection as those in which he took a principal part. "When Captain Martin, in answer to a unanimous appeal, calmly announced the cessation of all human hope, a solemn silence prevailed, broken only at brief intervals by the well-timed and appropriate exhortations of Mr. Draper, whose spiritual services had been incessant during the previous twenty-four hours. Dismay was present to every heart, but disorder to none. Mothers were weeping over little ones about to be engulfed, and the children, ignorant of the coming death, were pitifully inquiring the cause of so much woe. Friends were taking leave of friends, as if for a long journey; others were crouched down with Bibles in their hands, endeavouring to snatch consolation from passages long-known, perhaps long-neglected." Thus, even the wild voice of the storm became a preacher of the Gospel; let us hope that many an ear heard the voice of the Saviour saying sweetly above the voice of the waters, "It is I, be not afraid."

Among the vessels that were in imminent danger during the storm, but that contrived to reach a haven was the "John Williams," the missionary ship whose launching at Aberdeen was noticed by us a few months ago, and which was on her way to the South Seas, with a missionary freight. The same calmness that prevailed in the "London" reigned in the cabin of the "John Williams," where, though the passengers were fewer, the proportion of those who knew by experience where to find support and consolation was probably greater. Gathered round the table, they alternately poured out their hearts in prayer, and sung such hymns as "Rock of ages, cleft for me." The scenes of terrible danger that have been brought so vividly before the public may well awaken our sympathies for those that go down to the sea in ships; while both to seamen and landsmen they seem designed to give new emphasis to the old lesson, "Be ye also ready."

When, speaking last month of the Sunday Services for the people in St. Martin's Hall, in which the gospel of science was to be made palateable by selections of sacred music by eminent performers, we remarked that the promoters of such meetings were not generally very self-denying or enthusiastic, we hardly expected that the history of the undertaking would so soon exemplify the remark. It has been found, or at least suspected, that meetings of the kind, for which a money charge is made, are contrary to the law, and the lectures for the present are stopped. The instructive thing is, that the promoters had not the generosity to throw themselves on the spontaneous offerings of those who attended the meetings, but have resolved, it is said, to institute a law-plea, in defence of the glorious right to make the people pay half-crowns and threepences for the only rational and enlightened mode of spending their Sunday evenings. Meanwhile, we observe that in New York a case involving the right to provide Sunday amusements for the public has been tried. The proprietor of a large beer and concert saloon, a very popular place of resort, at No. 519, Eighth Avenue, was convicted of having theatrical amusements at his place on Sunday. He did not deny that the law was against him, but pled that the law was obsolete, that the police did not make arrests under it, and therefore that he was at liberty to disregard it. The judge disallowed all his pleas, and sentenced him to a fine of fifty dollars, and imprisonment for two months.

Short though the career of the St. Martin's Hall Services has been, they have elicited opinions even from the secular press that show a great aversion to the theory on which they were founded, as well as to some of the views they were employed to advance. The lecturers were not content with that large field of science where no collision can occur with revealed truth, but eagerly fastened on positions from which they might fling sneers at the Bible, and all who believe it. The London Review, with deep regret, calls attention "to the melancholy and suggestive fact that many names connected with this destructive movement are names intimately connected with the University of London. These men clearly declare an open war with Christianity; they invade the sanctity of the Sabbath; they put a stumbling-block before the souls of the ignorant and the wavering; they tear to pieces the only record God has given us of his will, and of our duty and destiny; they treat all religions as so many forms of human superstition and human error; they would cultivate the mind, to the exclusion of the soul, with its immortal aspirations, hopes, and fears; and they seem to regard heaven and hell as myths, and the human soul as a blank. . . . . If this movement seeks only to teach scientific truths, and has no wish to interfere with the recognised forms of Christianity, are there not six days of the week on which they can devote themselves to so noble a task, without infringing upon the Lord's Day and its special duties, and without violating the sanctity of a day that all Christians more or less recognise and observe. If they profess to give religious instruction, let them tell us their creed, and what form and system of religious instruction they adopt." The Spectator refers to Professor Huxley's discourse, since published in the Fortnightly Review, as "stating notions destructive of all worship, except that very impossible kind of worship recommended by him, worship of the Unknown and Unknowable—notions which have been gaining more and more hold of merely scientific men for many generations, and which are absolutely inconsistent with admitting the activity of any supernatural will in the universe, and still more the actual occurrence of miracle." The able writer in the Spectator—one of the most independent newspapers of the day, and least bound by traditional views, as they are called—goes on to show the tendency of purely scientific studies to narrow one's view of the forces that are at work in the universe, and so to encourage the conclusion that as the forces of nature are constant, miracle is impossible. He then shows, that admitting that the forces of nature are immutable and indestructible, there is even in man, and much more in God, a power of controlling these forces, and directing them into channels into which they would not otherwise come. This power, exercised by God under certain conditions, produces miracles. The Spectator perhaps overstrains some facts in support of this position, but some notion may be formed of the perilous extent to which men of science are advancing their views when such journals feel constrained to lift up their protest against their fearful excesses.

The opposite sections in the Church of England give signs of greater activity in the maintenance and development of their views. The preparations for battle are especially obvious among the enemies and the supporters of the ritualistic movement. A "Church Association" has been formed, "not to obtain any party triumph, but to repress by legislation and other measures, the Romanizing movement which is now assuming such alarming proportions in the Church of England, especially as regards her ceremonial." A deputation, headed by Canon Wordsworth, has waited on the Archbishop of Canterbury, to present a memorial from the metropolitan clergy, urging him to use his influence to repress the advancing ritualism; but his Grace's reply was too cautious to warrant the expectation of active help. On the other hand, a very influential deputation, consisting of 150 clergymen and laymen, waited on the archbishop to present a memorial from 40,000 communicants, of whom upwards of 3000 were clergy, and the remainder laymen, against any alterations being made in the Book of Common Prayer. The Archbishop repeated his determination, already expressed, to give his consent to no alteration without the full concurrence of Convocation. There is little doubt that the subject will be prominently discussed during the session of Parliament; but the aversion of Parliament to legislate on Church questions will probably prevent any bill from being passed. There are symptoms, too, of more vigorous assault against the Church from without; the Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Control being evidently prepared for a vigorous campaign. It does not appear that the older members of the Evangelical party are satisfied with the views and spirit of some of the younger. At a recent conference of clergymen, under the auspices of the Vicar of Islington (the Rev. Daniel Wilson), that venerable minister gave utterance to somewhat desponding sentiments on the character and tendencies of the times. "Evangelical friends," he said, "to whom, hitherto, we have looked as the faithful and unflinching supporters of the truth, are seen here and there to give way, in a greater or less degree, to dangerous innovations, and to combine their evangelical teaching with a loose creed and still looser practice. Thus we find the services intoned, the churches profusely decorated, novel vestments adopted, and musical entertainments in support of religious objects patronised by those who, a few years ago, would have shrunk from these compliances. So again we hear loose statements made regarding the plenary inspiration of Scripture, and doubts thrown out as to the eternity of punishment, and even the doctrine of the Atonement, by those whom we should least have suspected of such tendencies. The old practices of our forefathers are by such compromisers despised; new light has broken in; the Bible is too old-fashioned for the present day; they shun the Cross; they dislike the name of party, and would fain merge the entire professing Church in one brotherhood. The Church Congresses now annually held have tended largely to this result. The support given to our beloved Church Missionary and other kindred societies is beginning to fail. The Evangelical men of the present day do not, I fear, as a body, faithfully represent the teaching and practices of their forefathers at the close of the last century, or even the originators of this very clerical meeting at which we are assembled, all of whom, with two or three exceptions, have now been removed from among us."

Among the ecclesiastical rumours that have been prevalent, one is, that a measure is to be brought forward for the endowment of the Roman Catholic priesthood in Ireland. The measure is said to have been thought of at the present time as a suitable acknowledgment of the services of the priests in discountenancing Fenianism among the members of their flocks. But wherever an opportunity has occurred for the expression of their own views on this proposal, it has been so clearly hostile as to render it unlikely that it will be actually brought forward. Whether his opposition is purely disinterested may be a question; it is quite possible that the heads of the Romish Church in that country may see that the acceptance of a regium donum would lessen their chance of higher game, which, looking carefully before them, it is likely that they are keeping steadily in view. On the subject of national education, it is suspected that concessions are to be made to the Romish party. The Catholic University, too, it is believed, is to be endowed, and the constitution of the Queen's Colleges, hitherto unsectarian, is proposed to be modified, also in conformity with Romish wishes.

The state of the poor, both in town and country, especially as regards their habitations, continues to excite a lively interest. The progress of the London railways is every year demolishing vast numbers of dwellings, to replace which no sufficient effort is made. The cry is becoming louder and louder for legislative interference, especially where public works like railways are demolishing houses, and for some pressure on the owners of land, particularly in the neighbourhood of large towns. Mr. Peabody, the American merchant, who, a few years ago, made a gift of 150,000*l.*, which he vested in trustees for the benefit of the deserving poor, has most generously added 100,000*l.* to his former gift. This may be regarded as a testimony of his approval of the decision of his trustees to spend his gift in the erection of houses for the working classes, and of their determination, so faithfully carried out, to prevent the wasteful expenditure of any part of the fund committed to them. Meanwhile the ill-housed condition of the London poor, besides receiving such illustrations as that of Dr. Jeafferson's letter, which we noticed on a former month, has had a lurid light cast on it by revelations of the condition of some departments of the London poor-houses. The graphic papers of a correspondent of the Pall Mall Gazette, giving an account of his own doleful experience during a night spent in the Casual Ward of the Lambeth Workhouse, illustrate not only the great numbers of the houseless poor, but the wretched morale that prevails among them, and that bursts out unchecked in the Casual Ward. The evils that accrue from the separation of the charge of the poor from active Christian charity, and from committing them to such classes of persons as usually form our Poor-Law guardians, have also been illustrated by these terrible revelations. Nor is Lambeth Workhouse the only institution where similar evils have prevailed. The Hon. Arthur Kinnaird has borne witness to similar abominations, witnessed with his own eyes in other places. So has the Poor-Law Inspector. Some few improvements may be made on the arrangements for the accommodation and supervision of the casual poor; but the confessedly inadequate character of these arrangements can only show the necessity for far deeper and more comprehensive amendments. The condition of the rural labourer has also been the subject of discussion. Lord Shaftesbury, whose labours in philanthropy are beyond all praise, moved probably by the prevalent disposition to speak of the farm labourer of Dorsetshire as the most starved and ill-provided of an ill-provided class, has come forward in defence of his county, and endeavoured to show that extra payments, allowances, and other things bring up the wages, that are nominally but 8*s.* or 10*s.*, to some 14*s.* 6*d.* a week. But other philanthropists, such as Lord S. Godolphin Osborne, are not disposed to accept Lord Shaftesbury's vindication. And certainly few men will be disposed to acquiesce in the opinion of the Times, that the lot of the Dorsetshire labourer is so extremely happy as to leave hardly anything to be desired. The questions raised by these discussions show the great need for the contact of Christianity with social reform. Political economy is utterly baffled by them. Its law of supply and demand breaks down, when "the London, Chatham, and Dover"—or, as some prefer to call it, "the London, Smash'em, and Over"—dashes through whole streets of workmen's abodes, and sends them scattering in every direction in search of houses that do not exist. There can be little doubt that every such case of upbreak makes additions to the class of roaming, reckless Arabs of the City, who are thenceforward lost to industry and honesty, not to say religion. And the extreme poverty of the agricultural labourer is obviously most unfavourable to the development of independence and the elevation of character. The voice of Christianity calls loudly for amendments in the social fabric, and for nothing, in large towns, is the call louder than for better and more numerous houses. The trustees of Mr. Peabody, in grappling with the problem how the deserving poor might be most benefited, decided on the erection of houses as the most unobjectionable mode of improving their condition, without hurting their independence; and the example so nobly set by him is surely worthy of many imitators.

In France, attention continues to be painfully turned to the progress of atheistic sentiments. "Twenty years ago," says Le Témoignage, the new organ of the Lutheran church, as quoted by the correspondent of Christian Work, "who would have dreamt of the great explosion of atheism which we witness? These fatal doctrines were supposed to have been conquered, but lo! they spring up on all sides, in science, in art, in literature. The current of youth and passion sets that way. . . . Nothing is more saddening than the spectacle given us by the world of intellect. . . . And the misfortune of the times is, that Christianity seems to have lost its sap and life." Other journals bear testimony to the growing frivolity and atheism of the age. The religious novelty of the year is independent morals. M. Hyacinthe, by his eloquent refutation, has increased the interest felt in it, and when the voice of his remonstrance has died away, what will remain?*

In the Revue des Deux Mondes, well known to be the leading Review of France, M. Alphonse Esquiros, an author who has written much on English life and manners, has lately contributed a paper on Religious Life in England. He speaks successively of the several religious denominations, dwelling even on some prominent individuals, such as Dr. Pusey and Mr. Spurgeon. He acknowledges the superiority of the Reformed Churches, especially in the promotion of popular education, free institutions, and civilisation at large; and would probably assign to Protestantism a higher position than to the Romish faith.

Dr. Livingstone, who was lately spending some time in Bombay, has written an interesting letter, giving his impressions of the present state of Indian society, and the effects that have been produced by Christian missions. Dr. Livingstone, while deeply deploring some of the obstacles to the success of Christian missions which some regard as insuperable, does not attach to them the weight that others are disposed to believe in. Neither the differences among Christians, nor the inconsistent lives of some who profess the Christian religion, make so great an impression on the natives, in the way of throwing doubt on the divine origin of Christianity, as many might suppose. Once, when he himself greatly dreaded the effects of some very gross behaviour of white people in Africa, his black friends simply remarked, "We see that whites have fools among them as well as blacks." He believes that a great change for the better is going on in Indian society. The Government, on the whole, is using its influence for good. Education is becoming very general. The educated classes are getting very sick of caste. "Caste," said a Brahmin freely to Dr. Livingstone, "is the curse of the country—it must always be a bar to any feeling of nationality." Railways, and a free English and native press, are doing a great deal. The missionary element is also doing a great work. It is a mistake that the native Christians are the worst of the community. Dr. Livingstone was much struck with a change of expression in the Christian women at Ahmedabad, Borsud, and elsewhere; they were pleasant to look at, while the women in general have a most discontented expression. "The part of the missionaries in the great leavening process that is going on is more than they cost. They are the fons et origo of all that is now doing; and it would be well if those who have theoretical objections to the work would come out, and calmly and philosophically examine the question for themselves."

In the history of missions, one of the most interesting things to be met with is the existence of native congregations, sufficiently large and vital to exert a sensible influence on their locality. In the Colombo Observer of December last an interesting account is given of a congregation of this kind, at Morotto, in Ceylon. After describing the stately appearance of Morotto, which at no distant period was quite a wretched place, mention is made of two churches, the one a splendid and costly memorial church, the other a plain Wesleyan chapel. Mr. de Zylva, till lately the pastor of this chapel, spent twenty-four years in evangelistic labours, and was the means of adding more than 600 members to the church. "When Mr. de Zylva came to the station in 1840, there was nothing to distinguish it from any other

* In consequence of the early period of the month at which the Sunday Magazine has to be put to press, we were led last month into a statement that was then going the round of some newspapers, but which turns out to have been unfounded, that M. Hyacinthe had been remanded to his convent in consequence of the liberal tone of some of his observations.

place in the island; the inhabitants are represented as having been poor, ignorant, and dull. He had few things outwardly in his favour. He is not of the same caste as the villagers, and we have seen how morbidly jealous they are upon this subject. He had all the usual obstacles to contend with, demonism, Buddhism, and Romanism. The first cause of a change for the better—the first thing that gained the attention and confidence of the people, was house-to-house visitation. This was carried on at all times, and in all states of the weather; meal-times were unheeded, and the fare of the poorest was readily accepted when offered, even to a washerwoman's rice-milk: an interest was taken in all their family concerns; and the Minister began to be regarded as a friend. No assumption was attempted, and language the most familiar was used in illustrating the truths of the Gospel. There was no connivance at sin, and all acts of heathenism were sharply rebuked; but a spirit of gentleness and kindness was always the most prominent feature in all Mr. de Zylva's intercourse with the families that received him. In the pulpit he is an attractive preacher; but it is rather from his earnestness, the homeliness of his style, and the striking character of his allusions, than from what a critical hearer would call words of eloquence. He loves to tell stories that have about them point and raciness. He uses the Saxon of his native language; and the half-smile that continually plays upon the countenance of those who listen to him is an evidence that he has gained their attention, and is well understood. A woman who had gone to another service was disappointed, as the minister did not come; so after sitting some time on a gravestone, she was induced to go to the Wesleyan chapel, and the Word came with power to her heart. She said: 'This is just like the talk in our house; I can understand it all.' From that time she cast in her lot with her despised neighbours, and is now walking in the fear of God."

The eagerness of the people of Madagascar for the Word of God is strikingly shown in the following letter from the Rev. R. G. Hartley, an agent of the Bible Society settled in the capital:—

"It would be difficult to exaggerate the store set upon their Bibles by the Christians here. They are obliged to be people of one book, for they have hardly any other books but the Bible, and such as explain and enforce its truths. I have been to-day to a village some miles off, where, once a week, the preachers and young men from five different villages meet me for instruction in the Gospels; and the Bible I found there, though it only reached us from England four months ago, is as well worn as if it had been used for as many years. Every part of it bears marks of its having been read over and over again; and I was much struck the other day to hear the pastor of this congregation, an old man, who has been blind for many years, quote a text in the words, not of the old version which he has known for years, but of this new one, which has been here so short a time, and which he has never seen. The younger people especially show the greatest eagerness in acquiring all the knowledge within their reach which illustrates the Bible; indeed they care for little else. I have four large Bible classes each week, and many of those who attend my classes attend those of the other missionaries on other days. Indeed, I think that some of the younger men attend a Bible class somewhere or other nearly every day in the week, except when they are prevented by the demands of the Government service, which everyone has to obey whenever required. Last week a deputation from each of the seven congregations in town requested to meet us, to ask us to have printed, in the form of a commentary, our weekly lessons. They said that many of them were too old to come to the classes, and others lived far away in the country, and that they too readily forgot what they only learned by word of mouth; so they asked us to prepare a commentary for them, and they would bear all the expense. We gladly assented to do all we could, and promised to give them one of the Gospels to begin with; but as they have hitherto proved very averse to paying for any of the books they have had, we required them to give us a list beforehand of those who agreed to take the book. In a week a subscription list for nearly 500 copies was brought to us, so that we shall begin at once, and bring out the book as quickly as the exigencies of our other work and the resources of the missionary printing-office will permit. English Bibles, with references, are most eagerly sought, and are made more useful than could be expected in the case of those who do not know a word of English."

From the papers of two eminent Scottish ministers, both cut off in the height of their usefulness, two interesting volumes of sermons have appeared. That by the Rev. Dr. Robertson of Glasgow is preceded by an interesting memoir, briefly sketching the course of a young man of humble origin but remarkable talents and acquirements, who, after a brilliant career at the University of St. Andrew's, came out at once a finished preacher, became minister of the parish of Mains, was presented to the collegiate charge of St. Andrew's, Edinburgh, but did not accept the appointment, and died, at the early age of forty, as minister of the Cathedral Church of Glasgow. In this last sphere, especially, his activity as a pastor was extremely great, and his efforts on behalf of his large parish worthy of the highest praise. His death was evidently the result of an overworked body and mind; his inward force worked at such a heat that his vital energies were wasted when he had not lived much more than half his days. The sermons and other papers published with them are fresh, independent, thoughtful, earnest; but they are to be viewed as the product of a mind that regarded Christianity almost wholly as a life,—on its subjective rather than its objective side. Some of his views would probably have been modified had he directed his attention more to the judicial aspect of the Divine government, and the claims of God's righteous law. The other volume is by the Rev. Dr. Park, late of St. Andrew's, the predecessor in his present charge of A. K. H. B. It is an excellent collection, the teaching based firmly on the great truths of Revelation, and enforcing and applying these with much power and beauty, with a rare combination of faithfulness and charity, and an equally remarkable union of simplicity and culture.

The Bampton Lecture for 1865, now published, was delivered by the Rev. J. B. Mozley, B.D., the well-known author of a treatise on Augustinianism. Mr. Mozley's subject is Miracles. It is but one department of this subject that he discusses, an extremely seasonable one in the present state of speculation among intellectual men,—the antecedent probability or possibility of miracles. Are we precluded from accepting miracles, before we have inquired into the evidence of their occurrence, by the results of physical science, by historical experience, by fitting conceptions of God's attributes, or by any inherent impossibility of adequate testimony for that which miracles are, or by the existence of false miracles? To such questions as these Mr. Mozley applies himself, without any pretence of rhetoric or eloquence, but with a vigorous grasp of logic, and often with a power and success that render his book a valuable addition to Christian Apologetics, in the present temper of men's minds.

The third volume of Mr. Rawlinson's "Five Great Monarchies of the Ancient Eastern World," is devoted to the history of Media and that of Babylonia. Mr. Rawlinson, the brother of Sir Henry Rawlinson, of Assyrian fame, is well known as a most elaborate scholar, who has especially devoted himself to show the connection between ancient history, particularly as illustrated by modern lights, and the history recorded in the Bible. Media and Babylonia are interesting to the Bible student chiefly as having been the seats, the one of the deportation of the ten tribes, the other of that of the Jews, during their several captivities. The chapter on the religion of the Medes is one of much interest and importance. In the appendix we have a translation of the "Standard Inscription of Nebuchadnezzar," in which he is believed to make allusion to his remarkable illness. A very elaborate account is given of the fall of Babylon, based on Herodotus, Xenophon, and the Hebrew Scriptures.

"Theology and Life," is the title given to a collection of sermons just published by Professor Plumptre, of King's College, London. The sermons were preached chiefly on special occasions, several of them before the University of Oxford. They furnish a remarkable instance of the union of the highest culture of the age with Christian faith and earnestness. Mr. Plumptre's sympathies are wide, and his turn of mind is hopeful and charitable—disposed to take a favourable view of movements that seem to many full of unmitigated evil, yet not blind to the dangers to which this temper is exposed, and eager to prevent his tolerance from passing into doubt, or what is worse, indifference. Mr. Plumptre is a writer of unusual freshness and brilliancy, with an acute, penetrating mind, that, if it be sometimes overstrained, yet often throws beautiful light on Bible history, as well as on the problems of the age. The first sermon in the volume handles a subject of remarkable interest—the ministry of great cities. On the one hand, in such a place as London, the Christian labourer is apt to be overwhelmed, and thrown into despair by the fearful mass of ignorance, carelessness, vice, and wretchedness; on the other hand, the very greatness of the work, once he begins to it, has a stimulating effect on the labourer; he has the advantage, too, of ceaseless intercourse with men of thoughts and feelings different from his own, educating him in charity and forbearance; and he has the opportunity of taking a better estimate than others of the great questions of the day in their bearing on the work of Christianity. The chief interest of these sermons lies in their being the production of a serious, thoughtful, highly-educated mind, guiding others of the same class along the paths he himself has trod. They are earnest and honest effusions of the writer's heart, with a remarkable adaptation to the present time. On some points we may not accept all his conclusions. His explanation of justification by faith is not fully coincident with the doctrine which Luther called the articulus stantis vel cadentis ecclesiæ; and while with his whole heart he upholds the sacrifice and atonement of Christ, he seems to shrink from the doctrine that his death was the penalty of sin.

Under the title "Ecce Homo," we have a remarkable book, designed as a survey of the Life and Work of Jesus Christ. It is an elaborate attempt to explain both on human principles, and to show the wise adaptation of the means to the end sought to be accomplished. If viewed as an amendment on Renan, the book is extremely interesting, and seems to promise a still further advance when the unknown but very able writer's opinions are more fully developed. But if regarded from a higher stand-point, it is very defective, though even then extremely suggestive. The view which the writer takes of Christ's object is extremely limited—not even alluding to the expiation of man's guilt, as if that formed any part of his plan—but regarding the moral elevation of mankind as the great purpose for which Christ lived and laboured. The question of his miracles is not discussed; it is only assumed as undeniable that he professed to work miracles. The integrity of the record is at least suspected; the accounts are often considered likely to have been exaggerated. The ability of the writer of this book is unquestionable, and the grasp and constructive power which it evinces are alike rare and remarkable. There can be no doubt too, that it evinces, in a remarkable way, the wisdom that underlies Christ's life and teaching, and that it often brings out very vividly a meaning and a principle where ordinary readers do not perceive them. It shows that the channels in which Christianity was made to flow were the best that could have been chosen, and were selected with a skill to which no other movement furnishes a parallel. Still, without denying the supernatural elements in Christ's life and teaching, this book seems to reduce them to the smallest amount—giving almost everything to reason, and leaving little or nothing to faith. But after having shown the transcendant wisdom that conceived and shaped Christianity, the writer confesses his (or perhaps we should say her) inability to explain the origin of the Christian Church. "For others it must be enough to say, 'the Holy Ghost fell on those that believed.' No man saw the building of the New Jerusalem; the workmen crowded together the unfinished walls and unpaved streets; no man heard the clink of trowel and pickaxe; it descended out of heaven from God."

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

XIV.

ALTHOUGH I do happen to know how Miss Oldcastle fared that night after I left her, the painful record is not essential to my story. Besides, I have hitherto recorded only those things "quorum pars magna"—or minima, as the case may be—"fui." There is one exception—old Weir's story, for the introduction of which my reader cannot yet see the artistic reason. For whether a story be real in fact, or only real in meaning, there must always be an idea, or artistic model in the brain, after which it is fashioned: in the latter case one of invention, in the former case one of choice. And here I may be pardoned if I claim the sympathy of my intelligent readers in this, that I have from month to month to provide a fragment of my life-chart, the bearings of which to the rest of it cannot be seen, and which therefore may sometimes, to an eye unaccustomed to consider the globosity of things drawn upon a plane, be greatly misunderstood. Such an eye will discover in the story what never was there, and so blind itself to what is there.

In the middle of the following week I was returning from a visit I had paid to Tomkins and his wife, when I met, in the only street of the village, my good and honoured friend Dr. Duncan. Of course I saw him often—and I beg my reader to remember that this is no diary, but only a gathering together of some of the more remarkable facts of my history, admitting of being ideally grouped—but this time I recall distinctly because the interview led to many things.

"Well, Doctor Duncan," I said, "busy as usual fighting the devil?"

"Ah, my dear Mr. Walton," returned the doctor—and a kind word from him went a long way into my heart—"I know what you mean. You fight the devil from the inside, and I fight him from the outside. My chance is a poor one."

"It would be, perhaps, if you were confined to outside remedies. But what an opportunity your profession gives you of attacking the enemy from the inside as well! And you have this advantage over us, that no man can say it belongs to your profession to say such things, and therefore disregard them."

"Ah, Mr. Walton, I have too great a respect for your profession to dare to interfere with it. The doctor in "Macbeth," you know, could > not minister to a mind diseased,

> Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow,
> Raze out the written troubles of the brain,
> And with some sweet oblivious antidote
> Cleanse the stuff'd bosom of that perilous stuff
> Which weighs upon the heart."

"What a memory you have! But you don't think I can do that any more than you?"

"You know the best medicine to give, anyhow. I wish I always did. But you see we have no theriaca now."

"Well, we have. For the Lord says, 'Come unto me, and I will give you rest.'"

"There! I told you! That will meet all diseases."

"Strangely now, there comes into my mind a line of Chaucer, with which I will make a small return for your quotation from Shakespeare. You have mentioned theriaca; and I, without thinking of this line, quoted our Lord's words. Chaucer brings the two together, for the word triacle is merely a corruption of theriaca, the unfailing cure for everything.

> Crist, which that is to every harm triacle."

"That is delightful: I thank you. And that is in Chaucer?"

"Yes. In the Man-of-Law's tale."

"Shall I tell you how I was able to quote so correctly from Shakespeare? I have just come from referring to the passage. And I mention that because I want to tell you what made me think of the passage. I had been to see poor Catherine Weir. I think she is not long for this world. She has a bad cough, and I fear her lungs are going."

"I am concerned to hear that. I considered her very delicate, and am not surprised. But I wish, I do wish, I had got a little hold of her before, that I might be of some use to her now. Is she in immediate danger, do you think?"

"No, I do not think so. But I have no expectation of her recovery. Very likely she will just live through the winter and die in the spring. Those patients so often go as the flowers come! All her coughing, poor woman, will not cleanse her stuffed bosom. The perilous stuff weighs on her heart, as Shakespeare says, as well as on her lungs."

"Ah, dear! What is it, doctor, that weighs upon her heart? Is it shame, or what is it? for she is so uncommunicative that I hardly know anything at all about her yet."

"I cannot tell. She has the faculty of silence."

"But do not think I complain that she has not made me her confessor. I only mean that if she would talk at all, one would have a chance of knowing something of the state of her mind, and so might give her some help."

"Perhaps she will break down all at once, and open her mind to you. I have not told her she is dying. I think a medical man ought at least to be quite sure before he dares to say such a thing. I have known a long life injured, to human view at least, by the medical verdict in youth of ever imminent death."

"Certainly one has no right to say what God is going to do with anyone till he knows it beyond a doubt. Illness has its own peculiar mission, independent of any association with coming death, and may often work better when mingled with the hope of life.

I mean, we must take care of presumption when we measure God's plans by our theories. But could you not suggest something, Doctor Duncan, to guide me in trying to do my duty by her?"

"I cannot. You see you don't know what she is tqinking; and till you know that, I presume you will agree with me that all is an aim in the dark. How can I prescribe, without some diagnosis? It is just one of those few cases in which one would like to have the authority of the Catholic priests to urge confession with. I do not think anything will save her life, as we say, but you have taught some of us to think of the life that belongs to the spirit as the life; and I do believe confession would do everything for that."

"Yes, if made to God. But I will grant that communication of one's sorrows or even sins to a wise brother of mankind may help to a deeper confession to the Father in heaven. But I have no wish for authority in the matter. Let us see whether the Spirit of God working in her may not be quite as powerful for a final illumination of her being as the fiat confessio of a priest. I have no confidence in forcing in the moral or spiritual garden. A hot-house development must necessarily be a sickly one, rendering the plant unfit for the normal life of the open air. Wait. We must not hurry things. She will perhaps come to me of herself before long. But I will call and inquire after her."

We parted; and I went at once to Catherine Weir's shop. She received me much as usual, which was hardly to be called receiving at all. Perhaps there was a doubtful shadow, not of more cordiality, but of less repulsion in it. Her eyes were full of a stony brilliance, and the flame of the fire that was consuming her glowed upon her cheeks more brightly, I thought, than ever; but that might be fancy, occasioned by what the doctor had said about her. Her hand trembled, but her demeanour was perfectly calm.

"I am sorry to hear you are complaining, Miss Weir," I said.

"I suppose Dr. Duncan told you so, sir. But I am quite well. I did not send for him. He called of himself, and wanted to persuade me I was ill."

I understood that she felt injured by his interference.

"You should attend to his advice, though. He is a prudent man, and not in the least given to alarming people without cause."

She returned no answer. So I tried another subject.

"What a fine fellow your brother is!"

"Yes; he grows very much."

"Has your father found another place for him yet?"

"I don't know. My father never tells me about any of his doings."

"But don't you go and talk to him, sometimes?"

"No. He does not care to see me."

"I am going there now: will you come with me?"

"Thank you. I never go where I am not wanted."

"But it is not right that father and daughter should live as you do. Suppose he may not have been so kind to you as he ought, you should not cherish resentment against him for it. That only makes matters worse, you know."

"I never said to human being that he had been unkind to me."

"And yet you let every person in the village know it."

"How?"

Her eye had no longer the stony glitter. It flashed now.

"You are never seen together. You scarcely speak when you meet. Neither of you cross the other's threshold."

"It is not my fault."

"It is not all your fault, I know. But do you think you can go to a Heaven at last where you will be able to keep apart from each other, he in his house and you in your house, without any sign that it was through this father on earth that you were born into the world which the Father in Heaven redeemed by the gift of his own Son?"

She was silent; and, after a pause, I went on.

"I believe, in my heart, that you love your father. I could not believe otherwise of you. And you will never be happy till you have made it up with him. Have you done him no wrong?"

At these words, her face turned white—with anger, I could see—all but those spots on her cheek-bones, which shone out in dreadful contrast to the deathly paleness of the rest of her face. Then the returning blood surged violently from her heart, and the red spots were lost in one crimson glow. She opened her lips to speak, but apparently changing her mind, turned and walked haughtily out of the shop and closed the door behind her.

I waited, hoping she would recover herself and return; but, after ten minutes had passed, I thought it better to go away.

As I had told her, I was going to her father's shop. There I was received very differently. There was a certain softness in the manner of the carpenter which I had not observed before, with the same heartiness in the shake of his hand which had accompanied my last leave-taking. I had purposely allowed ten days to elapse before I called again, to give time for the unpleasant feelings associated with my interference to vanish. And now I had something in my mind about young Tom.

"Have you got anything for your boy yet, Thomas?"

"Not yet, sir. There's time enough. I don't want to part with him just yet. There he is, taking his turn at what's going. Tom!"

And from the further end of the large shop, where I had not observed him, now approached young Tom, in a canvas jacket, looking quite like a workman.

"Well, Tom, I am glad to find you can turn your hand to anything."

"I must be a stupid, sir, if I couldn't handle my father's tools," returned the lad.

"I don't know that quite. I am not just prepared to admit it, for my own sake. My father is a lawyer, and I never could read a chapter in one of his books—his tools, you know."

"Perhaps you never tried, sir."

"Indeed, I did; and no doubt I could have done it if I had made up my mind to it. But I never felt inclined to finish the page. And that reminds me why I called to-day. Thomas, I know that lad of yours is fond of reading. Can you spare him from his work for an hour or so before breakfast?"

"To-morrow, sir?"

"To-morrow, and to-morrow, and to-morrow," I answered; "and there's Shakespeare for you."

"Of course, sir, whatever you wish," said Thomas, with a perplexed look in which pleasure seemed to long for confirmation, and to be, till that came, afraid to put its "native semblance on."

"I want to give him some direction in his reading. When a man is fond of any tools, and can use them, it is worth while showing him how to use them better."

"O thank you, sir!" exclaimed Tom, his face beaming with delight.

"That is kind of you, sir! Tom, you're a made man!" cried the father.

"So," I went on, "if you will let him come to me for an hour every morning, till he gets another place, say from eight to nine, I will see what I can do for him."

Tom's face was as red with delight, as his sister's had been with anger. And I left the shop somewhat consoled for the pain I had given Catherine, which grieved me without making me sorry that I had occasioned it.

I had intended to try to do something from the father's side towards a reconciliation with his daughter. But no sooner had I made my proposal for Tom than I saw I had blocked up my own way towards my more important end. For I could not bear to seem to offer to bribe him even to allow me to do him good. Nor would he see that it was for his good and his daughter's—not at first. The first impression would be that I had a professional end to gain; that the reconciling of father and daughter was a sort of parish business of mine, and that I had smoothed the way to it by offering a gift—an intellectual one, true, but not, therefore, the less a gift in the eyes of Thomas, who had a great respect for books. This was just what would irritate such a man, and I resolved to say nothing about it, but bide my time.

When Tom came, I asked him if he had read any of Wordsworth. For I always give people what I like myself, because that must be wherein I can best help them. I was anxious, too, to find out what he was capable of. And for this, anything that has more than a surface meaning will do. I had no doubt about the lad's intellect, and now I wanted to see what there was deeper than the intellect in him.

He said he had not.

I therefore chose one of Wordsworth's sonnets, not one of his best by any means, but suitable for my purpose—the one entitled, "Composed during a Storm." This I gave him to read, telling him to let me know when he considered that he had mastered the meaning of it, and sat down to my own studies. I remember I was then reading the Anglo-Saxon gospels. I think it was fully half-an-hour before Tom rose and gently approached my place. I had not been uneasy about the experiment after ten minutes had passed, and after that time was doubled, I felt certain of some measure of success. This may possibly puzzle my reader; but I will explain. It was clear that Tom did not understand the sonnet at first; and I was not in the least certain that he would come to understand it by any exertion of his intellect, without further experience. But what I was delighted to be made sure of was that Tom at least knew that he did not know. For that is the very next step to knowing. Indeed, it may be said to be a more valuable gift than the other, being of general application; for some quick people will understand many things very easily, but when they come to a thing that is beyond their present reach, will fancy they see a meaning in it, or invent one, or even—which is far worse—pronounce it nonsense; and indeed show themselves capable of any device for getting out of the difficulty, except seeing and confessing to themselves that they are not able to understand it. Possibly this sonnet might be beyond Tom now, but at least there was great hope that he saw, or believed, that there must be something beyond him in it. I only hoped that he would not fall upon some wrong interpretation, seeing he was brooding over it so long.

"Well, Tom," I said, "have you made it out?"

"I can't say I have, sir. I'm afraid I'm very stupid, for I've tried hard. I must just ask you to tell me what it means. But I must tell you one thing, sir: every time I read it over—twenty times, I daresay—I thought I was lying on my mother's grave, as I lay that terrible night; and then at the end there you were standing over me and saying, 'Can I do anything to help you?'"

I was struck with astonishment. For here, in a wonderful manner, I saw the imagination outrunning the intellect, and manifesting to the heart what the brain could not yet understand. It indicated undeveloped gifts of a far higher nature than those belonging to the mere power of understanding alone. For there was a hidden sympathy of the deepest kind between the life experience of the lad, and the embodiment of such life experience on the part of the poet. But he went on:

"I am sure, sir, I ought to have been at my prayers, then, but I wasn't; so I didn't deserve you to come. But don't you think God is sometimes better to us than we deserve?"

"He is just everything to us, Tom; and we don't and can't deserve anything. Now I will try to explain the sonnet to you."

I had always had an impulse to teach; not for the teaching's sake, for that, regarded as the attempt to fill skulls with knowledge, had always been to me a desolate dreariness; but the moment I saw a sign of hunger, an indication of readiness to receive, I was invariably seized with a kind of passion for giving. I now proceeded to explain the sonnet. Having done so, nearly as well as I could, Tom said:

"It is very strange, sir; but now that I have heard you say what the poem means, I feel as if I had known it all the time, though I could not say it."

Here at least was no common mind. The reader will not be surprised to hear that the hour before breakfast extended into two hours after breakfast as well. Nor did this take up too much of my time, for the lad was capable of doing a great deal for himself under the sense of help at hand. His father, so far from making any objection to the arrangement, was delighted with it. Nor do I believe that the lad did less work in the shop for it: I learned that he worked regularly till eight o'clock every night.

Now the good of the arrangement was this: I had the lad fresh in the morning, clear-headed, with no mists from the valley of labour to cloud the heights of understanding. From the exercise of the mind it was a pleasant and relieving change to turn to bodily exertion. I am certain that he both thought and worked better, because he both thought and worked. Every literary man ought to be mechanical (to use a Shakespearean word) as well. But it would have been quite a different matter, if he had come to me after the labour of the day. He would not then have been able to think nearly so well. But labour, sleep, thought, labour again, seems to me to be the right order with those who, earning their bread by the sweat of the brow, would yet remember that man shall not live by bread alone. Were it possible that our mechanics could attend the institutions called by their name in the morning instead of the evening, perhaps we should not find them so ready to degenerate into places of mere amusement. I am not objecting to the amusement; only to cease to educate in order to amuse is to degenerate. Amusement is a good and sacred thing; but it is not on a par with education; and, indeed, if it does not in any way further the growth of the higher nature, it cannot be called good at all.

Having exercised him in the analysis of some of the best portions of our home literature,—I mean helped him to take them to pieces, that, putting them together again, he might see what kind of things they were—for who could understand a new machine, or find out what it was meant for, without either actually or in his mind taking it to pieces? (which pieces, however, let me remind my reader, are utterly useless, except in their relation to the whole)—I resolved to try something fresh with him.

At this point I had intended to give my readers a theory of mine about the teaching and learning of a language; and tell them how I had found the trial of it succeed in the case of Tom Weir. But I think this would be too much of a digression from the course of my narrative, and would, besides, be interesting to those only who had given a good deal of thought to subjects belonging to education. I will only say, therefore, that, by the end of three months, my pupil, without knowing any other Latin author, was able to read any part of the first book of the Æneid—to read it tolerably in measure, and to enjoy the poetry of it—and this not without a knowledge of the declensions and conjugations. As to the syntax, I made the sentences themselves teach him that. Now, I know that, as an end, all this was of no great value; but as a beginning, it was invaluable, for it made and kept him hungry for more; whereas, in most modes of teaching, the beginnings are such that without the pressure of circumstances, no boy, especially after an interval of cessation, will return to them. Such is not Nature's mode, for the beginnings with her are as pleasant as the fruition, and that without being less thorough than they can be. The knowledge a child gains of the external world is the foundation upon which all his future philosophy is built. Every discovery he makes is fraught with pleasure—that is the secret of his progress, and the essence of my theory: that learning should, in each individual case, as in the first case, be discovery—bringing its own pleasure with it. Nor is this to be confounded with turning study into play. It is upon the moon itself that the infant speculates, after the moon itself that he stretches out his eager hands—to find in after years that he still wants her, but that in science and poetry he has her a thousand-fold more than if she had been handed him down to suck.

So, after all, I have bored my reader with a shadow of my theory, instead of an outline. After all, again, the description would have plagued him more, and that must be both his and my comfort.

So through the whole of that summer and the following winter, I went on teaching Tom Weir. He was a lad of uncommon ability, else he could not have effected what I say he had within his first three months of Latin, let my theory be not only perfect in itself, but true as well—true to human nature, I mean. And his father, though his own book-learning was but small, had enough of insight to perceive that his son was something out of the common, and that any possible advantage he might lose by remaining in Marshmallows was considerably more than counterbalanced by the instruction he got from the vicar. Hence, I believe, it was that not a word was said about another situation for Tom. And I was glad of it; for it seemed to me that the lad had abilities equal to any profession whatever.

XV.

On the next Sunday but one—which was surprising to me when I considered the manner of our last parting—Catherine Weir was in church, for the second time since I had come to the place. As it happened, only as Spenser says—

"It chanced—eternal God that chance did guide,"

—and why I say this, will appear afterwards—I had, in preaching upon, that is, in endeavouring to enforce the Lord's Prayer by making them think about the meaning of the words they were so familiar with, come to the petition, "Forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors;" with which I naturally connected the words of our Lord that follow: "For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you; but if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." I need not tell my reader more of what I said about this, than that I tried to show that even were it possible with God to forgive an unforgiving man, the man himself would not be able to believe for a moment that God did forgive him, and therefore could get no comfort or help or joy of any kind from the forgiveness; so essentially does hatred, or revenge, or contempt, or anything that separates us from man, separate us from God too. To the loving soul alone does the Father reveal himself; for love alone can understand him. It is the peace-makers who are his children.

This I said, thinking of no one more than another of my audience. But as I closed my sermon, I could not help fancying that Mrs. Oldcastle looked at me with more than her usual fierceness. I forgot all about it, however, for I never seemed to myself to have any hold of, or relation to, that woman. I know I was wrong in being unable to feel my relation to her because I disliked her. But not till years after did I begin to understand how she felt, or recognize in myself a common humanity with her. A sin of my own made me understand her condition. I can hardly explain now; I will tell it when the time comes. When I called upon her next, after the interview last related, she behaved much as if she had forgotten all about it, which was not likely.

In the end of the week after the sermon to which I have alluded, I was passing the Hall-gate on my usual Saturday's walk, when Judy saw me from within, as she came out of the lodge. She was with me in a moment.

"Mr. Walton," she said, "how could you preach at Grannie as you did last Sunday?"

"I did not preach at any body, Judy."

"Oh, Mr. Walton!"

"You know I didn't, Judy. You know that if I had, I would not say I had not."

"Yes, yes; I know that perfectly," she said, seriously. "But Grannie thinks you did."

"How do you know that?"

"By her face."

"That is all, is it?"

"You don't think Grannie would say so?"

"No. Nor yet that you could know by her face what she was thinking."

"Oh! can't I just? I can read her face—not so well as plain print; but, let me see, as well as what Uncle Stoddart calls black-letter, at least. I know she thought you were preaching at her; and her face said, 'I shan't forgive you, anyhow. I never forgive, and I won't for all your preaching.' That's what her face said."

"I am sure she would not say so, Judy," I said, really not knowing what to say.

"Oh, no; she would not say so. She would say, 'I always forgive, but I never forget.' That's a favourite saying of hers."

"But, Judy, don't you think it is rather hypocritical of you to say all this to me about your grandmother when she is so kind to you, and you seem such good friends with her?"

She looked up in my face with an expression of surprise.

"It is all true, Mr. Walton," she said.

"Perhaps. But you are saying it behind her back."

"I will go home and say it to her face, directly."

She turned to go.

"No, no, Judy. I did not mean that," I said, taking her by the arm.

"I won't say you told me to do it. I thought there was no harm in telling you. Grannie is kind to me, and I am kind to her. But Grannie is afraid of my tongue, and I mean her to be afraid of it. It's the only way to keep her in order. Darling Aunt Winnie! it's all she's got to defend her. If you knew how she treats her sometimes, you would be cross with Grannie yourself, Mr. Walton, for all your goodness and your white surplice."

And to my yet greater surprise, the wayward girl burst out crying, and, breaking away from me, ran through the gate, and out of sight amongst the trees, without once looking back.

I pursued my walk, my meditations somewhat discomposed by the recurring question:—Would she go home and tell her grandmother what she had said to me? And, if she did, would it not widen the breach upon the opposite side of which I seemed to see Ethelwyn stand, out of the reach of my help?

I walked quickly on to reach a stile by means of which I should soon leave the little world of Marshmallows quite behind me, and be alone with nature and my Greek Testament. Hearing the sound of horse hoofs on the road from Addicehead, I glanced up from my pocket-book, in which I had been looking over the thoughts that had at various moments passed through my mind that week, in order to choose one (or more, if they would go together) to be brooded over to-day for my people's spiritual diet to-morrow—I say I glanced up from my pocket-book, and saw a young man, that is, if I could call myself young still, of distinguished appearance, approaching upon a good serviceable hack. He turned into my road and passed me. He was pale, with a dark moustache, and large dark eyes; sat his horse well and carelessly; had fine features of the type commonly considered Grecian, but thin, and expressive chiefly of conscious weariness. He wore a white hat with crape upon it, white gloves, and long, military-looking boots. All this I caught as he passed me; and I remembered them because, looking after him, I saw him stop at the lodge of the Hall, ring the bell, and then ride through the gate. I confess I did not quite like this; but I got over the feeling so far as to be able to turn to my Testament when I had reached and crossed the stile.

I came home another way, after one of the most delightful days I had ever spent. Having reached the river in the course of my wandering, I came down the side of it towards Old Rogers' cottage, loitering and looking, quiet in heart and soul and mind, because I had committed my cares to Him who careth for us. The earth was round me—I was rooted, as it were, in it, but the air of a higher life was about me. I was swayed to and fro by the motions of a spiritual power; feelings and desires and hopes passed through me, passed away, and returned; and still my head rose into the truth, and the will of God was the regnant sunlight upon it. I might change my place and condition; new feelings might come forth, and old feelings retire into the lonely corners of my being; but still my heart should be glad and strong in the one changeless thing, in the truth that maketh free; still my head should rise into the sunlight of God, and I should know that because He lived I should live also, and because He was true I should remain true also, nor should any change pass upon me that should make me mourn the decadence of humanity. And then I found that I was gazing over the stump of an old pollard, on which I was leaning, down on a great bed of white water-lilies, that lay in the broad slow river, here broader and slower than in most places. The slanting yellow sunlight shone through the water down to their very roots anchored in the soil, and the water swathed their stems with coolness and freshness, and a universal sense, I doubted not, of watery presence and nurture. And there on their lovely heads, as they lay on the pillow of the water, shone the life-giving light of the summer sun, filling all the spaces between their outspread petals of living silver with its sea of radiance, and making them gleam with the whiteness which was born of them and the sun. And then came a hand on my shoulder, and, turning, I saw the grey head and the white smock of my old friend Rogers, and I was glad that he loved me enough not to be afraid of the parson and the gentleman.

"I've found it, sir, I do think," he said, his brown furrowed old face shining with a yet lovelier light than that which shone from the blossoms of the water-lilies, though, after what I had been thinking about them, it was no wonder that they seemed both to mean the same thing,—both to shine in the light of His countenance.

"Found what, Old Rogers?" I returned, raising myself, and laying my hand in return on his shoulder.

"Why He was displeased with the disciples for not knowing——"

"What He meant about the leaven of the Pharisees," I interrupted. "Yes, yes, of course. Tell me, then."

"I will try, sir. It was all dark to me for days. For it appeared to me very nat'ral that, seeing they had no bread in the locker, and hearing tell of leaven which they weren't to eat, they should think it had summat to do with their having none of any sort. But He didn't seem to think it was right of them to fall into the blunder. For why, then? A man can't be always right. He may be like myself, a foremast-man with no schoolin' but what the winds and the waves put into him, and I'm thinkin' those fishermen the Lord took to so much were something o' that sort. 'How could they help it?' I said to myself, sir. And from that I came to ask myself, 'Could they have helped it?' If they couldn't, He wouldn't have been vexed with them. Mayhap they ought to ha' been able to help it. And all at once, sir, this mornin', it came to me. I don't know how, but it was give to me, anyhow. And I flung down my rake, and I ran in to the old woman, but she wasn't in the way, and so I went back to my work again. But when I saw you, sir, a readin' upon the lilies o' the field, leastways, the lilies o' the water, I couldn't help running out to tell you. Isn't it a satisfaction, sir, when yer dead reckonin' runs ye right in betwixt the cheeks of the harbour? I see it all now."

"Well, I want to know, Old Rogers. I'm not so old as you, and so I may live longer. And every time I read that passage, I should like to be able to say to myself, 'Old Rogers gave me this.'"

"I only hope I'm right, sir. It was just this: their heads was full of their dinner because they didn't know where it was to come from. But they ought to ha' known where it always come from. If their hearts had been full of the dinner He give the five thousand hungry men and women and children, they wouldn't have been uncomfortable about not having a loaf. And so they wouldn't have been set upon the wrong tack when He spoke about the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees; and they would have known in a moment what He meant. And if I hadn't been too much of the same sort, I wouldn't have started saying it was but reasonable to be in the doldrums because they were at sea with no biscuit in the locker."

"You're right; you must be right, Old Rogers. It's as plain as possible," I cried, rejoiced at the old man's insight. "Thank you. I'll preach about it to-morrow. I thought I had got my sermon in Foxborough Wood, but I was mistaken: you had got it."

But I was mistaken again. I had not got my sermon yet.

I walked with him to his cottage and left him, after a greeting with the "old woman." Passing then through the village, and seeing by the light of her candle the form of Catherine Weir behind her counter, I went in. I thought Old Rogers' tobacco must be nearly gone, and I might safely buy some more. Catherine's manner was much the same as usual. But as she was weighing my purchase, she broke out all at once:

"It's no use your preaching at me, Mr. Walton. I cannot, I will not forgive. I will do anything but forgive. And it's no use."

"It is not I that say it, Catherine. It is the Lord himself."

I saw no great use in protesting my innocence, yet I thought it better to add—

"And I was not preaching at you. I was preaching to you, as much as to any one there, and no more."

Of this she took no notice, and I resumed:

"Just think of what He says, not what I say."

"I can't help it. If He won't forgive me, I must go without it. I can't forgive."

I saw that good and evil were fighting in her, and felt that no words of mine could be of further avail at the moment. The words of our Lord had laid hold of her; that was enough for this time. Nor dared I ask her any questions. I had the feeling that it would hurt, not help. All I could venture to say, was:

"I won't trouble you with talk, Catherine. Our Lord wants to talk to you. It is not for me to interfere. But please to remember, if ever you think I can serve you in any way, you have only to send for me."

She murmured a mechanical thanks, and handed me my parcel. I paid for it, bade her good night, and left the shop.

"O Lord," I said in my heart, as I walked away, "what a labour thou hast with us all! Shall we ever, some day, be all, and quite, good like Thee? Help me. Fill me with Thy light, that my work may all go to bring about the gladness of Thy kingdom—the holy household of us brothers and sisters—all Thy children."

And now I found that I wanted very much to see my friend Dr. Duncan. He received me with his stately cordiality, and a smile that went farther than all his words of greeting.

"Come now, Mr. Walton, I am just going to sit down to my dinner, and you must join me. I think there will be enough for us both. There is, I believe, a chicken a-piece for us, and we can make up with cheese and a glass of—would you believe it?—my own father's port. He was fond of port—the old man—though I never saw him with one glass more aboard than the registered tonnage. He always sat light on the water. Ah, dear me! I'm old myself now."

"But what am I to do with Mrs. Pearson?" I said. "There's some chef-d'œuvre of hers waiting for me by this time. She always treats me particularly well on Saturdays and Sundays."

"Ah! then, you must not stop with me. You will fare better at home."

"But I should much prefer stopping with you. Couldn't you send a message for me?"

"To be sure. My boy will run with it at once."

Now, what is the use of writing all this? I do not know. Only that even a tête-à-tête dinner with an old friend, now that I am an old man myself, has such a pearly halo about it in the mists of the past, that every little circumstance connected with it becomes interesting, though it may be quite unworthy of record. So, kind reader, let it stand.

We sat down to our dinner, so simple and so well-cooked that it was just what I liked. I wanted very much to tell my friend what had occurred in Catherine's shop, but I would not begin till we were safe from interruption; and so we chatted away concerning many things, he telling me about his sea-faring life, and I telling him some of the few remarkable things that had happened to me in the course of my life-voyage. There is no man but has met with some remarkable things that other people would like to know, and which would seem stranger to them than they did at the time to the person to whom they happened.

At length I brought our conversation round to my interview with Catherine Weir.

"Can you understand," I said, "a woman finding it so hard to forgive her own father?"

"Are you sure it is her father?" he returned.

"Surely she has not this feeling towards more than one. That she has it towards her father, I know."

"I don't know," he answered. "I have known resentment predominate over every other feeling and passion—in the mind of a woman too. I once heard of a good woman who cherished this feeling against a good man because of some distrustful words he had once addressed to herself. She had lived to a great age, and was expressing to her clergyman her desire that God would take her away: she had been waiting a long time. The clergyman—a very shrewd as well as devout man, and not without a touch of humour, said: 'Perhaps God doesn't mean to let you die till you've forgiven Mr. ——.' She was as if struck with a flash of thought, and sat silent during the rest of his visit. When the clergyman called the next day, he found Mr. —— and her talking together very quietly over a cup of tea. And she hadn't long to wait after that, I was told, but was gathered to her fathers—or went home to her children, whichever is the better phrase."

"I wish I had had your experience, Dr. Duncan," I said.

"I have not had so very much experience as a general practitioner, having been so long at sea. But I am satisfied that until a medical man knows a good deal more about his patient than most medical men give themselves the trouble to find out, his prescriptions will partake a good deal more than is necessary of hap-hazard.—As to this question of obstinate resentment, I know one case in which it is the ruling presence of a woman's life—the very light that is in her is resentment. I think her possessed myself."

"Tell me something about her."

"I will. But even to you I will mention no names. Not that I have her confidence in the least. But I think it is better not. I was called to attend a lady at a house where I had never yet been."

"Was it in——" I began, but checked myself. Dr. Duncan smiled and went on without remark. I could see that he told his story with great care, lest, I thought, he should let anything slip that might give a clue to the place or people.

"I was led up into an old-fashioned, richly-furnished room. A great wood-fire burned on the hearth. The bed was surrounded with heavy dark curtains, in which the shadowy remains of bright colours were just visible. In the bed lay one of the loveliest young creatures I had ever seen. And, one on each side, stood two of the most dreadful-looking women I had ever beheld. Still as death, while I examined my patient, they stood, with moveless faces, one as white as the other. Only the eyes of both of them were alive. One was evidently mistress, and the other servant. The latter looked more self-contained than the former, but less determined and possibly more cruel. That both could be unkind at least, was plain enough. There was trouble and signs of inward conflict in the eyes of the mistress. The maid gave no sign of any inside to her at all, but stood watching her mistress. A child's toy was lying in a corner of the room."

I may here interrupt my friend's story to tell my reader that I may be mingling some of my own conclusions with what the good man told me of his. For he will see well enough already that I had in a moment attached his description to persons I knew, and, as it turned out, correctly, though I could not be certain about it till the story had advanced a little beyond this early stage of its progress.

"I found the lady very weak and very feverish—a quick feeble pulse, now bounding, and now intermitting—and a restlessness in her eye which I felt contained the secret of her disorder. She kept glancing, as if involuntarily, towards the door, which would not open for all her looking, and I heard her once murmur to herself—for I was still quick of hearing then—'He won't come!' Perhaps I only saw her lips move to those words—I cannot be sure, but I am certain she said them in her heart. I prescribed for her as far as I could venture, but begged a word with her mother. She went with me into an adjoining room.

"'The lady is longing for something,' I said, not wishing to be so definite as I could have been.

"The mother made no reply. I saw her lips shut yet closer than before.

"'She is your daughter, is she not?'

"'Yes,'—very decidedly.

"'Could you not find out what she wishes?'

"'Perhaps I could guess.'

"'I do not think I can do her any good till she has what she wants.'

"'Is that your mode of prescribing, doctor?' she said, tartly.

"'Yes, certainly,' I answered—'in the present case. Is she married?'

"'Yes.'

"'Has she any children?'

"'One daughter.'

"'Let her see her, then.'

"'She does not care to see her.'

"'Where is her husband?'

"'Excuse me, doctor; I did not send for you to ask questions, but to give advice.'

"'And I came to ask questions, in order that I might give advice. Do you think a human being is like a clock, that can be taken to pieces, cleaned, and put together again?'

"'My daughter's condition is not a fit subject for jesting.'

"'Certainly not. Send for her husband, or the undertaker, whichever you please,' I said, forgetting my manners and my temper together, for I was more irritable then than I am now, and there was something so repulsive about the woman, that I felt as if I was talking to an evil creature that for her own ends, though what I could not tell, was tormenting the dying lady.

"'I understood you were a gentleman—of experience and breeding.'

"'I am not in the question, madam. It is your daughter.'

"'She shall take your prescription.'

"'She must see her husband if it be possible.'

"'It is not possible.'

"'Why?'

"'I say it is not possible, and that is enough. Good morning.'

"I could say no more at that time. I called the next day. She was just the same, only that I knew she wanted to speak to me, and dared not, because of the presence of the two women. Her troubled eyes seemed searching mine for pity and help, and I could not tell what to do for her. There are, indeed, as some one says, strongholds of injustice and wrong into which no law can enter to help.

"One afternoon, about a week after my first visit, I was sitting by her bedside, wondering what could be done to get her out of the clutches of these tormentors, who were, evidently to me, consuming her in the slow fire of her own affections, when I heard a faint noise, a rapid foot in the house so quiet before; heard doors open and shut, then a dull sound of conflict of some sort. Presently a quick step came up the oak-stair. The face of my patient flushed, and her eyes gleamed as if her soul would come out of them. Weak as she was she sat up in bed, almost without an effort, and the two women darted from the room.

"'My husband!' said the girl—for indeed she was little more in age, turning her face, almost distorted with eagerness, towards me.

"'Yes, my dear,' I said, 'I know. But you must be as still as you can, else you will be very ill. Do keep quiet.'

"'I will, I will,' she gasped, stuffing her pocket-handkerchief actually into her mouth to prevent herself from screaming, as if that was what would hurt her. 'But go to him. They will murder him.'

"That moment I heard a cry and what sounded like an inarticulate imprecation, but both from a woman's voice; and the next, a young man—as fine a fellow as I ever saw—dressed like a game-keeper but evidently a gentleman, walked into the room with a quietness that strangely contrasted with the dreadful paleness of his face and with his disordered hair; while the two women followed, as red as he was white, and evidently in fierce wrath from a fruitless struggle with the powerful youth. He walked gently up to his wife, whose outstretched arms and face followed his face as he came round the bed to where she was at the other side, till arms, and face, and head, fell into his embrace.

"I had gone to the mother.

"'Let us have no scene now,' I said, 'or her blood will be on your head.'

"She took no notice of what I said, but stood silently glaring, not gazing, at the pair. I feared an outburst, and had resolved, if it came, to carry her at once from the room, which I was quite able to do then, Mr. Walton, though I don't look like it now. But in a moment more the young man, becoming uneasy at the motionlessness of his wife, lifted up her head, and glanced in her face. Seeing the look of terror in his, I hastened to him, and lifting her from him, laid her down—dead. Disease of the heart, I believe. The mother burst into a shriek—not of horror, or grief, or remorse, but of deadly hatred.

"'Look at your work!' she cried to him, as he stood gazing in stupor on the face of the girl. 'You said she was yours, not mine; take her. You may have her, now you have killed her.'

"'He may have killed her; but you have murdered her, madam,' I said, as I took the man by the arm, and led him away, yielding like a child. But the moment I got him out of the house, he gave a groan, and, breaking away from me, rushed down a road leading from the back of the house towards the home-farm. I followed, but he had disappeared. I went on; but before I could reach the farm, I heard the gallop of a horse, and saw him tearing away at full speed along the London road. I never heard more of him, or of the story. Some women can be secret enough, I assure you."

I need not follow the rest of our conversation. I could hardly doubt whose was the story I had heard. It threw a light upon several things about which I had been perplexed. What a horror of darkness seemed to hang over that family! What deeds of wickedness! But the reason was clear: the horror came from within; selfishness, and fierceness of temper were its source—no unhappy doom. The worship of one's own will fumes out around the being an atmosphere of evil, an altogether abnormal condition of the moral firmament, out of which will break the very flames of hell. The consciousness of birth and of breeding, instead of stirring up to deeds of gentleness and "high emprise," becomes then but an incentive to violence and cruelty; and things which seem as if they could not happen in a civilised country and a polished age, are proved as possible as ever where the heart is unloving, the feelings unrefined, self the centre, and God nowhere in the man or woman's vision. The terrible things that one reads in old histories, or in modern newspapers, were done by human beings, not by demons.

I did not let my friend know that I knew all that he concealed; but I may as well tell my reader now what I could not have told him then. I know all the story now, and, as no better place will come, as far as I can see, I will tell it at once, and briefly.

Dorothy—a wonderful name, the gift of God, to be so treated, faring in this, however, like many other of God's gifts—Dorothy Oldcastle was the eldest daughter of Jeremy and Sibyl Oldcastle, and the sister therefore of Ethelwyn. Her father, who was an easy-going man, entirely under the dominion of his wife, died when she was about fifteen, and her mother sent her to school, with especial recommendation to the care of a clergyman in the neighbourhood, whom Mrs. Oldcastle knew; for, somehow—and the fact is not so unusual as to justify especial inquiry here—though she paid no attention to what our Lord or his apostles said, nor indeed seemed to care to ask herself if what she did was right, or what she accepted (I cannot say believed) was true, she had yet a certain (to me all but incomprehensible) leaning to the clergy. I think it belongs to the same kind of superstition which many of our own day are turning to. Offered the Spirit of God for the asking, offered it by the Lord himself, in the misery of their unbelief they betake themselves to necromancy instead, and raise the dead to ask their advice, and follow it, and will find some day that Satan had not forgotten how to dress like an angel of light. Nay, he can be more cunning with the demands of the time. We are clever: he will be cleverer. Why should he dress and not speak like an angel of light? Why should he not give good advice if that will help to withdraw people by degrees from regarding the source of all good? He knows well enough that good advice goes for little, but that what fills the heart and mind goes for much. What religion is there in being convinced of a future state? Is that to worship God? It is no more religion than the belief that the sun will rise to-morrow is religion. It may be a source of happiness to those who could not believe it before, but it is not religion. Where religion comes that will certainly be likewise, but the one is not the other. The devil can afford a kind of conviction of that. It costs him little. But to believe that the spirits of the departed are the mediators between God and us is essential paganism—to call it nothing worse; and a bad enough name, too, since Christ has come and we have heard and seen the only begotten of the Father. Thus the instinctive desire for the wonderful, the need we have of a revelation from above us, denied its proper food and nourishment, turns in its hunger to feed upon garbage. As a devout German says—I do not quote him quite correctly—"Where God rules not, demons will." Let us once see with our spiritual eyes the Wonderful, the Counsellor, and we shall not surely turn from Him to seek elsewhere the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.

Those who sympathize with my feeling in regard to this form of the materialism of our day, will forgive this divergence. I submit to the artistic blame of such as do not, and return to my story.

Dorothy was there three or four years. I said I would be brief. She and the clergyman's son fell in love with each other. The mother heard of it, and sent for her home. She had other views for her. Of course, in such eyes, a daughter's fancy was, irrespective of its object altogether, a thing to be sneered at. But she found, to her fierce disdain, that she had not been able to keep all her beloved obstinacy to herself: she had transmitted a portion of it to her daughter. But in her it was combined with noble qualities, and, ceasing to be the evil thing it was in her mother, became an honourable firmness, rendering her able to withstand her mother's stormy importunities. Thus Nature had begun to right herself—the right in the daughter turning to meet and defy the wrong in the mother, and that in the same strength of character which the mother had misused for evil and selfish ends. And thus the bad breed was broken. She was and would be true to her lover. The consequent scenes were dreadful. The spirit but not the will of the girl was all but broken. She felt that she could not sustain it long. By some means, unknown to my informant, her lover contrived to communicate with her. He had, through means of relations who had great influence with Government, procured a good appointment in India, whither he must sail within a month. The end was that she left her mother's house. Mr. Gladwyn was waiting for her near, and conducted her to his father's, who had constantly refused to aid Mrs. Oldcastle by interfering in the matter. They were married next day by the clergyman of a neighbouring parish. But almost immediately she was taken so ill, that it was impossible for her to accompany her husband, and she was compelled to remain behind at the rectory, hoping to join him the following year.

Before the time arrived, she gave birth to my little friend Judy; and her departure was again delayed by a return of her old complaint, probably the early stages of the disease of which she died. Then, just as she was about to set sail for India, news arrived that Mr. Gladwyn had had a sunstroke, and would have leave of absence and come home as soon as he was able to be moved; so that instead of going out to join him, she must wait for him where she was. His mother had been dead for some time. His father, an elderly man of indolent habits, was found dead in his chair one Sunday morning soon after the news had arrived of the illness of his son, to whom he was deeply attached. And so the poor young creature was left alone with her child, without money, and in weak health. The old man left nothing behind him but his furniture and books. And nothing could be done in arranging his affairs, till the arrival of his son, of whom the last accounts had been that he was slowly recovering. In the meantime his wife was in want of money, without a friend to whom she could apply. I presume that one of the few parishioners who visited at the rectory, had written to acquaint Mrs. Oldcastle with the condition in which her daughter was left, for, influenced by motives of which I dare not take upon me to conjecture an analysis, she wrote, offering her daughter all that she required in her old home. Whether she fore-intended her following conduct, or old habit returned with the return of her daughter, I cannot tell; but she had not been more than a few days in the house, before she began to tyrannise over her, as in old times, and although Mrs. Gladwyn's health, now always weak, was evidently failing in consequence, she either did not see the cause, or could not restrain her evil impulses. At length the news arrived of Mr. Gladwyn's departure for home. Perhaps then for the first time the temptation entered her mind to take her revenge upon him, by making her daughter's illness a pretext for refusing him admission to her presence. She told her she should not see him till she was better, for that it would make her worse; persisted in her resolution after his arrival; effected, by the help of Sarah, that he should not gain admittance to the house, keeping all the doors locked except one; and it was only by the connivance of Ethelwyn, then a girl about fifteen, that he was admitted by the underground way, of which she unlocked the upper door for his entrance. She had then guided him as far as she dared, and directed him the rest of the way to his wife's room.

My reader will now understand how it came about in the process of writing these my recollections, that I have given such a long chapter chiefly to that one evening spent with my good friend, Dr. Duncan; for he will see, as I have said, that what he told me opened up a good deal to me.

I had very little time for the privacy of the church that night. Dark as it was, however, I went in before I went home: I had the key of the vestry-door always in my pocket. I groped my way into the pulpit, and sat down in the darkness, and thought. Nor did my personal interest in Dr. Duncan's story make me forget poor Catherine Weir and the terrible sore in her heart, the sore of unforgivingness. And I saw that of herself she would not, could not, forgive to all eternity; that all the pains of hell could not make her forgive, for that it was a divine glory to forgive, and must come from God. And thinking of Mrs. Oldcastle, I saw that in ourselves we could be sure of no safety, not from the worst and vilest sins; for who could tell how he might not stupify himself by degrees, and by one action after another, each a little worse than the former, till the very fires of Sinai would not flash into eyes blinded with the incense arising to the golden calf of his worship? A man may come to worship a devil without knowing it. Only by being filled with a higher spirit than our own, which, having caused our spirits, is one with our spirits, and is in them the present life principle, are we or can we be safe from this eternal death of our being. This spirit was fighting the evil spirit in Catherine Weir: how was I to urge her to give ear to the good? If will would but side with God, the forces of self, deserted by their leader, must soon quit the field; and the woman—the kingdom within her no longer torn by conflicting forces—would sit quiet at the feet of the Master, reposing in that rest which He offered to those who could come to Him. Might she not be roused to utter one feeble cry to God for help? That would be one step towards the forgiveness of others. To ask something for herself would be a great advance in such a proud nature as hers. And to ask good heartily is the very next step to giving good heartily.

Many thoughts such as these passed through my mind, chiefly associated with her. For I could not think how to think about Mrs. Oldcastle yet. And the old church gloomed about me all the time. And I kept lifting up my heart to the God who had cared to make me, and then drew me to be a preacher to my fellows, and had surely something to give me to say to them; for did he not choose so to work by the foolishness of preaching?—Might not my humble ignorance work his will, though my wrath could not work his righteousness? And I descended from the pulpit thinking with myself, "Let Him do as He will. Here I am. I will say what I see: let Him make it good."

And the next morning, I spoke about the words of our Lord:

"If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask Him!"

And I looked to see. And there Catherine Weir sat, looking me in the face.

There likewise sat Mrs. Oldcastle, looking me in the face too.

And Judy sat there, also looking me in the face, as serious as man could wish grown woman to look.

THE MARRIAGE IN CANA.

When Moses with his potent wand
Before the stubborn monarch stood,
Beneath the prophet's outstretch'd hand
The stricken waters turn'd to blood :

But when in dayspring calm and bright
The Son of God his face reveals,
And pours the dawn of Gospel light
Amid the Galilean hills,

Veil'd is the lowly wedding guest,
He breathes in love his will divine,
And instant on his high behest
The waters brighten into wine !

O heavenly Guest ! beside our gates,
Tho' in the garb of flesh no more,
Thy loving spirit ever waits
To bless the banquet as of yore.

And yet how oft in hours of mirth
A world once lost, by Thee restored,
Forgetful of its second birth
Owns not its Saviour as its Lord !

How oft in lawless hours we mock
Thy nearness with our heedless din !
How often, when we hear Thee knock,
Our hearts refuse to let Thee in !

But when the tinsel splendours fade,
When mirth dies out and health is gone,
When fold on fold the deepening shade
Makes all our pathway drear and lone,—

Then, when the conscience starts aghast
At visions of the coming end,
We fain would have Thee near at last,
And own the Saviour as a friend.

Fond hearts, to seek earth's fleeting stream,
When e'en for them Thy side was riven
That life's unfailing fount might flow
Empurpled with the wine of Heaven !

If only we our hearts address
To entertain our risen Lord,
His unseen hand shall ever bless
The private task, the social board.

We need not deem the roof too low ;
No shade can make His glory dim ;
And duty takes a golden glow
If only it be done for Him.

O thought, life's humblest walk to cheer—
That whatsoe'er the morrow brings
Of dark or bright, of smile or tear,
Is hallow'd by the King of kings !

Lord, give us grace to make it ours ;
Whate'er our lot on earth may be,
Its toil, its mirth, its thorns, its flowers—
To consecrate them all to Thee !

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

VI.—THE CHRISTIAN'S WORK.

Many of Paul's expressions have a warlike ring, and suggest to our fancy soldiers who occupy some of those trying positions which the chances of war often call them bravely, and sternly, to hold. He says, for example, "Having done all, stand." Now, there is nothing, as I am told and believe, which puts the firmness of men to so severe a test as that. It requires no great courage to play the soldier when, in firing or charging, advancing or retreating, they are engaged in the active duties of the field ; but calmly to hold a position where, unsustained by excitement—allowed neither to fight, nor advance, nor retire—they have to stand exposed to the shot that plunges into their ranks, making bloody gaps they have nothing to do but fill up, this tries the mettle of the bravest men. For this, the highest soldierly quality, our countrymen are pre-eminently distinguished, owing some of their greatest victories to their power of unmoveable and heroic endurance under, not as in Paul's days a shower of arrows, but a shower of iron. Wellington is reported to have said of Waterloo that the battle turned on whether we or the French could stand pounding longest. Having done all, we stood ; and the day was ours.

To such trials God sometimes puts his chosen and beloved people. After having done everything to protect themselves from the assaults of the Tempter, to defend their reputation, their purity, or peace, duty to God and his cause, duty to themselves or others, requires them to do nothing more, than just hold their post ; maintain their position ; patiently endure wrongs they might, but are not allowed to, repel ; and bear without complaint trials or temptations which they cannot avoid, and are not allowed to escape from. So stood Noah by the ark for many years, the butt and scorn of an ungodly world ; and so stood a greater than Noah before an infuriate crowd of hating, hissing, cursing, blood-thirsty enemies. Impeached of high treason, accused of many crimes which his soul abhorred, our Lord confronted the storm, letting it beat on his bent, innocent, blessed head. He stood, dumb, opening not his mouth—to the perplexity, and surprise, and terror of the Roman, answering not a word. Having done all, he stood—stood to be calumniated, tried, cruelly scourged, basely spat on, insulted with a crown of thorns, and condemned in the cross to a death of peculiar pain and infamy. He made no reply—offering no resistance, nor summoning the angelic legions that hovered above the scene, and were ready to descend with flaming swords to his rescue.

Equally warlike is that other expression where Paul says, "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmoveable." Be steadfast, unmoveable! are such words as we can fancy addressed to men who have formed into square to receive cavalry—the front rank kneeling to present a hedge of steel, and the next erect, with knit brows, and heads bent to the barrel of the musket along which their eye glares with deadly aim. Hurled on by the tempest, the wave comes swelling, foaming, roaring against the rock; and so, launched against this serried square, comes a mass of cavalry, with the sun flashing on their swords and the very ground shaking beneath their tread. The sight is terrific. The shock threatens to sweep all before it. The moment is critical. Let the line of the square waver, let it break, and all is lost: the foe, like a whirlwind, rush in at the gap to ride down and cut down the men, crushing the life out of brave hearts beneath their horses' feet. The issue now turns on each man keeping his post; standing to it like a tree rooted to the soil. At this terrible moment, just before the shock, I can fancy their leader, as he runs his eye along the grim faces of his line, calling out, "Be steadfast, unmoveable," ere he gives the signal which, followed by a loud crash of musketry, empties many a saddle, and rolls back that proud array in bloody discomfiture, like a billow shattered against a rock.

The Church of Christ is often placed in equally critical circumstances, the issue of her struggle depending on those who support his cause standing true to it and to each other. The most fatal results have followed the treachery or cowardice which, though but in a few, has broken the line; their example infecting others, the panic has spread, and the enemy who, so to speak, poured in at the gap, have scattered ranks that unbroken, "steadfast and unmoveable," had stood the shock of battle, and come off victorious. And many such moments also there are in that life-long fight which every Christian has to maintain with temptation. No doubt God promises Divine assistance; and that when the enemy cometh in like a flood, the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him. Yet in our conflicts with the devil, the world, and the flesh, how much depends on our being steadfast and unmoveable? Let us dally with temptation, waver, give way in the least degree, yield but an inch, and the day is lost—as we ourselves also should be but for the sovereign grace and mercy of Him who, blessed be his name, promising to heal our backslidings and love us freely, delivers his "darling from the dogs."

To watch, to fight, with steady front to meet and repel temptation—in other words to do no evil, is, however, though an important part, but one, and not the most important part of Christian work. The Church of the living God bears no resemblance to those communities of ants where a certain number of these curious insects form a sort of standing army, and have no other duties but to defend and battle for the commonwealth; the building, and provisioning, and other duties of the ant-hill belonging to others, and not to them. Nor, to take an illustration from the arrangements of human society, does Christ's kingdom resemble this or that of any neighbouring sovereign; where the military, wearing a distinct garb and exempted from those productive labours whereby others support themselves and add to the wealth of the country, form a distinct order of the community. The type of a Christian is seen not in lands where citizens and soldiers, working and fighting men, form different classes; but rather in those troubled regions of the East, where the husbandman, constantly exposed to the attack of murderers and robbers, ploughs the soil with a carbine slung at his back, or a sword dangling at his side. We are to be ever ready to resist the devil and fight the good fight of faith, yet our main vocation is to work; and he were but half a Christian who, though more successful than the best saints in that he never went to battle but he went to victory, only resisted temptation—only did no evil. Such negative goodness would present a poor and very inadequate specimen of the Gospel. What God requires of his people is much more than that—is to "do justly, and love mercy, and walk humbly" before him; is not only to depart from evil but to do good; is to be followers of Him who, while holy, harmless, and undefiled, went about doing good; is, in the words of an apostle, by a benevolent and beneficent life of active, holy, useful labours to abound in the work of the Lord. In regard to which I remark—

All Christians belong to "the working classes"—in a sense. There is one glory of the sun, says St. Paul, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars, for one star differeth from another star in glory. Nor, in respect of variety, is Heaven itself unlike the firmament, which forms its starry floor. Basking in the cloudless sunshine of God's countenance, and engaged day and night in the lofty services of his throne, are different orders of celestials—angels and archangels, seraphim and cherubim, principalities, dominion and powers; all perfect mirrors of the Divine perfections, yet each class, like the stars beneath their feet, differing from another in glory. And on leaving Heaven for earth, we find that, however widely they differ, variety is equally a feature of both. The very globe itself presents a series of heights and hollows, hills and dales, mountains that, towering above the clouds, are covered with eternal snow, and valleys that, robed in flowers and crowned with fruit, lie smiling at their giant feet—often, as the humbler classes of society would be, had they grace to look without envy on those above them, happier in their humility than the mountains that overshadow them in their cold, stormy, lofty, barren pride. A corresponding variety meets and delights us in every department of nature; for though in the services of Divine worship, within the church, some, the worst enemies of unity, insist on uniformity, we may say, as the old philosophers did of a vacuum, that Nature abhors it. Uniformity is not the mind or manner of God. What variety of plants between the stately cedar and the lichen that seems only to colour the surface of the naked rock; between leviathan, either floating like an island on the glassy deep, or, in his rage, churning the sea into snowy foam, and those creatures which the microscope detects, of forms so minute that ten thousand millions—a number equal to the whole human race—have been found in the space of one square inch. With such inequalities in heaven and earth, among angels and animals, it were strange if human society presented a uniform aspect, no corresponding variety. It does. God has placed men in different circumstances and endowed them with different gifts. Society has its heights and hollows; and it were as easy, by throwing down the mountains into the valleys, to reduce this globe itself, as to reduce it to one dead, uniform, uninteresting level. Such "equality, liberty and fraternity" as the French of last century raved of, and to reach waded to their knees in blood, was a dream. These are the privileges of Christ's kingdom; and of none other. Slaves, whom the truth makes free, are free indeed. Those who love one another as Christ loved them, are brothers; and more than brothers. And the grandest and only attainable equality is that of the grace of God. It raises all who receive Christ, peasants and princes both, to a common but lofty level; redeeming them by one blood, sanctifying them by one Spirit, constituting them kings and priests to God, and calling them all up to the glory which Jesus had with the Father before the foundation of the world. The varied conditions of society are the result of laws which man did not enact, and cannot repeal. And though none are forbidden, provided they do not make ambition their god, and wealth, power, or rank their good, from seeking to improve their circumstances, and rise above the level of their birth, as the earth has its hills and valleys, the world will have its higher and lower classes; some wealthy, others poor; the few who do not need to depend on labour for their subsistence, and the many who must earn their daily bread with the sweat of their brain or of their brow—but who, thank God, may find in the prospects of faith and the promises of eternal rest, what can sweeten a cup which the sweat of labour is apt to sour.

On turning, however, to the kingdom of grace, we find that all who belong to it—kings and statesmen, warriors, philosophers, and divines, men of every trade, rank, and profession, men and women alike, belong to "the working class." All are equally the servants of one Master; and what are servants for but to work? Redeemed by the blood of Christ—his and not our own, we are called to spend and be spent in his service. Here for employment more than enjoyment, for self-denial rather than self-indulgence, every one, even the humblest and obscurest Christian, may adopt the lofty language of Nehemiah, and speaking of himself, say, "I have a great work to do, therefore I cannot come down." We have first to labour for our own good, eagerly asking, What shall I do to be saved? and giving all diligence to make our calling and election sure. Then, living in a world that has many claims on our pity and much need of our help, on a wild shore, as it were, where the waves are roaring, and from wrecks, with thousands perishing, the cry sounds above the wail of the storm and the thunder of the breakers, Oh, come over and help us, we are called to work for the good of others. Working, toiling, enduring, we ally ourselves to the saints in glory, the blessed dead—who die in the Lord, and whose works do follow them; to angels also, who are ministering spirits sent forth to minister to them who are heirs of salvation; to Jesus also, who entered on his Father's business at an early age, and to the last hour, when they nailed his feet to the cross, went about doing good; to God himself, of whose works in creating angels, kindling suns, calling worlds into being, directing the whole complicated machinery of providence and of grace, Jesus said, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." Necessity, the mother of invention, is also the mother of work; and it may need an effort of resignation to reconcile people to a position where, from day to day and from year's end to year's end, they have to work to live. But to live to work, should be our choice, and esteemed a noble destiny. "My Father worketh hitherto," said Christ. God lives to work; and by such a life we prove ourselves the children of our Father which is in heaven.

Now, in regard to the character of the work in which Christians are to spend their life, I remark that it is the work of the Lord; and this, it is important to observe, may embrace our most common employments. Some appear to think that God's service, like that of the king who required the Israelites to furnish the tale of bricks without supplying straw to make them, enjoins and demands impossibilities; as, for instance, when believers are required to "pray without ceasing." How, it is asked, can any man pray without ceasing? But take the injunction, not in the letter which killeth, but in the spirit which giveth life, and it is not so impossible as many suppose; nor at all impossible, as has been proved by multitudes who have gone to exchange in glory the perpetual prayers of earth for the perpetual praises of the skies. Undertaking no work; giving no advice; entering into no company: if senators, never rising in parliament; if soldiers, never going into battle; if seamen, never embarking on a voyage; if travellers, never beginning or resuming a journey; if surgeons, never performing an important and difficult operation; if judges, never taking their place on the bench; if ministers, never leaving their study for the pulpit; whatever they were, never engaging in life's most common business without seeking the help of God; —prayer, like a silver thread, runs through the web of their life. It is no exaggeration to say of them, that, though not always actually engaged in prayer, yet always ready to engage in it—always maintaining their minds in a prayerful frame—with the bow never unbent, the instrument, though not always sounding, never out of tune—they prayed without ceasing.

Not less possible than to "pray without ceasing," is, though it may seem to some impossible, this other duty of "always abounding in the work of the Lord."

Entered on, and carried on, in a devout and pious spirit, our most common avocations rise out of their secularities into a loftier region. Assuming the character of religious duties, they may be called the work of the Lord. For, as a scene, though it presents at all times in fruitful fields and waving forests, gleaming river, shaggy mountains, winding shores, and rolling sea, identically the same objects, glows with beauty and brightness when bathed in sunshine, so piety makes a good man's whole life religious—the heavenly spirit in which they are done imparting a heavenly character to the humblest and most homely of his works. We may be engaged in the work of the Lord as well with a spade or plough in our hand as a bible; on our knees scrubbing a floor, as on our knees in the attitude and act of prayer. Come, for example, into this workshop of Corinth, where Paul is spinning cordage, or sewing a covering, or, axe in hand, fashioning a pole, or otherwise busy tent-making. Finding the great Apostle of the Gentiles employed in such secularities, one is tempted to address him in God's words to the prophet, "What doest thou here, Elijah?" Is this a place, or that an employment for such a man as Paul? And yet though, all fashioned alike, made of the same materials, and sold in the same market, there is no apparent difference between his tents and those of others, whether Paul work with axe or needle, the hours he spends in tent-making are sanctified—are spent in the work of the Lord. He asserts a minister's just claim to maintenance, and yet earns his bread with the sweat of his brow, foregoing his rights that the ministry be not hindered. Acting from the noblest motives and for such an end, Paul gives a religious character to a common employment; and the needle of the tent-maker neither demeans nor dishonours the hand that waved tumultuous assemblies into silence, and won the honours of a martyr's chain. Whether I eat or drink, he said, or whatsoever I do—go to a feast, or a funeral; make tents, or sermons; go to the market to sell my work for money, or to the church to sell Christ's free salvation without money or price; earn my bread with the sweat of my brow, or accept the hospitality of Gaius, mine host; make tents at Corinth, or fight with wild beasts at Ephesus; escape from Damascus in a basket, or, brought to bay, stand like a lion before Nero at Rome, I do all to the glory of God! Doing so, all he did, and doing so all we do, may be appropriately called the work of the Lord.

God's people shall renew their strength and mount up with wings as eagles. But it is quite a mistake to fancy that, like that bird, which builds her nest on the dizzy crag, and soars aloft, and sails along in the paths of the clouds and thunder, religion belongs only to the highest, and what are called holy, duties of life. While she rises to its highest, she stoops to its meanest, occupations. As well as the seraphs that sing before the throne, as the heralds who sound the trumpet of the gospel and proclaim salvation to perishing sinners, as the Christian who enters his closet to hold communion with God, they are doing the work of the Lord who kindle a fire, or sweep a floor, or guide a plough, or sit over a desk, or work at a bench, or break stones on the road, with a desire so to do their work that God may thereby be glorified. All work done from such motives and for such an end, becomes the work of the Lord—and thus our life, in all its phases, entirely spent in the work of the Lord, should flow on like a river which, however rough its bed, short or long its course, tame or grand the scenes through which it passes, springs from a lofty fountain, and, born of the skies, bears blessings in its waters and heaven reflected in its bosom.

I remark, further, that those things which are done in the name and service of religion, are emphatically the work of the Lord. This is the sense in which Paul uses the phrase, when, writing to the Corinthians, he says, "Now if Timotheus come, see that he may be with you without fear, for he worketh the work of the Lord, as I also do:" and what he means by that comes out clearly in his eulogium on Timothy, "I have no man like-minded who will naturally care for your state, for all seek their own things, not the things of Jesus Christ; but ye know the proof of him, that, as a son with the father, he hath served with me in the Gospel." And what are the things of Jesus Christ, here identified with the work of the Lord, but those grand objects for which, leaving his Father's bosom, the Son of God descended on this world to live, to labour, to sorrow, to suffer, and to lay down his life on Calvary—a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins and a noble substitute for the persons of men?

With tastes and a nature like ours, our Lord appreciated the pleasures of friendship, and of feasts also. He had an exquisite enjoyment in the beauties of nature—passing many happy hours in his journeys through the smiling land, in quiet walks by the shores of Gennesaret, and midnight musings among the hoary olives of Gethsemane. But these, though pleasant brooks to drink in the way, were not the things He lived for. In his Father's glory, and lost souls saved, and a ruined world redeemed, he had nobler objects: these drew him from the skies; to these He referred when, addressing Pilate, He said, "For this cause came I into the world." He came to work out salvation; and would God that all men, answering the call, Work out your salvation with fear and trembling, went up to heaven from doing what He came from it to do. There is no doubt that that is the work of God. Our Lord has distinctly said so—this is his reply to those who asked him, What shall we do that we might work the works of God? "This is the work of God, that ye believe in him whom he hath sent"—in other words, that ye lay hold on eternal life through faith in Jesus Christ.

And this salvation, about which many are so strangely careless, is the great work that has engaged God himself from the counsels of eternity, and shall engage him to the end of time: for which he has revealed mysteries, and wrought miracles, and bestowed gifts—in number beyond reckoning, in value beyond all the power of words to express, or the highest flights of fancy to imagine. Has the sea been divided? Has the sun been stopped? Has bread fallen from the skies, and water gushed from the flinty rock? Have the lame leaped, and dumb lips sung, and blind eyes seen, and its grim tenants left the tomb? It was to prepare the way for this work —to further a work of God's greater than creating out of nothing a thousand worlds, or lighting the night with the fires of ten thousand suns. To save our lost race, God did not spare his own Son. For that end He gave up his Son to death, and the Son gave up himself. And why does God at this moment tolerate the flagrant crimes and wickedness of earth? Why sleep the fires of Sodom? Where are the waters of the avenging deluge? In preserving the world from destruction, in sending summer and winter, seed time and harvest, in raising up one nation and casting down another, in directing and over-ruling all sublunary events from the fall of kingdoms to the fall of a sparrow, God has one purpose. It is that which angels have come down from heaven to help and devils have come up raging from hell to hinder—the salvation of sinners and ingathering of his chosen people. For their sake He spares his enemies: the tares for the wheat; Sodom for the Lots within its walls; nor till the last of these has left them, shall the City of Destruction be ready for burning. And how should men labour for an end that is of such value in God's eyes, and should be of such importance and immediate urgency in their own? To be saved and sanctified ourselves, and to be also the instruments of saving others—of plucking brands from the burning, the drowning from the devouring sea, this is especially and emphatically "the work of the Lord"; one in which men, who are exalted to be fellow-heirs with Christ, are called to be fellow-workers with God.

In those works which may be especially called the work of the Lord, be it observed that God's people are required not only to engage, but to abound, and to abound always. A harp is mute till its chords are made to tremble: and as its strings emit no sound till they are struck, some plants emit no fragrance till they are crushed—yielding their odours to the hand that bruises them. So is it with some people. When all things go well with them—fortune smiles, health blooms on the cheek, prosperity flows—bearing them on its affluent tide to wealth, or fame, or place, or power, or whatever is the object of their ambition, they neglect their souls. They drown all thoughts of another world in the pleasures of this. Nor is it till the scene changes, and the calm turns into a howling storm, and God, in the form of poverty, sickness, disappointment, bereavement, lays the hand of affliction on them, that they turn to him; and, seeking the salvation of their own and of others' souls, betake themselves to the true business of their life. And hard as such afflictions were to bear, how many in heaven are now thanking God that they lost friends and fortune; and that when they were driving full sail on destruction, he sent a storm that woke them up to see, and, by his timely help, to escape their danger? If the prodigal had not starved by the swine troughs, he had never been regaled at his father's table. If Jonah had not been tossed on the sea, and also tossed into it to be whelmed in darkness and the depths, he had never broken the peace, and, bringing them to repentance, saved the people of Nineveh. If the widow of Zarepthah had not looked with horror-stricken eyes on an empty barrel, she had never met the Prophet whom she brought to her house to fill it. If the crimes of the thief had not brought him to the cross, he might never have been brought to Christ. It is by a blow that many in the first instance are brought to their knees; nor do some ever become rich, till misfortunes make them poor.

But this work, however God's people may, in the first instance, have been led to engage in it, is one in which they are called to abound in all circumstances and seasons. They may be more lively at one time than another. Grace, like the ocean, has its spring as well as common tides; and, as in times of revival, an extraordinary effusion of the Spirit may reveal itself by more than ordinarily earnest prayers, devout exercises, holy lives, and liberal offerings of time and money to the cause of Christ. But the abundance of God's people more resembles that of a river which, fed by perennial springs, is always flowing, than the summer flood which, though it fills its stony channel to the brim with a red, rapid, roaring river, so soon as the lightnings cease to flash, and thunders cease to peal, leaves its bed dry—in a few hours, or days at furthest. Though a believer, from a sense of the feebleness of his love and the fruitlessness of his life, may be often constrained to cry, "My leanness, my leanness!" it should not, and need not, be so. The grace of God is marked by the affluence which characterises all his works. What abundance in that sun which has shone so many thousand years, and yet presents no appearance of exhaustion, no sign of decay? What abundance of stars bespangle the sky; of leaves clothe the forest; of raindrops fall in the shower; of dews sparkle on the grass; of snow-flakes whiten the winter hills; of flowers adorn the meadow; of living creatures that, walking on the ground, or playing in the waters, or burrowing in the soil, or dancing in the sunbeams, or flying in the air, find a home in every element—but that red fire in which, type of hell, all beauty perishes, and all life expires?

This lavish profusion of life, and forms, and beauty, in nature, is an emblem of the affluence of grace, of God's saving, sanctifying grace. In Christ all fulness dwells. We are complete in Him. There is in his blood sufficient virtue to discharge all the sins of a guilty world, and in his Spirit sufficient power to cleanse the foulest and break the hardest heart. Ye are not straitened in me, says God, but in yourselves. Try me herewith, He says—ask, seek, knock! Who does will find that it is only a faint image of the plenitude of grace we behold in that palace-scene where the king, looking kindly on a lovely suppliant, bends from his throne to extend his golden sceptre, and say, What is thy petition, and what is thy request, Queen Esther, and it shall be given thee to the half of my kingdom?

The abundance that characterises all God's works, and especially his grace and saving mercies, should characterise all our services. Take prayer for example. Though all find time to sin, some allege that they have no time to pray. Believe them, and they are so engaged, and indeed overwhelmed with the cares and business of the world, that they have no leisure for an exercise without which, I venture to say, the soul is as unable to live as is the body without food; as are flames without air; as are plants without water. So they neglect prayer. They have no closet in their house for prayer; the family altar where pious parents worshipped is a ruin; and between their door and this well of life the untrodden grass grows green. How does an old and even popish proverb rebuke their carelessness, and refute their false pretences? Mess and meat, it says, hinder no man's work; as, if it needed proof, is demonstrated by some illustrious examples recorded in the Word of God. Look for instance at Daniel! Prime Minister of the King of Babylon, at the helm of the state, with the complicated affairs of a vast empire to manage, he found time, besides offering many silent and sudden ejaculations, for stated closet prayer thrice every day. Look at the royal Psalmist! His case is not less, but rather more remarkable. Involved in incessant troubles, with a throne to defend, twelve turbulent tribes to govern, cases of justice to decide, cabinet councils to hold, armies to lead to battle, how did he abound in prayer? Amid the bustle of camps and the temptations of a court, he prayed, not twice, according to common custom, nor with Daniel thrice, but seven times each day—living in an atmosphere of devotion, he consecrated half his waking hours with prayer. How much the Church owes to David's prayers! To these she owes his psalms. By these he kindled those fires of devotion which have kept her piety alive through all succeeding ages. While to prayers that drew down strength from heaven Daniel, no doubt, owed the faith and fortitude which threw open his closet window to the gaze of spies, and descended with unblanched cheek and majestic mien into the den of lions. And let Christians remember that they shall sit nearest these saints in glory who in abounding, believing prayers have most resembled them on earth.

But with prayer the work of the Lord embraces all the duties belonging to the Christian life; and to see how we should not only make, but abound, for example, in sacrifices on behalf of the cause of God and salvation of souls, look at the conduct of the Israelites in the wilderness! The conduct of the Israelites? "Can any good thing," people may ask "come out of Nazareth"—be found in such a stiff-necked, ungrateful, and rebellious race? Hardly had they seen the sea engulph Pharaoh and his host, when they murmured for water: water gush from the flinty rock, when they murmured for bread: bread in the form of manna lying round their tents, when they murmured for flesh: yet one bright passage in their history puts to shame many of higher pretensions, and also higher attainments. The tabernacle of God, in other words the cause of religion, stood in need of their self-denial and liberality. Though He who rained manna from the skies and turned the rock into a flowing stream could have done without their aid, raising a gorgeous tabernacle, like his cloudy pillar, from the desert sand, He conferred on them, as He still confers on us, the honour and privilege of contributing to his cause. "This is the thing," said Moses, "which the Lord God hath commanded, Whosoever is of a willing heart, let him bring an offering to the Lord, gold, silver, and brass; blue, scarlet, purple, and fine linen; oil for the light, spices for the incense, and precious stones for the breastplate." So their leader appealed to the people; and as the water gushed from the rock to the stroke of his rod in a broad, full, sparkling stream, they answered this appeal with a flood of gifts. Rich, though, alas! too rare, examples of pious bounty, of earth reflecting the glorious affluence of heaven, the maid forgot her ornaments and the bride her attire; ears, fingers, arms were spoiled of sparkling jewels; gold gleamed and precious stones flashed thick on the vast, rising heap of fragrant spices, and finest textures of Egyptian looms; the spoils of Egypt were poured into the treasury; and such was the flood of gifts which answered Moses' call, that he had to cry, Hold, it is enough!

Pity it is, not creditable to religion it is, that the liberality of those whom Christ has redeemed with his blood needs, now-a-days, so much and often the stimulus of rivalry, the charm of eloquence, urgent and earnest entreaties—the spur often, the curb-rein almost never. Would to God, we were more fired with the love of souls and of Him who spared not his own Son to save us! Then would we spare our persons and our purses less; and not only abounding, but delighting in the work of the Lord, our life would rise more to the height of its motto, these grand words of Paul—I will gladly spend and be spent for Christ.

Her peaceful being slowly passes by
To some more perfect peace.
TENNYSON.

I.

I DO not distinctly remember how many weeks before her death I became acquainted with Hebe Dunbar, but I think it was about six weeks. The place she has occupied in my thoughts cannot be measured by days and weeks. I seemed to have known her for years. And yet I have not much to record: a few meetings and partings; a few conversations; a few prayers; that is all. How little of our deepest impressions can be given in words; how much must be for ever left unsaid! I have tried, in the following pages, to recall a few of those brief moments which death has made so unspeakably sad and precious to those that remain.

HEBE DUNBAR.

II.

It was one Sunday afternoon, about five o'clock, that I paid my first visit to Hebe. She was half-reclining on a sofa by the window, and thus appeared to me two or three years older than she really was. There was no death on her face. The rounded oval, the olive-dark complexion, the quiet unsuffering eyes, might have belonged to any one in perfect health. The weariness and exhaustion which even now at times stole over her, and which latterly became almost constant, had not then left a trace of pain; and yet we knew, as we sat there by her sofa, that the light of another world was upon her. For a few moments I could say nothing; when I spoke, it was to ask her whether she suffered much. She said, "Only sometimes; but I feel so weak." As I began to speak of suffering and patience, her father whispered to me, "She is very young." He was right; in a moment I felt how dry and tedious all ordinary moralising must be, and how useless to her. This bright young soul, so soon to be launched into the eternal world, what did it need! Surely, to forget the darkness of the grave, the coldness of death, to look to the light and warmth beyond. I knelt down close beside her; I asked, "if she knew that she could never get well?" She looked at me very quietly and, without answering, nodded her head slowly. I said "You must not be afraid to die. Do you believe that God loves you?"

"Yes, I think He loves me and cares for me. I try to believe I am not afraid to die."

"You must not think of the next life as strange and dark, but as beautiful and full of joy. Christ is there beyond the grave, in an eternal summer, waiting to welcome all those who love Him."

As I continued, she listened very patiently, with the same quiet and collected expression of countenance, and when I prayed, she closed her eyes; and when I came to the Lord's Prayer, she repeated it after me with great earnestness.

III.

The next time I saw her she was quite cheerful and much less reserved. She showed me the flowers that had been sent her, and chose some of them for me. She was very anxious that I should take a glass of wine before I went. It was one of those little marks which proved her constant thoughtfulness for others. Some days after I found her much lower; doubts and troubles seemed to have come over her mind, chiefly about loving God. She thought she loved her parents and friends more than God. I tried to explain to her that in loving them she was loving God; I thought that human love made heaven possible to the soul; that she might love her father and mother freely, for that love was given her to teach her the love of God, and was in fact only another form of it.

Her attention soon wandered. I felt she was getting tired. I could not quite read the meaning of her face; there was a certain look of bewilderment about it. I thought she was not understanding me, and when I left I felt wretched to think I could give her so little comfort. Fearing I might weary her, I did not call the next day, and on the following morning she sent for me. She wanted to ask me some questions. When I came, however, she was too much exhausted to speak or listen much. Rousing herself for a moment, she said, quite suddenly, "Sometimes I have bad thoughts; what am I to do?" I explained that to have a bad thought is not in itself a sin; it is a sin directly it is encouraged. We cannot help bad thoughts; they come we know not how, but we can crush them directly they arise; then they have not hurt us." This, I think, satisfied her. Some days after I found her sitting up on a low mattress on the ground. I then, for the first time, realised what a child she was. I sat down by her side, and she put both her little hands in mine, and she began telling me all that came into her head.

"Is it not strange the people did not believe in Christ, when He did so many miracles? That is a beautiful parable about the prodigal son; and I am so fond of the 23rd Psalm, 'The Lord is my shepherd;' but the fourteenth chapter of St. John I like better than all,—about the 'many mansions.'"

Afterwards she said something had been on her mind for many days, doubts and fears; she felt she was not fit for heaven. I said we might rest quite happy about that, because God was our Father. Of course all would not have exactly the same heaven; heaven was a state far more than a place, and would vary with the condition of the soul. The heavens of St. John and the penitent thief were doubtless very different; but both were with Christ in Paradise. He took both to Himself, and He would make them fit to dwell with Him for ever. As to her fears, the question was, "Had God forsaken her?" She was anxious; she felt herself not good enough. That was a sign that God's Spirit was with her and dwelling in her; no one ever felt that without his teaching, and He, who was thus proved to be with her, had said, "I will never leave thee nor forsake thee." Every fear, every anxiety was a sign that God's light was disclosing the darkness in order to remove it.

I could see that her experience varied very much with the phases of her disease. I begged her to believe that God never changed so; that what she felt about Him never altered his love for her, because "He was the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever."

She would complain at times that she could not pray, and latterly prayer of any length exhausted her. I asked her at moments to use short sentences. Prayer needed no words; it was an offering of the spirit, not the lips, "though the lips helped us sometimes to pray."

IV.

During the first few weeks she had wonderful returns of health and vivacity; some days she would declare she felt herself getting well. We almost began to hope ourselves, and talked of possible recovery. But our better reason reminded us that consumption was ever thus treacherous, flushing with momentary life the form that must so soon wither for ever. On such days I asked her to lay in stores of spiritual strength against the coming weakness and relapse. We could then read more of the Bible and pray more, and she was made very happy by it. We took those hours of revival as a blessed respite given us by One who tempers the wind to the shorn lamb, nor ever lays a burden upon his children too heavy for them to bear. It was during one of those last gleams of health, as I was just leaving her unusually cheerful and happy, that she chose a perfectly white rose from some flowers that had been sent her that morning, and gave it to me. I often look at the sere leaves now, and think of the gentle hand that will never give me another.

V.

She was never troubled now with any doubts about God's love and care for her here or beyond the grave. The thought of heaven was one of unclouded peace. At times she seemed almost to breathe the air of another world. I never knew in so young a person such depth of spiritual communion. Whilst praying, she would often appear quite rapt and abstracted from all outward things; and but for the occasional and silent moving of the lips you might have thought she was in a deep sleep. What love had the Father bestowed upon her, giving her strong faith and comfort as she entered into the shadow of the dark valley! Our own hearts seemed purified and elevated in the midst of the watchings; and as we marked the kindling of her face at the message of Divine love, and listened at times to her words of sweet patience and thoughtfulness for others, and joined in the prayer which to her was the water and the bread of life, we knew that she was being taught by the Spirit, and that the true light was now shining.

VI.

And now the disease rapidly increased. She hardly ever rested. I often came in late to say an evening prayer; but I dreaded wearying her. Sometimes I could not tell whether she was conscious or not; at others, I could do little more than sit by her side during those terrible fits of coughing, and stroke her dear face with my hand bathed in eau-de-cologne, or whisper what short words of comfort I could think of as she dozed away. Then at times she would suddenly revive, and taking my hand in both of hers press it to her lips, or stretch out both arms to kiss me as I left her, and murmur, "Dear, dear clergyman!" She now got a sharp and constant pain in her side when she coughed; and as I knelt down one day she took my hand, and, looking at me earnestly said, "Pray that this pain in my side may go away."

"Dearest child!" I said, "you must suffer now. You will never lose that pain. Remember, the pain was not taken away from Christ, but an angel comforted Him; and you too shall be comforted. We will pray for comfort and faith and patience, shall we not?"

She moved her head with a slow and thoughtful assent, and never again prayed to have her pain taken away.

"I know I must suffer," she said, and no complaining word escaped her lips; only, after a dreadful fit of coughing, she would place her hand upon her breast, with a look of piteous pain and exhaustion, and exclaim, "Oh, mamma, dearest mamma!"

VII.

Day after day now followed, leaving nothing to record. Little passed between us. When I came I would generally kneel down and whisper a few words of prayer in her ear; and only the gentle pressure of her hand told me that, as she lay with closed eyes, she was still conscious of my presence. The slightest exertion seemed too much for her. I almost dreaded coming to see her for fear she should rouse herself from some unconscious sleep, or suffer afterwards from the excitement of an interruption.

We all felt so utterly powerless to soothe or alleviate her sufferings, and from this feeling, although with many a wistful longing to see her, I stayed away for two days. On the morning of the third she sent for me. I was surprised to find her sitting up in an arm-chair. She appeared anxious and excited. I began to fear that doubt and despondency had again taken possession of her mind; but it was not so. She felt the approach of death, and had gathered up all her remaining strength to speak to us before the last lethargy stole over her. Her father and mother were with her. She had been talking much to them before I came. She was full of grief, and for the first time since I knew her I saw her eyes filled with tears. But there was no fear there. She wept because she was going to leave us, and because she now realised, perhaps for the first time, the full meaning of that separation. Her usual calmness forsook her. Her lips faltered, and her slender frame shook with emotion. She could not find words to express the thoughts which glowed within; but all her words and movements expressed intense and overpowering feeling. It was as if the deep impulses of her nature, which it would have taken years to develope, had suddenly blossomed and burned out in a minute. Naturally, she was quiet and reserved in many ways, but at this supreme hour all constraint seemed to vanish. She was never to feel, or weep, or love any more, and the emotions of a life-time were crowded into a few seconds.

"I love you," she sobbed; "I love you all so much!" and turning to me, as I knelt by her side, "and you, too,—I love you, dear, dear clergyman! Come to me soon in heaven. I pray that God will send you to me." And she threw her arms round my neck and sobbed violently.

Then, as she grew more tranquil, "Will you come to my funeral?"

"Yes, my darling," I said; "but you won't be there."

"Oh! but you will come!"

"Yes, dear. I will come and read the service for you." And I could say no more, for my own words choked me, and I kissed her forehead tenderly, but she said, "No, no! let me kiss your lips!" and so I kissed her again; but she was now growing very faint from exhaustion, and, dreading for her the consequences of so much excitement, I left her, promising to come in again about tea-time.

VIII.

That was our last happy evening together. I say happy, for the idea of impending death was so familiar that it had well-nigh lost its power to grieve us, except when her acute suffering brought it more vividly home. That evening she bore up wonderfully. All traces of the morning's agitation had left her. She was unusually calm—unusually free from pain and coughing. She thought she could take a little weak tea. I dropped small pieces of biscuit into it, and, kneeling down by her arm-chair, tried to coax her to eat a little, but, after one or two attempts, she laid her head upon my shoulder and would eat no more. I had brought her a little book of meditations, and, after tea, I read some of it aloud to her; and then she found me some Psalms, and amongst them her favourite—the 23rd, and would have me read it and explain it; and, after that, as the twilight deepened, I knelt down and prayed with her the last prayer that I can feel sure she really joined in, and shortly before I left the restlessness and coughing recommenced, which was never to leave her any more.

* * * * * *

One evening at five o'clock I came. I had chosen a few verses to read to her. I was thinking, as I stood at the door, of some very short words of prayer. I thought, perhaps, I should find her lying exhausted, but still conscious. I thought I would tread softly, and whisper very low; and that she would notice my presence with the faintest pressure of the hand, and, perhaps, half open the dreamy eyes. I little knew the hand had been cold for hours,—the tender, loving eyes closed for ever.

HEROES AND MARTYRS OF THE REFORMATION IN ITALY.

BY W. L. ALEXANDER, D.D.

II.—THE BROTHERS VALDEZ.

Travellers on the American prairies tell us that frequently the extensive conflagrations, which spread over these vast plains, have their origin in some very trifling accident—the careless throwing aside of a lighted match, the scattering of a few sparks from some traveller's fire, or the emptying of the glowing ashes from some Indian's pipe. Similar to this was the rise and progress of the Reformation in some of the countries where it took effect. It was but "a little matter" to outward appearance that kindled the great fire which spread with such wonderful rapidity over Germany and the northern states of Europe. That an honest and outspoken monk, scandalised by the profligate sale of indulgences, should utter his vehement protest against such abuses, was a thing not worth the notice of either ecclesiastical or political dignitaries, or, if noticed, a thing only to be laughed at as one may laugh at the rage of a puny child. But the utterance of that protest was the small spark which, falling on prepared material, kindled a conflagration in which the grand edifice of papal domination in these countries, which it had taken centuries to build, was all but utterly consumed, leaving little beyond its blackened walls to tell of its former greatness.

No such spectacle as this was presented by the Reformation in Italy. There no Luther arose; and if there had, it is very doubtful whether he would have been able to make his voice be heard so as to pervade the masses of the people. In Italy the flames burst forth sporadically, and in many cases without any traceable connection with each other; and each burnt out or was violently extinguished without communicating its influence to any large extent. This result is in a great measure accounted for by the state of things described in the preceding chapter.

The morning-star of the Reformation in Italy was, if we may so speak, a double star. Two brothers, Juan and Alfonso Valdez, natives of Spain, were honoured to be the first openly to labour for the propagation of evangelical doctrine in that land at the time of the Reformation. Like the object to which we have compared them, the two brothers were so closely connected—revolved so, as it were, around a common centre, and were so constantly changing their relative positions, alternatively giving and receiving from each other, that it is difficult, in some cases impossible, to discriminate the working of the one from that of the other. Some writers have given up the attempt in despair; whilst others have fallen on the expedient of creating an imaginary person, in whom both brothers are made to coalesce, and whom they call Juan Alfonso Valdez.* There can be no doubt, however, that Juan and Alfonso were distinct persons. Erasmus, writing to Juan, speaks of his brother Alfonso, and adds that they so closely resembled each other in body and in mind that they seemed almost one person,† a statement which, while it clearly establishes the fact that they were distinct, may also serve to account in some measure for their being so often confounded.

The brothers were twins, and were born at Cuenca, in Castille, about the beginning of the sixteenth century. Their father was hereditary regidor of their native town, and a person of rank and influence.‡ At an early period the brothers were placed at the Castilian Court; and we find Alfonso in the suite of the young King Charles, when he went to be crowned as Emperor at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1520. He accompanied the Emperor to Worms, and was present at the diet held there in 1521, where Luther appeared to defend his proceedings, and where he made his noble protest, "Here I stand; I can do nothing else; so help me God." It is probable that Valdez heard the discussions on both sides at that memorable conference; and it is a proof of his sagacity that, though but young and inexperienced, he saw more clearly how things stood, and whither the current was tending, than men who had been trained in diplomacy and were accustomed to affairs. "The majority in Germany and Rome thought that when the diet placed Luther under a ban, the whole affair was ended and peace restored; and only a few were as shrewd as the Spaniard Alfonso Valdez, who wrote from Worms to his friend Peter Martyr,* an account of all that passed, and concludes with the words, 'And so as people think we have got to the end of this tragedy, as I believe we are but at the beginning of it.'" † He saw that the Pope, by obstinately seeking the condemnation of Luther, and refusing to convene a general council, was repudiating the only means by which the peace of Christendom could be preserved.

Before this time, Alfonso, whilst yet a youth, had declared himself on the side of the friends of culture and liberal studies against those who still clung to the darkness and barbarism of the preceding century. A fierce controversy had arisen in Spain between the monks and the humanists (as the followers of the restored learning were called), in consequence of the condemnation and burning of the writings of Erasmus; and in this Alfonso took part with youthful fervour, and a zeal which provoked the taunt that he was more Erasmian than Erasmus himself. The policy of the Emperor led him to side with Erasmus, and when this became apparent the clergy sought to quiet the tumult as quickly and adroitly as they could. The skill of the Inquisitor-General came to their aid; he accepted the dedication to himself of a translation into Spanish of one of Erasmus's treatises, the "Enchiridion Militis;" by this the storm was allayed; and the Emperor felt himself free to make what use he could of the learned Hollander in the delicate and difficult policy, amid conflicting parties, which he found it expedient to pursue.

Valdez returned to Spain with Charles in 1522; and not long after this became Secretary of State under the High Chancellor Gattinara, at that time the ruling spirit in the imperial councils. In 1527 we find him with the Emperor in Palencia, and there he received a letter from the Archdeacon of Palencia, Alfonso Hernandez, the translator of the "Enchiridion," to transmit to Erasmus. He seems also to have been the writer of a letter from the Emperor to Erasmus, sent from Burgos, in December, 1527.

In this way his intercourse with that remarkable man commenced, an intercourse which cannot but have exerted a potent influence on the mind and character of one so ardent and susceptible as Alfonso Valdez. Juan also was a correspondent of Erasmus. The high esteem in which both the brothers were held by him is apparent from many expressions of admiration and affection which his letters contain.

In May, 1527, occurred an event which startled the civilised world, and produced a deep effect through Europe. This was the capture and sacking of Rome by the imperial army, led thither by Bourbon, who himself fell in the assault. The heated passions of the troops, inflamed by the sufferings and privations they had endured, and in the case of the German portion of them by religious animosity, and no longer under the restraint which the authority of their leader would have imposed, found vent in the most frightful excesses of cruelty, rapine, and lust. Shops were emptied of their stores; the churches and monasteries were spoiled of their most valuable ornaments and sacred treasures; the abodes of the citizens and the palaces of the nobility and higher clergy were plundered; a merciless butchery, that spared neither age nor sex, deluged the streets with blood; persons of the highest rank were taken prisoners, subjected to the grossest indignities, and allowed to escape with their lives only on the payment of a heavy ransom; high-born ladies were exposed to the cruelest insults, daughters were torn from their mothers' arms to gratify the brutal passions of the soldiery, and children were tortured to compel their parents to disclose treasures which they were supposed to have concealed.* For eight days this scene of dark and unbridled license continued, until barbarity itself began to be satiated with its excesses. The Pope the while was a prisoner in the castle of St. Angelo, whither all who could escape in time were pent up in close confinement. The utmost distress began to prevail within its walls. The stock of provisions was beginning to be exhausted; and as the approaches were so strictly guarded that not the smallest supply could be introduced, starvation began to stare the inmates in the face. Pestilence also, engendered by the multitude of dead bodies that lay corrupting in the streets, threatened to penetrate the fortress. It was only after long delays and the payment of a vast fine that the Pope was permitted to be at liberty.

To many the calamities that had come upon the papal see were regarded as the fulfilment of the predictions and warnings which had been from time to time bursting from the lips and pens of those whom the presence and pressure of measureless corruption had forced to take up the language of ancient prophecy and apply it to Rome. On all hands a feeling prevailed that the Divine indignation was marked by the calamities which had befallen the Pope and his adherents; and while some rejoiced in this, and even sought to add bitterness to the pontiff's sufferings by mockery and ridicule, there were many who, whilst they pitied the sufferers, were awe-struck with what they could not but regard as a terrible manifestation of the Divine wrath. In what light these events were regarded by the Emperor it is not easy to say. On first hearing of the sack of Rome and the imprisonment of the Pope, Charles gave utterance to expressions of grief and horror ; but the readiness which he showed to take advantage of the Pope's distresses for his own ends, and the harsh terms to which he constrained him to submit, lead to the suspicion that in his secret heart Charles was not greatly distressed by what had happened. A still more clear indication of the feeling at the Imperial Court, in reference to this matter, is furnished by a production which at this time came from the pen of the Emperor's secretary, Alfonso Valdez. The design of this treatise is to show that the blame of the disturbances which had brought such calamity on Rome rested with the Pope and his party. It is in the form of a dialogue between Lactontio, an officer of the Emperor, and an archdeacon who has just arrived from Italy at Valladolid, where Charles was when the news of the sack of Rome reached him. It is written in Spanish, and bears a title which, translated, is as follows : "Dialogue : in which are particularly discussed the things which happened at Rome in the year 1527. To the glory of God and the universal good of the Christian Republic." It was first printed in 1529 along with another Dialogue, and the two are usually found together.* They were, however, written at different times and by different pens, the one by Alfonso, and the other by Juan Valdez.

The Dialogue of Alfonso is the production of one already deeply imbued with anti-papal feeling and evangelical beliefs. In language which might almost have come from the pen of Luther himself he denounces the corruptions of the Papacy, and points out the contrast between the state of things in the Church of Rome and that which the New Testament shows the Church of Christ ought to be. He praises Luther and Erasmus for what they had done to expose and remove the corruptions of the Church ; ridicules the multiplying of reliques, whereby the faithful are put in the dilemma either of having to reject some or to believe what is absurd,—as that Mary, for instance, had two heads or two mothers ; denounces all trust in human merit for salvation ; and proclaims Christ as the sole medium of acceptance with God.

Copies of this Dialogue were circulated in MS., at first among the writer's friends, in the autumn of 1527, but copies of it seem soon to have got beyond their circle ; for in the beginning of 1528, Count Castiglione, the Papal Nuncio, who was at Burgos with the Spanish Court, had heard of it, and through his secretary intimated to Valdez the risk he was running in writing so freely as he had done of the head of the Church. In the course of the following summer, Castiglione, finding that the work was extending in circulation, and that it was proposed to translate it into Italian and French for the purpose of disseminating it where these languages were spoken, procured a copy, and formally complained to the Emperor of its anti-papal and dangerous contents. Valdez, on being called to account, expressed his regret if in his zeal to defend the Emperor he had been betrayed into any unbecoming language concerning the Pope ; but as respected the charge of having said anything contrary to the Christian faith, he begged that such a charge might not be entertained without investigation, as he was prepared to defend all he had advanced. He stated also that before issuing the Dialogue he had submitted it to the secretary of the Chancellor Gattinara, and several other persons of influence at Court, as also to the Chancellor at the University of Alcala, and not a few eminent theologians besides ; at whose suggestions some alterations had been made, and with whose approval the Dialogue was then circulated. "I have confidence in God," he concluded, "and in my innocence, that I shall come out of the investigation with honour rather than disgrace." Not satisfied with this, the Nuncio still pressed his charge, and hinted that Valdez deserved to appear in the infamous costume of the Auto da fe. The Chancellor, however, protected him ; and shortly after, Castiglione having troubles of his own with the papal see to occupy him, the matter was allowed to drop.

Alfonso was silenced for the time, and for a season prudently held his peace. But his brother Juan lost no time in taking up the contest, and entered the field with the other Dialogue above referred to. In this he introduces, after the manner of Lucian, as interlocutors, Mercury and Charon. These two enter into a conversation about the war then going on between the Emperor and the French King ; but their discourse is continually interrupted by the arrival of the souls of persons recently deceased, whom they question as to their manner of life before death and their religious opinions, and who are supposed to be under a necessity of answering with perfect truthfulness every question. In this way a popular preacher, a reigning duke, a bishop, a cardinal, an ascetic priest, a theologian, a pious priest, a monk, a friar, a humble and sincere Christian whose trust was only in Christ, and others, are introduced and examined. Such a method affords ample scope for exposing what the writer deemed errors and evils, both in religion and politics, and of this Juan Valdez takes full advantage. The work is written with a skill, a vivacity, and a point which Erasmus himself has not exceeded, and to which his brother in his Dialogue does not approach. Throughout the composition the sentiments are as distinctly anti-papal and evangelical as those of his brother's production.

Castiglione made a feeble effort to bring Juan under penalty for this work ; but he met with no success, and in a short time he was removed by death. It is remarkable, and shows to what an abject condition the Court of Rome was at this time reduced, that whilst the work of its own Nuncio, Castiglione, the well-known "Il Cortegiano," had been put in the Index of prohibited books, the Dialogues of the two Valdez, though translated into Italian, and circulated through Italy and printed in 1529, escaped that censure till after their death.

Alfonso still retained his place in the household of the Emperor, and in 1529 accompanied him to Bologna, and thence to Augsburg, where he was present when the Protestant Confession, prepared chiefly by Melanchthon, was presented to the Emperor and assembled princes. Alfonso had frequent intercourse with Melanchthon whilst engaged in preparing this document for presentation ; and to him the Protestants were indebted for mediating on their behalf between the

* A new edition of both Dialogues appeared in 1850.

Emperor and the papal Legate, so as to secure the presentation of their Confession.* After it had been publicly read, Valdez, in obedience to the Emperor's command, made a translation of it, in company with the Emperor's other secretary, Alexander Schweitz, into Spanish and Italian. Other services were rendered by him to the Reformers after the presentation, of which not the least was that he procured a French translation of a summary of the Confession drawn up by Melanchthon, and placed it privately in the Emperor's hands. From this time forward he seems to have been in communication with the leading Reformers. After this it is only casual glimpses that we catch of Alfonso Valdez. In December, 1531, we find a Papal Nuncio complaining of the influence at the Spanish court of one who was an enthusiastic admirer of Erasmus,† and this in all probability was Alfonso. In 1533 he seems to have remained in Italy, when the Emperor set sail from Genoa for Spain; probably not deeming it safe to risk a nearer intercourse with the Grand Inquisitor. We learn, from a letter of a Spaniard of that day, Francisco Enzinas, that such was the feeling against him among the monks in Spain, that not even the Emperor himself would have been able to save him from a violent end. When, where, and how he ended his course, no record remains to tell.

Of Juan Valdez after this we know something more. Like his brother, not finding it safe to be in Spain, he settled in Italy, and, after being for some time at Rome, he ultimately took up his abode at Naples, where he occupied himself for some time chiefly in literary pursuits. It was at this period that his "Dialogo de la Lengua," first printed at Madrid in 1737, and again in 1860, was produced; a work of much interest on the Spanish language and literature.‡ But his heart was set on other things. He was labouring in secret to propagate the knowledge of Christ among those with whom he had intercourse. Celio Secondo Curione calls him a man of the greatest piety and learning, and compares him to a mine-digger who was secretly labouring for the overthrow of the papacy; unlike his early friend and model Erasmus, whom the same writer stigmatises as a "pitifully unsteadfast character." He gradually gathered around him a company of kindred spirits, who, like the pious Jews of old, in times of national degeneracy and darkness, "spake often one to another," encouraged and helped each other in the pursuit of the truth, and sought, as they had opportunity, to make known to others the truth they had found. Of this society Juan Valdez was the centre and main-spring.

A man of culture, well versed in theological knowledge though a layman, strongly attached to evangelical truth, and feeling its power on his own heart and life, Valdez was eminently fitted to fill the place to which he was thus providentially called. With earnest zeal and unwearied assiduity he laboured to promote the cause, to which he had given himself both in his own country and in Italy. The former he could reach only by means of his pen; and this he used with diligence and ability. One of his earliest works at this time is a Dialogue, written apparently in Spanish, but which was published first in Italian at Venice in 1546. It is entitled "Alfabeto Christiano," and aims at a delineation of the leading truths of Christianity. Juan himself is one of the interlocutors; the other is Julia de Gonzaga, the widow of Vespasian Colonna, Duke of Trajetto; and the Dialogue is probably a report of what in substance actually passed between them. At that time Ochino was startling the community of gay and pleasure-seeking Naples with his eloquent and earnest addresses, delivered during Lent, 1536; and the conversation reported is said to have taken place after one of these addresses. The Duchess was accompanied home from the church by Valdez, to whom she took the opportunity of opening her mind; informing him that she felt a terrible struggle between the fear of hell and the desire of heaven on the one hand, and the fear of people's tongues and the desire of earthly honour on the other. Valdez points out to her that the existence of such a struggle was a favourable symptom, for it showed that the darkness had been assailed by its proper antagonist, the light of truth; and he encourages her to believe that though the Gospel had in the first instance done the work of the law in her, by agitating her conscience, it would in due time do its own proper work in giving her peace. To Julia's remark that she had always heard it said that the way to Christian perfection was by keeping such vows as the monks and nuns took on them, Valdez replies: "Let them say, lady; but believe me that, monk or no monk, a man has just as much perfection as he has of faith in and love to God, and not an atom more." He then tells her that "fire can no more cease to warm than faith can fail to bring forth the fruits of love; that faith is to be viewed as the tree of which love is the fruit." This brings up the question What is faith? and to this Valdez replies: "By faith I understand not a mere belief of the history of Christ, for that may well exist, and does exist, without love, and for this reason St. James calls it dead faith, such as wicked men and devils may have; but I mean thereby that which lives in the soul,—obtained not by human labour and skill, but by the grace of God through supernatural light,—a faith which holds for true all God's words, his threatenings as well as his promises; so that the man when he hears Christ say, He that believeth and is baptised shall be saved, he that believeth not shall be damned, so confides in these words as true that he has not the least doubt of his own salvation."* The Duchess replies that she believes all the doctrines of Christianity; but Valdez goes on to show that though, were she asked, she would profess her assent to each article in the creed, yet were one to ask whether she believed that God had forgiven her sins she would probably reply that she thought so, but was not sure; and this uncertainty, he says, arises from want of faith; for, if she believed with all her heart what she confessed in the creed, she would, when she confessed the remission of sins, whatever pain she might feel because of the offences she had committed against God, not hesitate with open mouth to say that God had forgiven her all her sins. It would require too much space to follow out this conversation in detail. One or two passages, however, may be given, as setting forth the writer's views on important points. On the conflict of the flesh and the spirit he says:—"St. Paul divides men into two parts, the one of which he calls the flesh, the other the spirit: the one the old man, the other the new man. By the old man, he intends man not quickened by the grace of the Holy Spirit, and by the new man he means man so quickened. The old man he calls flesh and body, subject to sin; whence it is clear that under the name flesh he includes the whole man, soul and body, without the Holy Spirit,—nature without grace. . . . . Whence it may be concluded that your soul is in one of three states: it is either mingled with the flesh and become carnal, or it is joined to the Spirit and become spiritual, or it is in conflict, because the flesh would have it for its own, but the Spirit is drawing it to itself." Regarding the true knowledge of God, he says that it comes only through Christ. "This way," says he, "is the certain, the clear, the sure path; this is the even, the royal highway. And know, lady, that in the knowledge of God through Christ lies the whole being of the Christian; for to know God through Christ, we must first know Christ. And since we cannot know Christ by natural light nor by any human effort, unless God open and illuminate the eyes of our soul, therefore I say that this knowledge of God through Christ is supernatural, and requires for its production the special grace of God. Now, when we know God through Christ, we know Him as full of love and goodness, merciful and compassionate, because we find in Christ love, benignity, mercy, and compassion." Christ, he asserts, came into the world to make satisfaction for original sin, whose abiding guilt only the eternal God himself can remove; He came to satisfy for the sins of all men of the Past, the Present, and the Future; He came to bring men to the condition of sons of God. The Dialogue concludes with some practical directions to the Duchess how best to care for the promotion of her spiritual interests, without exposing herself to the malice of the enemies of the truth.

Such caution was necessary in the state of things which then existed at Naples. The Viceroy Toledo was fired with zeal for the extirpation of heresy, and the Theatine friars took care that the flame should not languish for want of fanning. Only a couple of weeks before the conversation reported by Valdez is said to have taken place, an Imperial edict had appeared in Naples, forbidding all intercourse with persons infected with the Lutheran heresy, on pain of death and confiscation of goods. Not long after this the Viceroy inhibited Ochino from preaching, but was not able to prevent him from finishing his course. Perhaps the private regard of the Emperor both for him and Valdez, prevented their being interfered with so much as their enemies could have wished.

Several other works were prepared by Valdez at this time. The first was a translation of the Book of Psalms from the Hebrew, which he dedicated to the Duchess de Gonzaga; of which no copy is known to exist. To the same lady he dedicated also his next work—a Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans and the First Epistle to the Corinthians (Geneva, 1556, 1557, 1856); a work remarkable for its thorough-going investigation of the meaning of the Apostle, and its combination of learned interpretation with practical exposition. A treatise on the proper interpretation of Scripture, another on the best manner of preaching, and another on how the sons of Christians should be taught, we know that he wrote only from the testimony of others.* One of his most valuable works, however, has been preserved in the Italian translation, though the original Spanish is lost. It is entitled, "The Hundred and Ten Divine Considerations."† It was published after his death by Celio Secundo Curione, and was afterwards translated into French, English, and Dutch; it was also retranslated into Spanish.‡

What effect Valdez created by these writings, it is impossible to determine. But there can be no doubt that by his personal qualities and efforts he exerted a powerful influence on the circle in the midst of which he moved. Himself of noble descent, he found access to the high-born in the land of his adoption; and he possessed every advantage for acting upon persons of this class by his teachings. His health was feeble; but one who was no friend to him describes him as having a handsome countenance and most pleasing manners, and as speaking in a sweet and attractive voice. He combined, in a remarkable degree, elevation and strength of intellect with prudent zeal and simple and earnest piety. "He was most undoubtedly," writes an admiring friend, "both in words and in actions, and in all his counsels, a most perfect man. He devoted an atom only of his mind to the consideration of his feeble emaciated body; the greater part of his most pure intellect, as if out of the body, was always raised to the contemplation of truth and of Divine things."§ With such endowments and qualities, he soon gathered around him a circle of educated persons, whose hearts were touched with religious convictions, and whom he laboured to build up in knowledge, piety, and true holiness.

These friends held their meetings in private, in Valdez' own house, in the outskirts of the city, or in some other isolated residence where they might enjoy communion with each in the pursuit of truth without drawing on them the notice of those to whom such pursuits were odious. One of their favourite retreats was at Posillipo, a promontory which divides the bay of Naples into two portions, and where the delicious climate of that region dispenses its benignant influences. Here, sheltered from every wind that blows, amidst vineyards and groves, and cultivated fields, with the cloudless sky above and the deep blue sea before, numerous villas are clustered, especially on the western side, where the hill slopes down to the beautiful bay of Baiae. To one of these villas Valdez and his friends were wont to retreat, and there, in quiet and amid the serenest influences of nature, they took sweet counsel together, seeking to strengthen each other for the conflicts of life, and to help each other forward to that brighter and happier country they were longing to reach. At these meetings were to be found some of the choicest spirits of the day. There might be seen Ochino in his habit as a Capuchin friar, with his pale eager countenance, his snow-white hair and beard, and his bright restless eyes that bespoke the fervent soul of one of whose eloquence the cold Charles V. said, "It would make stones weep." Thither came Peter Martyr Vermiglio, the learned, large-minded man to whom England owes so much; and with him the young noble Galeazzo Carracciolo, the friend in after-years of Calvin and Beza, to whom the former dedicates his commentary on the Second Epistle to the Corinthians in terms of most eloquent eulogy, and whom the latter hailed as "a second Moses." There, too, were to be found Pietro Carnesecchi, who, steadfast in his attachment to the truths which he had heard at these conferences, was years after counted worthy of the martyr's crown;—Marc Antonio Flaminio, the scholar and poet;—Jacopo Bonfadio, the historian;—and others besides, whose names are not so well known to later times. Nor were worthy representatives of the other sex wanting; for there were to be seen such noble women as Isabella Manricha, of Bresegna, the friend of Olympia Morata, and who chose exile and poverty rather than relinquish her profession of the truth; the Duchess Julia de Gonzaga, reputed the most beautiful woman of the time, and who was saved from the tender mercies of the Inquisition only by the kind hand of death;—and the noble Vittoria Colonna, one of the brightest ornaments of Italian literature, and whose majestic beauty was the fitting counterpart of her elevated and serene intellect. With most of these names we shall meet again in the course of these sketches. To all of those who bore them, Juan Valdez stood in the relation of a teacher, counsellor, and friend.

These pleasant and edifying meetings were destined to be rudely broken up. In 1549, Caraffa, Archbishop of Naples, was called to Rome, and left as his vicar Scipione Rebiba, whose zeal for the Church led him to pursue the most violent measures to extirpate heresy. An active persecution of the Lutherans commenced, in which many suffered. Valdez himself was saved by death from the fate which would in all probability have befallen him at the hands of his enemies. He passed away in peace, but the society which he had gathered suffered much, and was utterly dispersed. One at least of their number, Alois di Caserta, endured martyrdom, being beheaded along with another of noble birth, Gargano d'Aversa, at Naples, in 1564. Others fled in various directions. Some of the ladies retired into convents, where, without taking the vows, they were permitted to live in peace. The feeling with all was probably that expressed by Bonfadio in a letter to Carnesecchi:—"Where should we go, now that Valdez is dead? This has been a great loss for us and for the world; because Signor Valdez was one of the rare men of Europe."*

PREJUDICE; OR, THE BLACK POLYANTHUS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "STUDIES FOR STORIES."

Part I.

When I was between twelve and thirteen years of age (said my friend, Sophia West), I was sent to a school in the country, which was under the care of two ladies, both widows, one the widow of a French Protestant pastor, the other of an English physician. Of the latter we saw but little: she was at the time of my arrival a great invalid.

Including two little girls, the children of the French lady, there were twelve pupils, four of whom were nearly grown up, and seldom condescended to play with us, or permitted us to address them by their Christian names. These young ladies were Miss L'Estrange Miss Ashley, Miss Morton, and Miss Ward.

Of the second four I was the youngest. We slept in four little white beds, in the same large chamber. we learnt the same lessons, had the same masters, and were great friends.

The third four were very much petted and played with by the elder girls; but we who held the middle place did not enter much into their sports, as considering them too childish; therefore, though we patronised them, and worked for their dolls, we frequently reminded them of our superior age and importance, and always spoke of them as "the children." Our names were Juliet Ashley, Belle L'Estrange, Margaret Smythe, and Sophia West.

We were very happy at that school, which was a large old brick house, more brown than red: it stood in a valley, and was surrounded by a very large garden, which was bounded on one side by a small shallow river. The lawn sloped down to the river, and several large weeping willows hung over it, and gave the house their name. It was called "The Willows." Beyond the garden was a hop plantation, and again, beyond that, a cherry orchard. We had free access to both, and were permitted to spend much of our half-holidays out of doors. There was an empty coach-house in the yard. It was given up to our use; and there we had a swing, some hutches for our rabbits and guinea-pigs, and there also we kept numbers of little birds, which we used to buy of a man in the neighbourhood, at the rate of 3*d.* for a redcap, 6*d.* for a linnet, 9*d.* for a robin, 1*s.* for a goldfinch that could sing, and half-a-crown for a canary.

If one little girl bought a redcap every one else did the same, and so with the rabbits, the guinea-pigs, the white mice, and the jackdaws. More than fifty common little cages garnished the white-washed walls of the coach-house; and the gardener's children drove a flourishing trade, by supplying us with different kinds of berries, buds of trees, cow-parsley, bran, thistle-seed, and other delicacies for our pets.

Though we had so many birds, Madame had passed a sumptuary law, limiting them to the species that I have named, for the sufficient reason, that if she should give leave to one little girl to purchase a bird of any other sort, each of the others would wish for one also.

Belle L'Estrange and I were especial friends. Our little white beds stood almost close together, and we had our drawers and boxes in common. Therefore, one day in April, when the weather was more than commonly fine, and it was a half-holiday, we were disagreeably surprised, when we came in from our walk, to find our beds moved and separated, and the elderly woman who attended us, Mrs. Massey by name, busily engaged in putting up a small blue bed, and evidently making preparations for a fresh pupil. Massey told us that she had known for some days that a new pupil was expected, and that she was to sleep in our room; "and I thought what a pleasant thing it was for you, young ladies," she proceeded—"makes it so cheerful for you."

"Massey, you didn't think so," said Juliet; "you knew we shouldn't like it."

Massey smiled, and taking up the hammer began to use it to so much purpose that for the present our murmurs were drowned.

"I'm sure, miss, I don't know any reason why you should not like it," she observed, when she laid the hammer down.

"Why did Madame keep it a secret from us, then?" replied Juliet. "She did not do so when Sophia was coming. And besides, Massey, just see what a mess you have made; every one of our boxes moved, and all the beds pushed out of their places."

"It was Madame's orders, Miss Ashley," said Massey. And she sat at the foot of the little blue bed, making up rosettes to trim it with, and taking all our grumbling and discontent with the most placid composure.

We asked an infinity of questions, but could not obtain much information. "The young lady was in mourning," she said. "She had already arrived. She had dark hair, and seemed to have been crying." She then volunteered the information that a parrot in a cage had been handed through the carriage window, and that it was now standing in the hall.

A parrot! We wondered whether Madame would permit her to keep it. We did not know that we should consider it particularly fair if she did, for we were not allowed to have parrots.

When Massey was not pleased at our remarks, she shook the curtains or rustled her work. She now, evidently, wished us to talk of something else, and asked us whether we bought anything during our walk.

"Only some rape seed," said Belle, "and a black polyanthus. Oh, dear, how disagreeable this is. Are you sure Madame said my bed was to go into this corner?"

"Yes, Miss Belle. Well, to be sure, what a deal of money you young ladies spend on your pets. Now, if I were you, miss, I should consider what a great room this is, plenty of space for all to be comfortable; and I should make up my mind to be pleased, and make the young lady welcome, instead of looking so melancholy."

"So Madame fetched the new girl from the station, in the carriage," observed Belle, in a reflective tone. "I thought I heard a rumbling in the court-yard. That was the carriage, no doubt."

The slightest possible smile stole over Massey's features. "Did you indeed, miss?" she replied, taking up the valance, and pushing the long lath through the slide. "Well, do you know, young ladies, last night I heard a queer kind of rumbling myself."

"Indeed?" we all exclaimed.

"Yes, indeed, ladies. I was in the linen-room, under this, you know, and it had struck ten. First, I heard a pattering exactly like feet running about, and I said to myself that never can be the dear young ladies, for they were snug in bed an hour ago. Well, I listened, and presently I heard a rumbling sort of noise, just as if somebody was jumping from one of your beds to the other, Miss West, and Miss Belle L'Estrange. So I said to myself, I shall think it my duty, if ever I hear that noise again—these are the very words I said, I can assure you—shall think it my duty to tell Madame."

A short silence followed this announcement, but we soon began to question Massey again. She parried most of our questions; and excepting that she said the young lady was brought "by a roughish-spoken gentleman, in a light great-coat," we were not much the wiser for them. We declared there was something mysterious about the whole affair. Massey repeated that she was sure we should like the young lady when we knew her; and having now finished and sewn on the last of her blue rosettes, she began to put on our afternoon frocks.

"A roughish-spoken gentleman, in a light great-coat," said Juliet. "I don't believe he was a gentleman at all; only farmers wear light great-coats."

"I'll tell you what, Miss Ashley," said Massey, when she untied Juliet's frock, and it fell to the floor with a thump, "this won't do at all; here's your frock pocket as full of canary seed as it can hold. A pretty thing for a young lady to do, turning her pocket into a seed bin! Some day you'll get an imposition set you for this."

"Well," said Juliet, "then the man should not sell it in such thin paper: the bag broke, and if I had not put it in my pocket it would all have been spilt on the road."

"Ay, here's Miss West's pocket full of cow-parsley," continued Massey, proceeding to examine my frock with a rueful face. "Deary me, what a life I do lead with you, young ladies! Last Monday was a week I really thought I must speak to Madame, for when I was turning out Miss Belle's pocket for the wash, up spirted a lot of bran into my face, and all over my cap and the clean carpet."

"Well, Massey," replied Belle, "if you would be so kind as to hang up a light great-coat for us, on these pegs, we could all keep our seeds in it. You know there would be six pockets at least; and what a convenience this would be, especially if we could have them without the rough-spoken gentleman."

"Dear me," exclaimed Massey, in a tone of vexation, "you young ladies are as sharp as needles; to think that I should have said such a thing, when Madame was so particular that you should not know but what Miss Palmer came unexpected like."

"O her name's Palmer, is it?" said Belle, "and she was expected to come unexpectedly?"

"Tut, tut. There it is again. Such provoking children never did I see. I never gave it a thought, I am sure; but you are as sharp as needles. Keep your head still, Miss Belle, or I shall hurt it with the brush. There's Madame's foot on the stairs, and your bonnets not hung up yet, nor your walking-shoes put away. Let her see the room neat, if you please, young ladies."

We had scarcely put these things away when Madame entered, followed by a girl about our own age. She was dressed in mourning, and had been evidently crying. She seemed painfully shy and awkward; and when Madame introduced us to her, one by one, she blushed till her neck and arms were tinged with crimson. Madame was sure we should be delighted to have another companion; thereupon we shook hands with Miss Palmer. Then Madame was sure Miss Palmer would be very happy, and make herself extremely agreeable; upon which, Miss Palmer pinched her fingers, and looked on the floor. Then Madame said she would retire, and leave us to amuse our new friend, till tea-time. Our new friend was to sit down, and make herself at home.

Accordingly our new friend sat down at the foot of her blue bed, bent her face, dropped her hand at her side, blushed continuously; and seemed exquisitely uncomfortable.

The kind-hearted Massey, pitying her shyness, asked if she would like her boxes to be brought upstairs, doubtless thinking they might afford her something to do.

When she was gone down to fetch them an awkward silence ensued. At last Belle L'Estrange said, "We were told that you brought a parrot to school, Miss Palmer?"

"Yes," she replied, without lifting up her eyes.

I inquired what she gave him to eat.

With the same air of constraint, she murmured, "Sopped bread."

"Sopped bread," I repeated, glad of something to remark upon. "I did not know that a parrot could live on that alone."

As if it cost her a great effort she then said, "Sometimes he has Indian corn."

Presently, to our great relief, Massey returned, and helped Miss Palmer to unpack her clothes. We could scarcely contrive to keep up any sort of conversation with her, and therefore were delighted when the tea bell rang, and we could be released from the constraint which her shyness imposed upon us.

We had already made up our minds that we did not like her, and told the elder girls that our room was spoilt now, and we should never enjoy ourselves as we had done.

However, after tea, we were permitted to go into the garden for a few minutes, and Madame gave a little plot of ground to Miss Palmer: then she brightened up a little, and it appeared that she was not only very fond of gardening, but that she knew much more about the cultivation of flowers than we did; she also pleased us by her evident admiration of the black polyanthus, which was brought out in triumph by its happy owner, and planted in the middle of her own peculiar property.

Belle had bought it of an old woman, in whose garden she saw it flourishing. The old woman said it had been left there by the man who lived there before her. He was a gardener, but he had emigrated to America, and she should be happy to dispose of it. Belle being equally anxious to purchase it, the bargain was soon struck, and certainly it was the most beautiful polyanthus possible, black and velvet like. Madame had not one in the garden that could compare with it.

I think that first evening we did try to overcome Miss Palmer's shyness; but the next day, when morning school was over, and we went into the garden for our short play, we found her such a restraint, that we begged Miss L'Estrange, Belle's elder sister, to walk about with her, while we ran away to feed our birds. Miss L'Estrange did as she was asked, but very injudiciously broached the subject of the shyness; told her how very uncomfortable she made us by it, and how much we lamented it. She begged her to try and feel at home, and talk and play with her school-fellows. But it was not at all surprising that her well-meant harangue should have increased the evil; the idea that it made other people uncomfortable could scarcely fail to augment her awkwardness.

She, however, asked Miss L'Estrange to take her to the coach-house, and I well remember her appearance as she entered with her, and stood within the door. She had a sort of resolute air, as if determined to perform some very hard duty. At first Miss L'Estrange did not seem to know what to say; but when we all turned from our birds, and looked for an explanation, she exclaimed—"Oh; I've brought Miss Palmer—she—I suppose she wishes to play with you."

Miss Palmer, on this, looked, and said, hurriedly,

"No; I didn't mean—at least, I mean that I don't wish to intrude; I only meant——"

"Oh this is not intruding," said Miss L'Estrange; "the coach-house is given to the second class."

Miss Palmer coloured with confusion. She was not pretty; her black hair was stiff and intractable, her shoulders were high, and she stooped very awkwardly; but she had exceedingly large, dark grey eyes, and, when she raised them, they had a peculiarly searching, but, at the same time, somewhat of a beseeching, expression.

"I don't want to stay," she continued, drawing back towards the door; "but I meant to tell you, that—I'm sorry I made you so uncomfortable."

We all looked at Miss L'Estrange; but before anything explanatory could be said, Miss Palmer murmured that she did not know her afternoon lesson, and made her escape.

"Well," said Juliet, "so we are to be tormented with apologies and misunderstandings, as well as shyness! She will be sensitive, I suppose—I cannot bear touchy, sensitive people."

"No," said Belle; "don't you remember how tiresome Fanny Moore used to be; writing notes of apology for things she had done days before and which no one had noticed; and asking us what we had meant by things we had said a long while ago; and quarrelling, and then crying and making it up, and expecting us to cry, too—I've no patience with that kind of thing. Miss Palmer will be just like Fanny."

"Tiresome girl," said Miss L'Estrange; "and when I had been particularly begging her not to be so shy, and saying what a disadvantage it was to her."

I do not remember that anything particular happened during the rest of that day; but the next being fine, we were sent out for a long walk, Madame giving leave to Miss Palmer to stay in the garden, and work at her own little plot, which was, no doubt, kindly intended as an indulgence both to us and to her.

Miss L'Estrange was also detained to finish a drawing. Our new friend, however, had not long been out when she appeared at the window, saying that there was a man in the yard with a basket of flowers, and might she buy some? Madame gave her leave. "And I supposed that they were nosegays of cut flowers," said Miss L'Estrange, from whom we had this account, "or I should have asked leave to go also, particularly as I had heard you all say that a man had been ordered to come 'for once,' by Madame's consent."

"Yes, to be sure," we all exclaimed, when Miss L'Estrange met us at the gate of the hop plantation, and gave us this description of what had occurred. "Surely the man is not gone?"

"You shall hear," she replied. "In half-an-hour my drawing was finished, and Madame dismissed me; so I went into the garden, and there I found that sly little thing, sitting on a garden bench, with six plants in pots standing before her. There were two polyanthus plants, with flowers nearly as black as Belle's; and two lovely purple auriculas; and two other plants, that I did not much notice because they were not in flower. 'Oh,' I exclaimed, 'so these were the plants that the man brought! Why did you not say so to Madame?' She looked confused, but only said, 'I did not know that I ought.' I said, I knew that the man had been ordered to call, and that you would all be dreadfully disappointed to find him gone. So, she looked up and said, 'He told me he could not wait; but that does not much signify, for he had only these polyanthus plants, and I have bought them; besides them and the auriculas, and these cyclamen flowers, there was nothing in his basket that was worth having. I gave four shillings and sixpence for these, and he took away nothing but some fading hyacinths, and some common plants, such as they have got. It would have done no good to detain him; and, besides, he said he could not wait.' 'Oh, of course,' I said, 'if you had chosen all that was worth having yourself, it was no use detaining the man.' 'Indeed, I did not send him away,' she replied; 'he said he could not wait.' 'But,' I continued, 'I am afraid they will be very much disappointed, for they have been expecting this man for weeks; and I know they particularly wanted some of those shuttlecock-flowers, and some auriculas.' 'The man said he expected to sell them to the young ladies,' she answered; 'but as they were out, and he would not wait, I thought——' 'Oh, yes,' I interrupted, for I was disgusted at her selfishness, 'I understand perfectly—as they were out, you thought you might as well have them yourself.'"

All this Miss L'Estrange told us as we advanced towards the house, and we were in the full eloquence of regret and indignation when, at a turn in the walk, we saw Miss Palmer on a garden-seat, with all her purchases before her.

She started up when we appeared, and advanced hastily to meet us; but the moment she observed Miss L'Estrange with us, shrunk back again, and, lifting up her garden-apron, began to knot the corners, and twist them with an agitated face.

That our man should have been suffered to depart before we had seen him, and that all his best plants should have been picked out by a stranger for herself, was such a decided grievance, that offended dignity would scarcely permit us to pause before the flower-pots; and I believe we should have passed on, lovely and tempting as they looked, if Miss Palmer had not risen again, and, colouring up to the eyes, begun some stammered excuse about the man's departure.

"It was of no consequence," we answered, rather coldly.

She seemed to be attempting some explanation, but stood as if shame and shyness overcame her; when we effectually stopped her by saying, that Miss L'Estrange had explained to us that the man had nothing left for us—that we were sorry, but hoped we should be more fortunate another time.

Then we swept on towards the house, and she, to our extreme surprise, burst into a passion of tears, which arrested us, for we felt that, being such a new comer, we ought not to have annoyed her so much.

An awkward pause ensued, during which she cried most bitterly, and we stood looking on, till, happily, the first school-bell rang, and with a sudden effort, she controlled her tears, and rushed on into the house to bathe her face and recover herself.

"How odd that anyone with such a keen sense of shame should have done so mean an action," observed Miss Ward.

"I was always sure that I should never like her," said Margaret. "I felt it the moment I saw her."

"As for me," Juliet added, "I knew it before I saw her."

"Oh, come," said the elder Miss Ashley, "that really is prejudice, Juliet."

"Prejudice," I replied, taking up Juliet's cause, "not at all; our room was pulled to pieces for her before she had even entered the house; and besides, we knew by the way Madame brought her up-stairs herself, showing her so much more attention than she did to us when we arrived, and saying so many times that she knew we should be such good friends, we were sure by all this that she expected we should not."

The elder girls laughed heartily at this.

"There certainly was nothing of the kind done when I arrived," said Miss Ward to Miss Ashley; "on the contrary, just as grandpapa put me down out of the carriage, I saw Madame standing on the steps with you in her hand, and while she talked to grandpapa, you walked up to me and said, 'How do you do? do you like lemon-drops?' and immediately put one into my mouth. We were about six years old then, Fanny, and from that moment to this we have been on strictly confidential terms."

"Now then, young ladies," said the English teacher, "go up-stairs; the second bell rings."

Accordingly, we all hastened to take off our bonnets, and proceeded to the school-room, where we found Miss Palmer already in her place.

The afternoon, for the time of year, was unusually warm, and the sun being full upon the school-room windows, the blinds were all let down, excepting one, which was on the side that looked into the garden. Our class was reading, and the children were writing copies; we got on very well to a certain point, and then became very inattentive, lost our places, and miscalled the words; the fact was, that our eyes were so irresistibly drawn to the window, that it was quite impossible to keep them on the book. Something white had been seen gliding in and out among the flowers; it was very distant at first, and so silent and light in its movements, that it might have been taken for the ghost of a last winter's snow-wreath; but it shortly drew nearer, and had the audacity to lie down among Madame's best anemone plants. We knew very well what it was, namely, a rabbit, Speck by name, the favourite pet of little Nannette, Madame's youngest child. The whole school, by means of glances and signs, soon became aware of his escape; but we were in such perfect discipline during school-hours, and the rules enjoining silence were so strictly enforced, that not a word was said; even the little owner of the rabbit, though tears ran down her cheeks, blotted her copy, and wetted her chubby little hands, continued to work away at her pothooks, only venturing now and then to cast a glance at the lawn with a distressed and crimsoned countenance.

At length, as I with earnest diligence was trying to ring my r's and run my words sufficiently into one another, while I read a speech from Racine, after Madame, a loud and sudden sob sounded through the school-room, and little Nannette burst into a storm of tears, which was all the more vehement for her long restraint. Nannette was such a good, sensible child, and such a scene was so uncommon in the school-room, that the teacher and Madame rose instantly, anxious to ascertain what was the matter. "The walk was too much for her," exclaimed the English teacher.

"Something has hurt her," cried Madame.

"The ink," said the other teacher, "may have spirted up into her eye."

The little girl struggled to speak, and at length contrived to sob out in her native language, "O mon lapin, mon cher Speck! O mon lapin!"

The mystery was now solved; Madame hesitated, we all looked eagerly at her, but no one stirred; it wanted a quarter of an hour to the time of dismissal. "We could catch him, Madame," said Miss Ward, "if we all went at once."

A murmur of assent ran through the classes. The rabbit had now got a long way off; Nannette's sobs burst forth afresh. "Well, young ladies," said Madame, "for once you may."

We did not need a second bidding, but down went papers, pencils, books and work; and out we rushed into the sunshine, teachers and scholars.

What a joyous chase it was; we had lost sight of the rabbit, and had rushed almost to the very end of the lawn after him, when turning we beheld him near the house; back we ran; off he went into the shrubbery; many times one and another seemed to be just upon him. We cleared the little flower-beds; he turned, we doubled, whooping and crying to one another. No one ran like Belle; we thought she was sure to catch the rabbit; she dashed through a clump of laurustinus shrubs; but just as we were sure she must be upon him, down she came with a loud crash and such a scream, that we all rushed to the spot with beating hearts.

Alas! poor Belle had forgotten Miss Palmer's flower-pots, had caught her foot against one, broken another, and scratched her arms and face all over with the gravel.

The English teacher picked her up; at first she cried, more through fright than pain; and while the elder girls condoled with her, rubbed her bruises, and put her torn dress a little to rights, the children continued the chase after their rabbit. Belle soon left off sobbing, shook back her curly hair, and declared she was not much hurt; but, though she tried to laugh at her scratches, they were evidently painful, and she was obliged to sit down on the grass before she could limp homewards.

"Such a violent fall!" said Miss Quain, the English teacher; "it was a mercy Miss Belle did not break any bones; how came they here, these pots, just in the middle of the walk?"

Every eye looked towards Miss Palmer.

"Are these your flower-pots?" asked Miss Quain.

"Yes, ma'am," replied the new pupil; "at least," and then she hesitated.

"At least what?" asked Miss Quain.

"At least—I paid for them."

"If you paid for them of course they are yours; why could you not have said so without this prevarication?"

Miss Palmer looked extremely uncomfortable, and began to pick up her pots; two of them were broken, and the purple auriculas that they contained were all torn from the stems, crushed and completely ruined.

"I am sorry to have spoilt your auriculas, Miss Palmer," said poor Belle.

"There is no need to apologise," replied Miss Quain, rather sharply; "they ought not to have been left there; a most dangerous thing to do when so many children are playing about here. Whereabouts is your garden, Miss Palmer?"

"Behind these shrubs, ma'am," said the culprit.

"Then carry them there directly; let the flowers be planted at once, and then take the pots to the coach-house."

Still Miss Palmer hesitated. "If my orders are not obeyed at once I shall forfeit the plants," said Miss Quain.

Thereupon, the broken auriculas and the other plants were slowly lifted up by their owner, and carried away, as well as the pieces of pots and the scattered leaves. This little episode had almost made us forget the white rabbit, till we saw the hunting party returning slowly towards us, with failure plainly written in their faces.

They had chased the rabbit as far as the hedge which divided the garden from the hop plantation, and the cunning little animal had crept into the very middle of it; so that, as it had not been trimmed that spring, they could not reach him, though they watched him, and surrounded him on both sides. After nibbling some of the green hawthorn twigs, he sat up and began to rub his face in the most placid style; till at last, when their patience was nearly tired out, he deliberately ran through the midst of them, and bounded away among the hop poles, till they lost sight of him.

We could distinctly hear the sound of Miss Palmer's spade behind the trees. Belle presently rose from the grass; perhaps, as she had unintentionally spoilt the auriculas, and as she knew that the possession of them had already been somewhat embittered to their owner by the remarks we had made, she wished to show some interest in the operation of planting them, or to see how far they were injured.

However this may be, she asked Juliet and me to give her each an arm, and we all proceeded behind the laurustinus shrubs, to Miss Palmer's garden. Belle was vexed at the mischief she had caused; but in our inmost hearts I believe we were both secretly pleased at it, as an instance of what seemed such strict poetical justice. Miss Palmer had taken advantage of our absence to purchase plants which had been brought for us, and now these very plants were broken and spoilt by one of us; and she herself was scolded, instead of being compassionated on the occasion.

Belle, limping slightly, advanced between us; but Miss Palmer continued to dig, and did not look at us.

The afternoon sun, already getting low, was shining full on her flushed face, and it seemed to me that she held it inconveniently high, because her eyes were full of tears, and she wished to prevent them from falling.

Her spade went in several times, while she continued to look steadily before her; at last, she set it in so close to a pretty little plant that I thought she would dig it up, and exclaimed, "O Miss Palmer, do you see your little heartsease?"

On this she looked down, and the tears dropped on her cheeks; she hastily dashed them away, and then stooping, moved the earth from her heartsease, and taking up the flower-pots, began to turn out the plants and set them in the space she had dug over.

"I am afraid the auriculas are spoilt for this spring," said Belle.

"Yes," replied Miss Palmer, without looking either at us or at them; and there certainly could not be any doubt about the matter, for every stalk was snapped, and every leaf was broken.

"Well, certainly," said Juliet, rather sharply, "Belle has been severely punished for tumbling over them; she has hurt her foot very much."

"I am very sorry, and I said so at first," said Miss Palmer, still without looking at us.

"Oh, I beg your pardon," answered Juliet; "I did not hear you, and I thought, as Belle had said several times that she was sorry about the plants, it seemed odd that you did not say——"

"Juliet, I wish you wouldn't," interrupted Belle. "I did not come here to make her say anything. I am sorry, and I did not remember that the pots stood there."

"Very well," said Juliet, "then that is all, it seems; your foot will soon be well, and if it was worse, perhaps Miss Palmer would think it served you quite right."

There is no saying what passionate rejoinder might have been made to this, nor how far we might have forgotten all kindness and propriety, if the children, backed by Miss Ashley and Miss L'Estrange, had not dashed in upon our counsels, declaring that the rabbit had reappeared, that he was behind the yard palings, and that if we would come and help, they were sure that he could be surrounded and caught. Accordingly, Juliet and I ran away with them, Belle limped home to the house, and Miss Palmer was left behind to reflect on what had passed and plant her broken flowers.

Of course we did not catch the rabbit; but our zeal satisfied little Nannette that we were sorry for her loss, and anxious to repair it.

Many tears were shed that night by Speck's little mistress on his account; but the next day Miss Ward gave her another rabbit, quite as white and much less wild than Speck; so she was completely consoled, and he was forgotten.

That fine day was succeeded by a very rainy night, and it rained all the next day, so that little Nannette's rabbit had been bought through the gardener, whose apprentice had one for sale, and who was allowed to bring it into the hall, and exhibit it to us there, as Madame said, "for once;" a phrase by which she prefaced nearly every indulgence of the many she gave us.

The next day was also wet, and it was not till the following morning that we could go out. The leaves had expanded so much during the soft rain, and everything looked so fresh, that while we were dressing we speculated as to whether we might venture to plant out our young geraniums that Madame was taking care of in the frames; and were full of hope for our different plants and seeds. What, then, was our consternation on reaching our little gardens, to find Belle's beautiful polyanthus, her black polyanthus, which was the pride of her heart, and of which even Madame had condescended to ask for an offset—that very black polyanthus which we had left so blooming, with every leaf, stock, and flower cut clean off level with the ground, just as if a knife had been passed over them by some person, who, contented with despoiling the plant, had left its ruins lying just where they fell! The whole school stood round lamenting, with the exception of Belle and Miss Palmer; for the former, though her foot was nearly well, could not run yet; and the latter had exhibited no wish to come into the garden; on the contrary, she had expressed her disappointment that we were not going to take a walk instead; and, as we well remembered afterwards, had said, "She was sure she should never take any pleasure in her garden again."

Everybody's exclamation was, "Who can have done this?" and poor Belle, when she arrived at the spot, stood silent for awhile with vexation; and then could not help remarking how curious it was that her plant should have died so soon after she had destroyed the lovely auriculas. However, she took her misfortune very well, and began to pick up and examine the flowers.

"This has evidently been done with a knife," said Juliet.

Just at that moment we observed that Miss Palmer was standing among us; we had been too much absorbed to notice her approach.

"A knife, and nothing but a knife, has done it," exclaimed Miss L'Estrange, stooping down more closely over the plant; "and here, Belle, is a foot-mark close to the root, not a new foot-mark."

"Oh," said Miss Palmer, "that might have been made in the chase after the rabbit."

"We never came this way," said one and another; "no one came near these gardens but Belle herself, just before she fell."

"Then she made the foot-mark herself, perhaps," remarked Miss Palmer.

"How could she?" replied Miss Ashley, steadily; "don't you see that it points the other way?"

"I was only trying to account for it," said Miss Palmer, reddening under Miss Ashley's eye.

"Well, I see no use in accounting for it," said Belle, mournfully; "no accounting will make it grow again."

"I do see the use," replied her sister, "for it could not possibly have been cut without hands."

Upon this, Miss Palmer fixed her large eyes for a moment on Miss L'Estrange with a peculiar expression, and a thought flashed into my mind which I would not for the world have expressed; but which I saw plainly written on the faces of all my companions, and was conscious that Miss Palmer saw it too; but she did not continue to meet our gaze, she turned hastily round, and, snatching up her rake, began diligently to work in her garden; but so timing the strokes of her tools, that she could hear every sentence we uttered, and sometimes turning half round, the rake suspended in her hand, she appeared intently to weigh our words.

"Well, this is a very mysterious thing," said Miss Ashley at last, "and I wish we could account for it." We all mentally assented to this, but no one said anything, till one of the youngest children exclaimed, after whispering to the others, "I have no knife; I hope Belle does not think I did it."

"Of course not, child," said Belle; here the rake was worked very diligently.

"I did not do it," said another little girl; "and, besides, Belle has always been so very kind to me."

"There is no one that Belle ever is unkind to," said Miss Ward, who was always the first to say a generous thing.

"No," said little Nannette, "not on purpose; she did not spoil Miss Palmer's auriculas on purpose."

What an unlucky thing it was that Nannette's conscientious qualification should have been made just at that moment. There stood the little gardens opposite to one another; the mould artificially heaped up towards the centre of each; one was crowned by the broken auriculas, the other by the cut polyanthus. "I can only say," said Miss Ward, breaking the awkward silence—"I can only say, that I wish I had never seen this foot-mark; I don't think that all the years I have been at school anything has happened that has made me feel so uncomfortable; for you see that this is not the foot-mark of a grown-up person: it is not Belle's foot-mark either, it is shorter and wider; there are no hobnails in it, therefore it could not have been done by the gardener's boy; the polyanthus stands so far from the edge, that it could not have been reached but for the foot-mark. And that the plant was spoilt for mere malice and mischief, and not for the sake of getting the flowers, is evident; for they were all left just where they fell."

All this was perfectly true, and Miss Ward did not say it unkindly; but we were no nearer to the unknown culprit, and there was another pause, during which Miss Palmer continued her operations with her back turned towards us, till some one said, "Who was the last of us at these gardens?"

Several remembered who had been left behind while we ran after the rabbit, and Belle went into the house, and there was a general though silent nod towards Miss Palmer; who, however, did not turn round till little Nannette, with her brown eyes wide open, exclaimed bluntly, "But Miss Palmer—did Miss Palmer do it?"

"No one said she did, child," exclaimed Miss L'Estrange, checking her instantly and angrily.

Miss Palmer had dropped her rake on hearing Nannette's speech; she now picked it up, and gathering her other tools together, turned and faced us; she was deeply flushed, and as she passed us, she said in a low voice, but distinct enough to be heard by us all—"But no one said she did not."

COTTAGE POEMS.

BY A CURATE.

III.—WAITING FOR ANGELS.

Two "little ones" of mine had gone astray;
From church and school I missed them all the day,
And, evening service over, to their home
Went forth to seek them, early taught to roam.
Willie and Annie Yeoman were a pair
Of pretty children,—beauty's somewhat rare
In Devilsbye; for ugliness and sin,
Though often parted, are still near of kin.
Like the lonely flowers found on desert sod
These two sweet children seemed sent straight from God.
Born in the workhouse both, they could not claim
A father's nurture, or a father's name;
And evil was the name their mother bore,
But still she found them bread, tho' little more,
By labour in the fields. From day to day
She toiled with men, as coarse and hard as they,
And more industrious, for she never slacked
At her rough work, and so she seldom lacked Employment. And the farmers round would say
That "Jess was worth her wages any day."

The mother absent, Annie kept "the house,"
A one-roomed cottage. Timid as a mouse
Was little Annie. While she scarce could creep,
Left all day lonely, playing or asleep
Upon the floor; till Willie crept, and then Left as sole nurse till mother came again.
Willie was far the strongest, grown a great
Stout boy of five. Annie was small at eight;
Timid and grave, and with protecting arms,
Still shielding Willie from impending harms.
With much resemblance in each childish face
There was a strange unlikeness. One might trace
In every feature lines of form the same
In each; but the mysterious spirit-flame
That filled with life the plastic mould of clay
Wrought deep'ning changes in its wondrous play:
In Annie's eyes an inward light it glowed,
In Willie's a bright outward stare it showed.

I reached the hut: already it was night,
Though early, and the moon was full and bright.
I reached the door, the soft earth hushed my tread—
No beaten path-way to the hovel led.
I entered softly at the open door,
And saw the children seated on the floor,
Just where the moon-rays, slanting thro' the pane,
Laid down a line of light. I could remain
Unseen, and so I stood, in wonder strong
The children sat so silent, for so long.

Then Willie's voice broke out, in doubting strain,
"I never saw no angels;" but again
Subdued by something Annie had made clear
To his young mind, "They will not come in here,
Because we have not got a pretty bed,
P'raps, and we have no father. Teacher said
They prayed 'Our Father' when they went to sleep
As well as 'Christ the Lord our souls to keep.'
And then the angels came."

"O Willie, no.
Father which art in Heaven it is, you know
He is our Father too. Sit still and see."
Again a silence.

Then there flashed on me
Out of a Sabbath past a little scene Enacted in the school-room. There had been A visitor—a rare thing in our school—
Who taught my class, most lax in form and rule.
The children fingered all her silk array,
Leant on her knee and seemed to chat and play.
I heard her talk of angels with a smile—
She looking like an angel all the while—
And saw her give the children something each,
And kindly thought she was not born to teach.
I came on Annie lingering on her way,
And looking at her picture, twice that day,
Two angels bending o'er a little bed,
She showed me then, and in her face I read
The seeing of such visions evermore
About her henceforth, and I pondered sore
On several sorts of teaching that might lead
To wait for angels in the time of need,
As these were waiting.

Need they had: that day
They were forsaken. Thither on the way
I heard the village gossip: She had fled—
The mother—left her children barely bread
Enough to last the day, and now alone
They sat and waited.

To Our Father's throne
My spirit sprang. "My faith this instant dies," Rashly I cried, "unless Thine open skies Send help to these." Another instant brought Rebuke and answer to my awful thought:
"Thou art my messenger—do not thou dare
To leave my little ones. Lo, to thy care
This night I give them!"

Then I stooped and went
Within, and gave a hand to each, and bent
My steps to theirs along the pathway white
To Dame Thorne's cottage, where they slept that night.

"TWO ANGELS BENDING O'ER A LITTLE BED."

THE DEATHS IN THE WILDERNESS.

"And the children of Israel spake unto Moses, saying, Behold, we die, we perish, we all perish. Whosoever cometh anything near unto the tabernacle of the Lord shall die: shall we be consumed with dying?"—Num. xvii. 12, 13.

THAT was the impression left upon the heart of Israel by an experience which to us is a history. They had seen that which we read of—that of which we are to speak now; The Deaths in the Wilderness. They were right, and they were wrong, in their impressions. Right, in saying that it is a solemn and a responsible thing to "come anything near unto the tabernacle of the Lord;" that "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of that living God" who, to all who despise or hate Him, must, by the very nature of the Godhead, be (as He calls himself) "a consuming fire." But wrong, surely—our hearts are the witnesses—in so speaking as though there were a sort of fatality, a sort of promiscuous and indiscriminate mortality, involved in being thus brought nigh to Him; as though his requirements were so strict, or his judgments so arbitrary, that no man could hear his voice or see his face and live. Every part of God's dealings with them should have corrected such an impression. The daily guidance—the daily supplies—the daily offering—each one told of a God of mercy, a God of compassion, and a God of love. He who led his people in the daytime with a cloud, and all the night through with a light of fire; He who brought streams out of the rock, and fed them day after day with the very bread of heaven; He who provided for them, day by day, a lamb for a burnt-offering, that they might never lack the knowledge, however dim and misty, of an atonement and a propitiation; could not have been in reality an unloving God: He brought them out because He had a favour to them, because He had set his love upon them and chosen them. "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth."

Our subject is a grave one, and we must give it all its gravity. It reads a severe lesson to us all. It says to us who are far on in life's journey, "Take heed lest ye miss that good land which the Lord sware unto your fathers." And it says to the young—to those who are at the entrance of the spiritual life—those, more especially, who may be on the point of drawing nigh (as it were) to the Lord's tabernacle, to give themselves to Him as by solemn compact, that they may eat henceforth of the very bread and wine upon his table—"Remember and forget not who He is to whom ye thus devote yourselves—He is a holy God, He is a just God, of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, and who cannot bear anything that is evil." But the very language of warning, if it be heard in time, has an undersong of mercy. To those more especially, whose journey still lies more in front than behind them, that must be indeed a voice not of terror but of lovingkindness, which says to them, "This is the way, walk ye in it"—let no bypath allure, let no steep and no obstacle deter you—hold on, straight and sure, in the road on which you are entering—and ye shall live and not die, ye shall prosper in your going, and enter in at last through the golden gates into the heavenly city. He that hath an ear to hear let him hear.

"The deaths in the wilderness."

Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, all tell of them. The desert through which Israel passed—in which for forty years, by reason of sin, Israel not only journeyed but wandered—is a desert of graves. It need not have been so. A small fraction of those forty years would have brought them safely to their rest. Travellers year by year cross that desert in half the days between Christmas and Easter. Therefore the long wandering itself, as well as the mortality which stamped it, was a mark of nothing but sin. All death is a memento of sin. From the beginning it was not so. "Sin entered into the world, and death by sin—and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." But these wilderness-deaths were not only mementoes of sin—they were judgments upon sin. Let us try to understand them. We will not enter (for it is needless) into the sad and piteous details. We will speak of them rather in their sum, just briefly characterizing and classifying them as lessons of reverence, lessons of holiness, and lessons of submission.

I. Lessons of reverence.

1. Nadab and Abihu, sons of Aaron, died in the wilderness for offering "strange fire" when they stood to minister before the Lord. They should have lighted their censers from the fire supernaturally kindled upon the altar of burnt-offering on the occasion of Aaron's first sacrifice for himself and for the people. The fire of God's offerings was to be a fire provided by Himself. They thought any fire might serve the purpose. That which came first to hand was good enough for God's worship. And those two men had been highly favoured. They had been brought near, with Moses and Aaron and seventy of the elders of Israel, to see the God of Israel in the holy mount, when "there was under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the body of heaven in its clearness." Men who had been admitted once to that vision, were henceforth not as other men in privilege or in responsibility. And now they presumed, at the very opening of their sacred ministrations, to draw near in careless haste, in presumptuous self-pleasing—nay, even perhaps (to judge by the context) in a state of intoxication—to do the service of the sanctuary. Surely the solemn charge must be reiterated here, not in word, but in deed: "Be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the Lord." "There went out fire from the Lord, and devoured them; and they died before the Lord." "In their coats," as they were—in the sacred linen garments of their priestly office—they were carried forth, dead men, by their own near kinsmen, and buried without the camp. And Aaron their father, and Eleazar and Ithamar their brothers, must not rend their clothes, but look on in silence upon the awful spectacle.

Priests must be all on the Lord's side, even when the stroke comes home, and strips their very house of its choicest treasures. They must leave it to others, to "the whole house of Israel," to "bewail the burning which the Lord hath kindled." It was a lesson of reverence. "Let us have grace, whereby we may serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear. For our God is a consuming fire."

2. We pass on through but a few chapters, and find interposed, between regulations concerning the sacred oil and the shewbread of the tabernacle, and laws for the punishment of damage and murder, a brief but impressive narrative of a death in the wilderness for blasphemy. The son of Shelomith—for the poor mother's name is preserved for ever in Holy Scripture in this sole connection with a guilty (and himself nameless) son—was striving in the camp with a man of Israel, and he "blasphemed the name of the Lord and cursed. And they brought him to Moses. And they put him in ward, that the mind of the Lord might be showed them." And then the word came, that he who had been guilty of "cursing his God" must be brought forth out of the camp, the witnesses laying their hands upon his head (as though to fix the sin upon him), and stoned with stones by all the congregation. It was a lesson of reverence. "He that made the eye, shall he not see? He that made the ear, shall he not hear?"

3. "While the children of Israel were in the wilderness they found a man that gathered sticks upon the Sabbath day." A small breach, you say, of a severe and burdensome law! But what are great and small when laws of God are in question? "They that found him brought him unto Moses and Aaron, and unto all the congregation. And they put him in ward, because it was not declared what should be done to him." And then the word came, that the man who had so done this thing must be brought without the camp, and stoned with stones by all the congregation. And he, too, died in the wilderness. The audacious heart of man must be taught the sinfulness of little sins—happy if even by such examples it can be brought to hear and fear! This too was a lesson of reverence.

4. And what else was the fate of Korah and his company? Men who presumed to censure the exaltation above them of the very priest and lawgiver of Israel! Men who said that they were all equally holy, and had all an equal right to the privileges of the priesthood! What is that spirit in us which makes us kick against God's order, and see no difference between the offices of his house and the freedom and license of a common room? Above all, what is that spirit which makes us overlook or disparage the necessity of the One Priesthood, and dare to offer our own vile offerings without a thought of propitiation or of intercession? Is it not the spirit of irreverence—the spirit which seeks not of the awful holiness of God, yet thinks wickedly that He is even such an one as ourselves? "How then can man be justified with God? or how can he be clean that is born of a woman? Behold even to the moon, and it shineth not; yea, the stars are not pure in his sight. How much less man, that is a worm! and the son of man, which is a worm!"

II. The deaths in the wilderness are lessons, too, of holiness. They are warnings, St. Paul expressly tells us, against special sins.

1. Murmuring is one of these. The very chapter which celebrates the great deliverance opens the record also of ingratitude. "They went three days in the wilderness, and found no water. The people murmured against Moses, saying, What shall we drink?" Next there is no bread. "Would to God we had died by the hand of the Lord in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the flesh-pots, and when we did eat bread to the full!" Bread from heaven is the reply of a merciful and long-suffering God to the sinful complainings of his people. We pass on a little further, and this marvellous gift is itself complained of. "Our soul loatheth this light bread." Then at last "deaths in the wilderness" rebuke and punish. "The Lord sent fiery serpents among the people; and much people of Israel died." We must be taught that first to live upon God's gifts and then to quarrel with them, is a sin. It may be expressed with the lips, or it may lurk in the heart—but who is there in whom unthankfulness, discontent, the roving wish, the complaining spirit, has no place? The deaths in the wilderness are our admonition, upon whom the ends of the world are come.

2. Unbelief is a sin. Take one example of it. Men are sent from the wilderness of Paran to search the promised land, and bring Israel tidings of their future inheritance. With what eagerness must their return have been waited for! With what interest, with what a sense of honour and of privilege ought they themselves to have discharged the duty! To be the first of all Israel to tread the land consecrated by the ancient footsteps of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob—to see with their own eyes that land familiar by name in the traditions even of their bondage, and now so soon to be theirs in fruition and possession—how should their hearts have burned within them as they plucked the cluster of grapes beside the brook of Eshcol, and bore it back in triumph to a waiting people! Alas! the report was all of peril and of impediment. "They brought up an evil report of the land which they had searched." "All the people that we saw in it were men of great stature . . . there we saw the giants . . . we were but as grasshoppers beside them, in their sight and in our own." And then the infection spreads everywhere through Israel. "Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt! Were it not better for us to return into Egypt?" In vain did Caleb and Joshua, faithful alone among the faithless, rend their clothes in sorrow, and try to shame these faithless arguers. "The land is an exceeding good land. Rebel not ye against the Lord. The people of the land are bread for us. Their defence is departed from them, and the Lord is with us: fear them not." "All the congregation bade stone them with stones." Then "the glory of the Lord appeared in the tabernacle." The long-suffering of God himself is wearied out by such unbelief. There must be deaths again in the wilderness to serve as finger-posts and beacons to later generations. Yes, all that generation must lay its bones there, save two only. "Your carcases shall fall in the wilderness." Turn you, get you back into the wilderness. You were on the very verge and margin of your rest, but your unbelief has dashed from your lips the cup of blessing. Your little ones shall enter in, when forty years have first been spent in vague and purposeless wanderings hither and thither through this desert. Nor shall this punishment be without its present foretaste. Those men who returned from the search, only to make the congregation murmur against the promise and against the Lord, died at once by the plague before the Lord. Such is unbelief: the sin of saying, God cannot, or, God will not, when He has declared that He both can and will. Yes, the graves of a generation testify against us, when we either think scorn of the pleasant land, or "limit the Holy One of Israel" in his power to bring us in thither.

3. And presumption is a sin. How instructive the close of that narrative to which we have last referred? No sooner has the voice of judgment irrevocably spoken, than a new phase of disobedience opens. "We have sinned" in doubting God's power: "lo, we be here, and will go up unto the place which the Lord has promised." In vain did their leader warn them that the time was past: their day of grace (in this sense) had gone down to its setting: now the meek suffering of punishment is the one duty and the one hope of the sinner: "the Lord is not among you" for conquest, though his mercy may still be yours for pardon. In vain "they presumed to go up unto the hill top": they have sinned by unbelief, now they will atone for it by presumption. But they go alone: the ark moves not, nor Moses, from the camp on which the cloud of the presence rests gloomily and with threatening: the word spoken in unbelief now comes true in punishment: the Amalekite comes down, and the Canaanite—the sword of God in their hand—and smites and discomfits Israel even unto Hormah. Strange and wonderful fertility of evil! We doubt, we hesitate, we linger, we disbelieve, while energy is required of us: then we set forward, we arm ourselves, we affect despatch and resolution and courage, when the blackening corpses of our comrades, and the verdict of punishment upon ourselves, should warn us to tarry in the camp and bear humbly the indignation of the Lord because we have sinned against Him!

4. And let our last lesson of holiness, as taught by the deaths in the wilderness, be drawn from Kibroth-hattaavah, "the graves of lust." It is the same lesson, in substance, taught also at the foot of Sinai, when Moses descending from the Mount heard the sound of wicked revelry and saw the people naked in lascivious wantonness; the same lesson, in substance, with that legible in Shittim, when the people committed whoredom with the daughters of Moab, when Israel joined himself unto Baal-peor, and the anger of the Lord was kindled against him. "Kibroth-hattaavah, the graves of lust." The desert is full of them; of the sepulchres of men who lusted after the forbidden pleasure; men who sowed to the flesh, and of the flesh (in the most literal sense) reaped corruption. The desert is full of them; that eastern wilderness between Egypt and Canaan: and what of a desert greater and more desolate still—the wilderness of this world—the wilderness of human life? Yes, indeed! high above all the monuments reared in human suffering to human sin, tower the desert-memorials of sinful lust. Where the world slays its thousands, the flesh has slain its ten thousands. Young men, standing on the threshold of a Christian manhood—dedicating yourselves (it may be) in solemn profession to a Saviour who bought you back from all iniquity by the price of his most precious blood—be it yours to count well the cost of that warfare to which you are girding yourselves, as with temptations from without, so also and chiefly with evil lustings from within. Greater indeed is He that is in you than he that is in the world: but see that He be indeed in you—in you as your ever-present help, in you as your strength against that "corruption which is in the world," which is in the heart of man, "through lust!" God grant that none of us who now read together the record of Israel's sin and Israel's judgment, may have this, at a later day, for the head-stone of his own sepulchre, "Kibroth-hattaavah—a grave of lust!"

III. Finally, the deaths in the wilderness teach a lesson, as of reverence, as of holiness, so also of submission.

1. In Mount Hor, by the coast of Edom, a message reaches the lawgiver of Israel, announcing the near end of his brother and companion in toil and patience for Israel. It is the fulfilment, for Aaron, of the curse of Meribah. Commanded to speak to the rock, bidding it to give forth its water for the supply of the congregation, they had smitten it once and twice: the water came out abundantly, by the word of the Lord; but they who had transgressed, even in one small particular, the letter of their mandate, must exemplify the universal warning, "Be sure your sin will find you out." They shall not bring the congregation into the land which God had given them. Judge we how bitter must have been the disappointment! How would all the toil, and all the anxiety, and all the reproach and buffeting, of their responsible yet thankless office, have been at once compensated and forgotten, might they but have seen their task accomplished, and Israel in secure possession of his rest and his inheritance! But no: they have themselves swerved from the letter of one of God's commands, and have failed, to that extent, to honour Him before his people. That dispensation, of which they were the chief ministers and mediators, was designed to teach to a whole world the lesson of God's holiness and of man's duty. If they failed themselves to exemplify it, the offence must not, for the truth's sake, for holiness' sake, for salvation's sake, go unpunished. Aaron must die, and Moses, disappointed men; disappointed, but trusting and submissive still. And now the two brothers must go up together in the sight of all Israel into Mount Hor, knowing wherefore they go, and surrendering themselves implicitly to the will of God. There in the top of the mount Moses strips Aaron of his priestly garments, and puts them upon Eleazar his son; and there Aaron dies, in the top of the mount, and Moses and Eleazar return alone. For thirty days all Israel mourns for Aaron, and then the work of life goes on without him: the stream has quickly closed over the life that has sunk in it, and God's work, once his, is now another's. Few men, I imagine, read unmoved the record of this end. The scene is before us, in the pages of Holy Scripture, as no picture and no traveller's tale could paint it: and I have called this death in the wilderness, and one other, a lesson of submission. It shows us the servant offering up life itself in duty, and then accepting, as one part of duty, the chastisement which takes life away. It shows us that, when God chastens, yea, when God punishes, yea, if God even inflicts death itself as the penalty of an individual sin, there is no proof there of his condemnation: He has done all things well: He honoured his servant with his great commission, and if He visits his sin with scourges, He is his Master and his Father and his Redeemer still.

2. The one life is taken, and the other is doomed. No long time, it is probable, elapses between the two deaths; between the sepulchre of Hor and the sepulchre of Pisgah. The weary wanderings of the desert were nearly accomplished by both the brothers: now the whole generation which left Egypt, save two persons, has passed away: when they number Israel "in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho," there is not found among them one man numbered before in the wilderness of Sinai, but Caleb only and Joshua: and now the leader and the lawgiver must himself die: the last death in the wilderness is the death of Moses; that strangest and most mysterious of all departures; not, like Aaron's decease, soothed by the presence of a loving son and brother, but accomplished in solitude and silence, the Lord showing him all the land of promise, the Lord closing his eyes, and the Lord burying him. O marvellous combination of "the goodness and severity of God!" The penalty enforced to the letter, but so enforced as to turn it into the highest of honours and the tenderest of consolations! Not by punishment is love forfeited: not because of punishment is the nomenclature of love changed. It is "Moses the servant of the Lord" who dies there in the land of Moab: and when the Divine voice speaks for the first time directly to Joshua the son of Nun, the "minister" and the successor, it still speaks as of one tenderly loved and cared for, "Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise thou, and go over this Jordan!" The last death in the wilderness is a death without sting. He of whom God can say when he is departed, "My servant is dead," must indeed be not so much dead as sleeping; he is in the Lord's hand still, and God will not for ever leave his soul in hell. He still lives to Him who both quickeneth the dead, and calleth things that are not as though they were.

Let us all enter, if we have not entered yet, upon that service, which is indeed perfect freedom and tenderest love. Let us place ourselves, if we have not placed ourselves yet, under the guidance of that hand which, even when it corrects, loves still; yea, because it loves, rebukes and chastens. So, when death comes—when the dark valley must be traversed, and the deep swift river crossed—we will fear no evil. He who has been our guide unto death will guide us through death: and when He has laid us to rest, in a tomb still marked by his loving eye, will say of us to the generation which survives to take up his unfinished, his unending work, "My servant is dead"—now arise ye, and minister to me in his place, that, in the great day of Christ's appearing, "both he that soweth and he that reapeth may rejoice together!"

C. J. VAUGHAN.

THE WALDENSES.

PART. II.—THEIR PAST HISTORY AND SUFFERINGS.

"Halt, passenger! take heed what you do see,
This stone doth tell for what some men did die."

THUS run the first two lines of that quaint metrical inscription which many a visitor to Edinburgh has read on the "Martyrs' Monument" in the Greyfriars Churchyard. We remember being there on a spring morning some years ago in company with a revered friend from England. The sun shone full on the great upright stone between its flanking pillars; the grass beneath was enamelled by early daisies; while all around there was a "stillness calm and holy" that accorded with the place and the scene. My friend, after gazing on the spot awhile in silence, began to read aloud the old inscription, his tones gathering increased animation as line after line recounted cruel wrongs endured, and heroic faith displayed. After the poetry there follows this record:—"From 1661 to 1688 there were executed at Edinburgh about an hundred of noblemen, gentlemen, ministers, and others; noble martyrs for Jesus Christ. The most of them lie here." Beneath the slab itself, carved on an open Bible, there follows this grand and solemn passage from the Apocalypse: "I saw under the altar the souls of them that were slain for the word of God, and for the testimony which they held: and they cried with a loud voice, saying, How long, O Lord . . ." Having read thus far, I perceived my friend's lips quiver, and his eyes fill with tears. The remaining words were read in silence—the words of God's own book going right to the heart as no others can. The place and the circumstances gave to this passage of sacred Scripture a depth and solemnity it might not have had elsewhere. We were standing within a bow-shot of the spot where many, whose bones lay beneath, had sealed their testimony with their blood. The intervening two hundred years seemed to shrink out of sight, and the great future day to draw near, when a response shall be given to that question—"How long, O Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?"

Far away from Scotland last spring, on our way from Turin to La Tour, the little capital of the Waldensian valleys, when their wooded mountains rose to view, it seemed as if we were approaching "consecrated ground;" and when, within the valleys themselves, we visited scene after scene associated with the sufferings of those who kept Christ's word and did not deny his name, it seemed as if the whole territory had a sacredness, and every hamlet might have its "Martyrs' Monument." If our patriotism should be kindled on the field of Marathon, and our piety grow warmer amid the ruins of Iona, certainly it would be strange if one who knows what these rocks and mountain-sides have witnessed, could visit this renowned territory without a deepened reverence for the power of conscience, and an increased abhorrence of the system that would strangle its freedom.

An old Waldensian writer, speaking of the distinctive marks by which his and every true Church might be known, gives these three: "Simple conformity to the sacred word: a holy life: persecution and the Cross." Persecution and the Cross! Yes, this last mark she can truly be said to have borne throughout all her history. It does not indeed so forcibly arrest attention in her remote past as in later times; yet even so far back as the ninth century, we have historical evidence that the existence of a people in these valleys who abjured the Roman yoke was most obnoxious to the bigots of that intolerant creed. The Waldenses had then a friend, it is true, in the good Claude, Bishop of Turin; but a letter is extant from a brother prelate, angrily calling him to account for his lenity towards the heretics who dwelt near his diocese. Again, in 1198, previous to the acquisition of Piedmont by the House of Savoy, we find a decree of Otho IV., Emperor of Germany, commanding the then Bishop of Turin to exterminate from his whole diocese those "heretiques Vaudoises who attack the Catholic faith, and teach pernicious error." During the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries the Waldenses suffered less within their own territory than in France and Germany, where at that epoch they were largely spread—their numbers in Europe being at one period so high as 80,000. To confine our attention, however, to the persecutions within the valleys themselves, it may safely be said that for a period of 400 years, i.e., from the beginning of the fifteenth to the end of the eighteenth century, the Church and people within that little territory were exposed to a succession of assaults so fierce, that the story of their preservation is without a parallel anywhere else in the world. The Waldenses themselves recount thirty-six distinct persecutions to which they have been subjected; all of them designed to force them to yield up their ancient faith, and some of them distinctly planned to secure their extermination from the face of the earth.

The story of these persecutions, written like Ezekiel's roll within and without with lamentations and mourning and woe, cannot be detailed in a few pages. It would fill a volume. It has filled volumes. Let my readers open for themselves the pages of Leger or Monastier, and they will regard no language as too strong either to reprobate the wrongs perpetrated on an unoffending people, or to applaud the noble struggles for faith and freedom which that people made. In days like ours, when the faith of many waxes feeble, and laxity of doctrine, combined with a false liberality, would make men tolerant of almost any error, it is well to be reminded of those Italian mountaineers, who held the truth at a higher price than their lives, and who preferred persecution and the Cross with a good conscience to peace and ease with perjured faith.

And here let us understand who the real authors of the Waldensian persecutions were. Ostensibly, and looking on the surface of the page of history, they seem to have been the Dukes of Savoy, their own princes. Implicated in all this guilt and shame the Dukes of Savoy unquestionably were, because these wrongs were committed in violation of repeated and solemn treaties to protect the Waldenses—whose loyalty as subjects had been constant and unimpeached—in the exercise of their faith. But the real authors of these persecutions were the popes and their agents. The crime of the Waldenses was their scriptural religion; and in the eyes of the Roman Church no crime is so unpardonable as to assert independence of her authority. These poor people had probably suffered no harm whatever from the court of Turin, but for the pressure ceaselessly brought to bear on it by the court of Rome. Dr. Gilly illustrates this very forcibly when he says: "Let the reader, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, reflect upon the tendency of the following specimen of the numerous edicts in my possession, and I shall not be accused of doing wrong to the Church of Rome, when I affirm that the lintels of the Vatican are sprinkled with the blood of every Vaudois who died in defence of his religion: 'Charles Emmanuel, by the grace of God, Duke of Savoy, Prince of Piedmont, &c. In conformity with the brief published by his Holiness, our Lord Pope Gregory XV., and with our desire to promote the sacred wishes of his Holiness, we command, &c.' Then follows one of those penal enactments which drove unhappy men to desperation, and converted scenes of peace into an arena of frightful conflict." (Gilly, p. 285.)

Interwoven with the harrowing annals of the bloodshed and infernal cruelties endured by the Waldenses, is another and a different story: that of their heroic courage and chivalrous struggle for home and freedom, and for the faith they loved so well. These people took up arms in their own defence. They fought before they fell. And, apart altogether from the sacred cause in which they were engaged, I know nowhere a record more thrilling than this portion of their history. In their Arnauds, and Janavels, and Jahiers, we find heroes as well as martyrs. The defences of Rora and Angrogna, and the Balsille, were marvellous deeds of endurance, and daring, and trust. The long single-barrelled gun of Janavel is still preserved in the library of the little college at La Tour. One of the professors, himself a native Waldensian, had been showing us the ghastly plates in an old copy of Leger's History of the Persecutions, ghastly from the fearful reality they give to the narrative itself; and it was startling to see how the good man's eye kindled and his cheek flushed when, turning from the book, he snatched up Janavel's now rusty matchlock, and told how the brave fellow with this weapon had picked down ruffian after ruffian rather than suffer his wife and little ones to endure bloody and brutal cruelty. Will any say that Janavel did wrong? Grant that he and his comrades should not have embrued their hands in blood,—"oppression maketh a wise man mad." The Waldenses had no wish for war or bloodshed. They held their lands by right, and had held them from time immemorial; and no stranger could have a right to intrude on their little territory to ravage and to destroy. Armed troops being sent to exterminate them because they would not deny their ancient faith, when they fought, they fought in self-defence alone. If ever, therefore, in the history of the world such a term were applicable, theirs was a Holy War.

In a territory where every spot of ground almost has its famous memory, it is difficult to know which to select for description. During my stay of twelve days in the valleys, I naturally visited very many of these. Let me invite the reader's company first to the Vale of Angrogna.

This valley, or, more properly speaking, this mountain gorge, is a lateral branch of the Valley of Lucerna; and from its mouth near La Tour to the Pra del Tor at its further extremity, is not above six or seven miles in length. Yet in this little defile have been enacted some of the most stirring events in the Waldensian annals. Taken as a whole, moreover, it is the most picturesque, though not the grandest, of the valleys. There the traveller from Scotland will often be reminded of the Trosachs, if we suppose the Trosachs magnified to an Alpine scale. Except at the upper and wilder extremity, the mountains which enclose this Italian glen are wooded to their summits; bold masses of rock rising here and there into splintered peaks from out the foliage. And such foliage! One must be on the southern slope of the Alps to comprehend its beauty. Here are forests of the native chestnut and walnut; and as the winding path carries us beneath their dense and fragrant shade, we see on every hand trees of a size and beauty to adorn the finest baronial park in England. In the lower portion of the valley we have the clear rushing stream by our side, whose banks are here wide enough to admit considerable patches of ground to be tilled on either hand; first, the irrigated meadow, now (in early spring) enamelled with tufts of the white sweet-scented narcissus, resembling at a distance pearls gleaming on green velvet. Above, on the slopes, rise vineyards and little fields of rye, or maize, intersected by mulberry trees for the silkworm; while here and there the humble dwellings of the peasant proprietors, each with its overhanging roof and rude verandahs, rise amid the few acres they both own and cultivate. By-and-by, as the valley narrows, our path begins to rise through the forest, and to wind along the steep mountain side, passing at many points underneath grand overhanging cliffs, in whose crevices, high overhead, bushes of the dwarf rhododendron, or alpenrose, display their glowing crimson flowers; while from moist nooks within hand's reach, one may gather abundance of the Alpine auricula, and deep blue gentian flowers, familiar in our gardens at home. Each winding turn of the footpath opens up to us a new stretch of the valley, contracting now into a grand defile. In sight of one of those vistas, and standing some two hundred feet above the stream, whose hoarse murmur rises through the woods, let us pause a moment. One cannot imagine a more delightful combination for painter's or poet's eye—this intermingling of wooded mountain, and nestling hamlets, and craggy peaks, and, far beyond, those dazzling snows which rise over the whole into the deep blue sky.

Our guide, a Waldensian peasant, proud of the deeds of his forefathers, ere long stops us at a point, whose interest is of a higher kind than that which mere natural beauty or grandeur can bestow. "This," said he, "is the site of Champforans." Yes, it was here that, in 1532, was held the famous Synod of the Waldensian Church, whose impress is felt in these valleys to the present hour. It was to this spot that the Reformer Farel with two friends came from across the Alps, that, as younger brethren, they might greet this ancient branch of the Christian family, and bring the cheering news of a great light now dawning over Europe to men who, in their lonely solitude among the mountains, had kept their own little lamp shining through the weary night of the dark ages.

Approaching the head of the valley, we reached another famous spot. Our path here ran along a narrow ledge cut in the face of a cliff; and between ourselves and the rocks on the opposite bank there was but the breadth of the foaming stream, and no more. This spot is the key of the pass; and here one brave man could repel a score. Our guide leant over the edge of the precipitous cliff, feathered with foliage, and pointing with his finger to a deep black pool where the water boiled and seethed far below,—"That," said he, "is the Tompie Sachetti," Sachetti's Pool. And why so called? In 1488, Charles II. of Savoy, at the instigation of Pope Innocent VIII., sent a large body of soldiers to invade this little valley, and put to the sword every man, woman, and child who should refuse to go to mass. The troops were not surprised to find a comparatively easy passage through the lower portions of the valley, for it was ever the custom of the Waldensians, when danger threatened, to withdraw into the more inaccessible fastnesses; and for this purpose, Angrogna offered peculiar advantages, since at its upper extremity the valley spreads out into a wide and singular amphitheatre, surrounded on all sides, save one, by steep and inaccessible mountains. This open space, called the Pra del Tor, which in still earlier times had served another purpose, to which we may afterwards advert, was on this occasion filled by the terrified families of the valley—women, and little ones, and the aged, being gathered together there, while the strong men had gone to defend the pass below. Here, where we now stood, some had planted themselves in ambush, behind the rocks ; while others on the heights above were ready to hurl down huge stones on the assailants, should they force the pass. In numbers they were very few in comparison with the overwhelming force now heard approaching ; but they were nerved by a determination to defend all they held dear ; their faith was strong in the power of prayer ; and they knew that revered teachers, and aged parents were even then pleading for them on the mountain side. The approaching army is now so near that the jeers and wild insulting tones of the soldiers can be heard, anticipating an easy victory and a full glut of vengeance ; one voice especially is loud above the rest—that of Sachetti, a noted captain, and a man of colossal size, who, like another Goliath, blasphemously defied the armies of the living God. Another moment, and the brave defenders of the pass emerge from their hiding-places, and stand, fronting the intruders. The battle begins. Soldier after soldier, as they attempt to force a passage, is shot down—nor have the brave peasants yet lost an inch of ground. Sachetti, maddened with rage, pours it forth in bold but impotent threats ; neither he nor his men perceiving that behind the Waldenses there advances down the gorge a new power, which neither he nor they anticipated. Driven on by the wind, a dense mist had already blotted from sight the upper portion of the valley, and in a few minutes more had enveloped themselves. So dense the mist, a man may now scarce discern his comrade ! In any unknown mountainous country such an occurrence is fitted to alarm. Each object is confused ; each danger is magnified ; and on slippery rocks like these, the next step may be death. A panic seizes the troops—their boasting is cooled now. The Waldenses, knowing every inch of ground, follow up their advantage, and press forward on the retreating mass—now confused and disorganised, uncertain, too, whether their assailants are a score or a thousand. Vast numbers perished that day. Driven backward on each other within the narrow defile, they fell headlong over the rocks. The infamous Sachetti, among the rest, was struck down by the hand of God, and not of man ; for, slipping his foot on a rocky ledge that overhung the stream, his huge frame lost its balance and was precipitated into the rapid, which carried the mangled corpse into that deep boiling pool, from whence it was with difficulty dragged forth, and which to this hour bears his dishonoured name.

Curiously enough, the very day on which we ascended the Vale of Angrogna, we found the priest of the district (for there are some Papists even in Angrogna) superintending—for lack of other employment, perhaps—a body of workmen who were repairing and widening the path near this very point we have attempted to describe. "Ah !" said our guide, "I don't like to see this at all ; for if we had to defend Angrogna again, the narrower the road the better."

Every visitor to La Tour must be struck by the singular mass of rock which rises behind the little town from the upper slope of a mountain in the Vale of Lucerna, in form somewhat like the "Lion's head" of Arthur's Seat which looks down on Edinburgh. This rock is the Castelluzzo. The sad history of Waldensian massacres causes us to look up to that rock with the same thrilling interest with which we regard the tower of the old church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois in Paris, where hung the bell that summoned to the massacre of St. Bartholomew. These now peaceful valleys have had, once and again, their "St. Bartholomew ;" and from that Castelluzzo it was, that on April 27th, 1655, the signal was given to execute the dreadful orders of Christina, Regent of Savoy, who, acting for her son, Charles Emmanuel II., and under her holy father, the Pope, sent an army of 15,000 men into the valleys, to massacre every Protestant they contained ! Think of 15,000 bigoted soldiers, infuriated by passion, let loose on a quiet and defenceless people, hemmed into this narrow mountain territory—let loose with the express command of their sovereign to ravage and to kill—their excesses excused, and even sanctioned, because committed in the service of the Holy Church ! When one even tries to imagine what will happen when these 15,000 wolves are hounded on their prey, we shudder, and exclaim, "God pity his poor sheep, thus penned within their 'ancient fold !'"

But the story itself, as given by Leger, an eye-witness, surpasses all imagination. It would seem as if the fiends of the pit had been let loose—so many and monstrous were the cruelties practised on these poor Waldenses. "Children," says he—and we do not give the most hideous portions of his description—"torn from their mothers' breasts, were seized by the feet and dashed against the rocks or walls, which were covered with their brains, while their tender bodies were cast on the common heaps ; or one soldier, seizing one limb of these innocent creatures, and another taking hold of the other, would tear them asunder, beat their mothers with them, and at last throw them into the fields. The sick and aged, both men and women, were either burnt in their houses, or literally cut in pieces ; or, stripped of their garments, were tied up like a ball, with their heads between their legs, and rolled over rocks. . . . It was then," adds the historian, "that the fugitives, who had been snatched like brands out of the flames, could address God in the words of the 79th Psalm :—

> 'O God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance ;
> Thy holy temple have they defiled ;
> They have laid Jerusalem on heaps.
> The dead bodies of thy servants have they given
> To be meat unto the fowls of the heaven,
> The flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the earth.
> Their blood have they shed like water . . . ;
> And there was none to bury them.'"

In this horrible massacre the malice of Rome had full scope ; but for once her craft was at fault. The enemy had overshot the mark. Such hideous work as this would not hide. Leger, a Waldensian pastor, and, as we have said, himself an eye-witness of these unspeakable atrocities, fled to the friendly Swiss cantons, and with bursting heart and burning words proclaimed his people's wrongs. The news spread like wildfire. Never was a finer illustration of the Scripture truth, that "where one member suffers all the members suffer with it," than Protestant Europe afforded at that memorable epoch. To their everlasting honour, the Swiss cantons first took up the cause of the remnant of Christ's suffering ones. Great Britain, Holland, Germany, Denmark, even France, raised one loud and united remonstance, sending special messengers therewith to the Court of Savoy. Oliver Cromwell was then Protector of England. Let his name be ever gratefully remembered and honoured as the Protector of the Waldenses! No sooner did he hear the news than he proclaimed a fast through England and Scotland; and ordered a special collection to be made for the relief of the suffering remnant, now creeping from their hiding-places among the mountains. This subscription yielded the large sum of 30,000*l.*—2,000*l.* of which were given by Oliver himself out of his privy purse; and it will interest my readers to know that while this sum, designed and funded for the Waldenses, was in large part embezzled by Charles II.,—who insolently declared that he would not pay the debts of a usurper—William and Mary made a fresh grant to the Waldenses, in lieu of that which Cromwell raised and Charles spent,—and it is out of this latter fund that at this hour each Waldensian pastor is receiving 770 francs (about 30*l.*) a year, paid him by the British Government to aid his scanty maintenance. Well were it, let us add, if all our State obligations had a history and a destination so honourable!

But Cromwell did more. He despatched to Turin a special envoy in Sir Samuel Morland, who carried a letter to the Duke in Latin—the composition of Cromwell's great secretary, John Milton—and who was commanded to express in terms of stern remonstrance and unmistakeable warning, the horror and indignation of England's Protector. Besides the Latin letter in which he spoke for his illustrious master, Milton wrote an English sonnet, where he gave his own feelings vent in lines that will only perish with the language:

"ON THE LATE MASSACRE IN PIEMONT.

"Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughter'd saints, whose bones
Lie scatter'd on the Alpine mountains cold;
Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old,
When all our fathers worshipt stocks and stones,
Forget not: in thy book record their groans
Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold
Slain by the bloody Piemontese, that roll'd
Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
The vales redoubl'd to the hills, and they
To heaven. Their martyr'd blood and ashes sow
O'er all the Italian fields, where still doth sway
The triple tyrant; that from these may grow
A hundred fold, who, having learn'd thy way,
Early may fly the Babylonian woe."

The lips which uttered that concluding prayer, the hand that penned it, have long ago crumbled into dust: let us who are alive give God thanks that the time has at length arrived when Milton's prayer is being marvellously answered; and how much cause for such thanksgiving we have, I hope in next number to show.

DEW.

"I will be as the dew unto Israel."—Hosea xiv. 5.

SOFTLY it falls on the seed new-sown
Where the soil is hard and dry,
And never a noble plant has grown
In all the years gone by.

Softly it falls on the tender blade,
That has drooped in thirsty pain
All the day on the upland glade
For lack of the early rain.

Softly it falls on the green-eared wheat
That feared it must wither away
In the searching rays of noontide heat
In the sultry summer day.

Softly it falls on the grass new-mown,
And crushed by the mower's foot—
The widowed grass, with flower gone,
And little left but the root.

Softly it falls on the lowliest weed
By the forest wayside found,
As on fragrant flowers that all men heed
In a royal garden-ground.

And not for the seed and plant alone
Does it come each day anew,
But to show to man the love of One
Who saith "I am as the dew."

But it oft complains, "His love, alas!
Is but partly seen in me;
For if He cares so much for the grass,
Then how much more for thee!"

S. R. POWERS.

PASTOR HARMS OF HERRMANNSBURG.

WITHIN the last ten years a small country parish in Hanover has gained a singular notoriety in the history of Missions. It has originated, planned, and sustained a Mission of its own. It is neither large nor wealthy, yet it has more Mission stations abroad than some not inconsiderable Churches, and it supplies not only money but men. Familiar as we are with brilliant missionary enterprises, this seems to surpass them; and it rather gains in interest and marvel when we know that it is the work of one man. It is from the parish minister that the impulse sprung; the conception was his own; and but for his undaunted, simple-hearted faith, it seems unlikely that it could have been carried out. Now that he is gone to his rest, it may be worth while to look into his life; to see what light it throws upon his work; to discover by what power he did so much.

Louis Harms was born in Walsrode, in Hanover, in 1808, the son of the clergyman of the parish, and when he was nine years old shared the family migration to the parish of Herrmannsburg. Neither the neighbourhood nor the people could have had any great attraction for a man of ordinary character. The Lüneburg Heath, in which Herrmannsburg is situated, would be to most eyes bleak and monotonous; a mere vast tract of heath and bog, thinly inhabited, and poorly tilled. But the purple heather-bloom, the deep rich colouring of both cloud and sunshine, the clear broad streams, the clumps of wood, and the sudden valleys that dip down like crevases in the even roll of the country, laid hold of Harms with a powerful fascination, and he declared there was not a country in the world he would as soon live in. The people might be ignorant, but they were sturdy, free, and independent, like the fresh strong winds that swept their heath; and Harms had a firm, strong will, a determined independence, and an unmistakable individuality of character. From the first he was attracted to the place, and seems to have always turned to it with more than the feeling of a home. At school and at the university he left the impression of great ability, and the most rigorous application; and at Göttingen, where he studied, he seems to have conceived the idea of ranging through the whole domain of human learning. His brother states that it was to satisfy the unrest of his spirit which had not yet found satisfaction through faith in Christ. With the aid of an extraordinary memory, extraordinary perseverance, and a large self-reliance, he made rapid progress in his studies, and became the pride of his fellow-students and his home. He was an adept in such manly exercises as a German university will recognise, in fencing and swimming; and he had a lofty sense of truth, and a purity that is attributed to his passionate love for his mother, and that made him instinctively shrink from many sins. "Bear up," he wrote in a friend's album about this time, "although the last prop break, and all is lost, if you have only honour." He did not know what fear was: "I never was afraid in my life," he said. He was impetuous, impatient, not very considerate of others, imperious, and inflexible, and the awe of his brothers and sisters. It was a mixed and very intelligible character, a character that he always retained in its main features, though the defects were greatly modified by the grace of God. The strict morality he maintained, passed at the time for Christian life; and in a church where the spirit of religion had worn down to be a form, and a university where almost every man was a rationalist, he found little encouragement to faith. As late as last year he wrote that out of the two millions of Christians in Hanover, the most never read the Bible, nor went to the Lord's Supper, nor appeared at church; but occupied themselves entirely with their own concerns: and thirty years ago the picture would have been less favourable. A man might travel then from north to south of Hanover, and not find a single faithful pastor. It was not by outward circumstances, but against them that he was led to Christ. As he sat in thought one night, he turned to the seventeenth chapter of St. John. It was over this prayer of our High-Priest that the light came upon him, and he recognised the sacrificial death of Christ. Ignorant of fear, yet on that night, he says, when he was brought to the knowledge of his sins, he cowered under the wrath of God, and trembled in every limb. He had already passed through much inward conflict, of which he long bore the traces; no one of ordinary intellectual power could well escape it when thrown into the student society of the time. But now that he had fairly passed out of it, his life assumed a new direction. He left Göttingen after a final brilliant examination, to take the situation of tutor at Lauenburg for nine years. His design of mastering the sciences was thrown aside; he sought out the isolated Christians and drew them into fellowship, and Lauenberg held always a dear place in his memory. He removed in 1839, to Lüneburg, where he continued his Bible-meetings, and preached, though still holding the position of tutor. His peculiar mental training and mental conflict, the firmness and entireness with which he held the truth, and his knowledge of many forms of error, won for him considerable influence. It was scarcely possible to resist his appeals; even then men noticed the deep and settled peace, and felt that nameless but powerful impression left by an earnest, holy man. He had a habit of looking straight into the face with a fixed and calm glance that reached to the innermost heart, and drew out a frank confession and confidence. During this time he had been asked, both to join the mission-house at Hamburg and to go to New York; but his passion for the Heath overcame every other feeling, and thirteen years after he had left the university, he joined his father at Herrmannsburg; the next year he was appointed his coadjutor; and on his father's death, in 1848, he became sole pastor.

He now fairly settled down to his work. It was among peasants and peasant proprietors, and the people who would be found in a common country village. Slowly a change came to be noticed in the parish. The careless, stubborn, and ignorant diminished; the farmers came more regularly to the church; ploughboys sang Luther's hymns instead of country ballads; in houses where the Bible had not been opened, it was daily read; the people spoke frankly on religion, and were grave and quiet, and came to be known as Herrmannsburgher at the markets and fairs; and any stranger who passed that way would notice the tidier houses and brighter look of the neighbourhood; and if he passed at noon would be amazed to hear the bell peal from the little wooden spire, and to see in every field the labour stopped, and the head unbared, at prayer, and to hear from some groups of haymakers, or at the early harvest, the measured cadence of a hymn. There was evidently some remarkable influence at work; every inquiry traced it up to the new pastor. He had not only determined to work, but had flung himself upon his work with a characteristic impetuosity, not to be either slackened or exhausted, till he could work no more. Woe to me, he once said, if I live to be both old and strong. He preached four, sometimes five times every Sunday, and his services were often prolonged to three hours. He catechised not only the young but the old. He came into constant intercourse with his parishioners and led them into the fullest intercourse with him. And it was natural that labour so ardent, so full of faith and self-sacrifice, of a man whose spirit was visibly touched by God's Spirit, and his words with God's word, should produce a singular result. Outwardly at least there was not a parish in Hanover like Herrmannsburg. It recalled in its piety, simplicity, gravity, and the vigour of its Christian life, in the universal and apparently hearty service of God, the full and happy recognition of Jesus Christ the Saviour, and the manifest living presence and operation of the Holy Ghost—in all these it recalled the ideal and beautiful pictures painted of apostolic times.

Almost immediately after Harms was settled in his charge, there rose before his soul one night, he says, the words, Neither is there salvation in any other, for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved. He could not sleep; "for it continually thundered in my soul: Man, what hast thou done to help so many perishing men? I had no other answer than, Nothing. The day after, I went to some of them that believed, and that I knew loved the Word of God, and I put before them that we must do something for the poor heathen." Elsewhere he wrote, "It is not long since there came to Herrmannsburg a poor disabled Candidat—disabled, for he dared no longer preach; poor, for it had been his habit to live so that he had nothing over. He had no money to pay his way; but a lady presented him with three gulden, wrapped in a quarter of a pound of tobacco, and with these he went on his journey. When he came here, he made known to the people that there were heathens, wretched and miserable. Then the people said, If that is true, we must help them; and a widow came and brought six shillings, and a labourer sixpence, and a child a silver penny." Suggestive hints like these were sure to act powerfully upon a man like Harms. The zeal for God which had been kindled in his parish was easily turned upon missions; as he went from house to house, the words he dropped fell like seed into ready ground; what was so much in his thoughts worked its way out almost involuntarily in his sermons; and when he took courage and proposed to his neighbours that they would be their own missionaries, twelve stepped forward and said they were ready. At that time any one who spoke of missions was laughed at; to be interested in them was considered the sign of a disordered intellect; and the man who advocated them was deemed scarcely safe except in prison. It was as bold an act of faith as will be found in the history of missions, when Mr. Harms, in such circumstances, brought forward his proposal. For he did not suggest an annual sermon, a collection, that they might help some existing society, or that they might support a missionary—proposals which, in this country, would not fill us with any surprise, yet above which a congregation never soars; but in the midst of general indifference and contempt for missions, he put it to a group of peasants and small farmers, with no doubt much of the prejudice and ignorance of their class, to volunteer for missionary service and to take the entire burden of supporting a separate mission. He seems to have felt that what was done at Antioch might be done again, and not to have distrusted that where the Spirit of God works, a right and lofty enthusiasm is always possible. "If not, it were surely the stupidest folly if I touched this work with so much as a finger." No doubt he went about it thoughtfully, and not by rash impulse; for enthusiasm is not made up of even any number of sudden impulses; and no doubt his thoughtfulness made him rest his appeal on the primitive ground of faith, and to condemn, with perhaps too sweeping words, the mere mission work which becomes a fashion in the church, and to which people give because it is the custom. He had no patience with the principle by which, "having had a new coat for ourselves, we will bestow the clippings on the heathen." "As a believing Christian," he asserted, "you cannot help carrying on mission work with all earnestness and with all your heart, though you should have to do it alone." "Generous," "Good," "Manly," men are disposed to say: but he was satisfied that it was right.

House-room was not difficult to obtain, for one of the yeomen who had volunteered brought his farm with him as a gift to the mission. Aided by his brother, Harms began the suitable training of these men, and led them over a very suitable and extensive course of theology, taught, no doubt, in its practical aspects and adapted to the position and habits of the students. Africa was fixed on for a mission field; the students and all the parish fell heartily into the project; and the only remaining difficulty was the expense of transit. A sailor who had joined the mission-house suggested the building of a ship; it would be their own property, would perform all their journeys, and might earn as much by freight as would maintain it. Harms stepped boldly into this undertaking also, and commissioned a ship, the Candace, to be built at Harburg; and this being ready in due time, sailed in the end of 1853 with eight missionaries, two smiths, a tailor, a butcher, a dyer, and three labourers on board, and took them safely to Natal. They had intended to make their way to the Gallas, the most desperate tribe of Eastern Africa, but as the Imaum at Mombaz had refused them passage through his land, they sought to penetrate through Natal among the Kaffirs, and work their way northwards, planting stations as they went. This entire mission project was of large outline. It embraced missionaries distinctively to teach, and colonists distinctively to labour; yet the missionaries were not to shrink from work, nor the colonists from teaching. It was conceived that these colonies might be made partly self-supporting, that the stations would thus be more stationary, that settlements would be formed on which, if necessary, the outposts could fall back. It was the transference of an entire Christian community to a heathen people, to live among them as Christians, and with the one object of introducing Christianity. It was also a bold and large conception to push up these colonies through hostile tribes and over tracts unknown to Europeans, to link them in a long chain, and at every halt in the patient march to spread the knowledge of the Gospel. So this little peaceful army contemplated fighting their way till they had conquered the land for Christ. It was grand enough work for a kingdom, tedious and difficult enough to task the energies of an entire Church; but it was projected by a single man, and to be carried out by a single parish.

The ship had not long sailed when the vacant places in the mission-house were filled. Fresh volunteers came forward, other colonists were ready to share the privations of their brethren; and as often as the Candace returned she was sent out again with fresh supplies of men. It was a great drain upon the parish; but there is scarcely a corner of Germany from which there is not an emigration, and Herrmannsburg could as well spare its people to Africa as to America. Upwards of forty have sometimes left at once; and forty-eight young missionaries are always in training. For, as the need became greater, the zeal of the people kept pace with it, and five years ago a hundred offered themselves in a body. The training has grown more systematic; the students continue to be examined and tested by the supreme ecclesiastical tribunal, and depart with their authority and sanction; and almost uniformly they have turned out well. It was in the comparative leisure of waiting for the first tidings of the ship that Mr. Harms planned another work. Touched, as some of the best of his countrymen were about that time, by the position of discharged convicts, it struck him that to improve it would be a righteous mission at home. Suspected, and possibly tainted by imprisonment, they found an honest calling almost impossible, and their sympathies and habits had been perverted to crime. If they had some shelter till the possible good in them was strengthened, some time of probation that would stamp them again with an honest mark, and some kindly and firm friend to watch them, they might be restored to society. A neighbourhood so peaceful, orderly, and Christian, and so far away from the stir of life, seemed to Harms favourable for the experiment. A farm was bought large enough to employ the men in tillage, one of the parishioners took charge of it, and the Asylum has since kept its doors open to those who came, with various results, but a preponderating success. About the same time, also, it became necessary to start a Missionary Magazine. It was impossible to satisfy all who wished to hear of their friends in Africa, by letter. The interest rapidly spread out of the neighbourhood, and, indeed, out of Hanover, and to meet the demands made upon his time and pen, Harms took refuge in printing. It was well also that the young missionaries should become familiar with type: they might, if it proved necessary, print their own books, and set up a press among the heathen. A modest beginning was made at the mission-house with a monthly missionary paper; hymn-books and catechisms; reprints sufficiently accurate and orthodox to satisfy so thorough an antiquarian and sound a Lutheran as the pastor; sermons preached in the village church; and other volumes, followed: and the press, never idle, brings in an annual profit of six hundred pounds. While Mr. Harms was undertaking these fresh labours, he took nothing from the old. His parish was as closely tended, his services were as numerous, his activity and minute self-sacrifice as remarkable: and while his influence was thus spreading at home, he was able after ten years to sum up such results as these abroad:—"In the year 1853 our first missionaries sailed from Hamburg, and as they entered on their work in 1854, our mission in Africa is now ten years old. We have there the following mission stations, Herrmannsburg, Ehlanzeni, Etembeni, Müden, New Hanover, Empangweni, Enhlangana, Sterkspruit, Emakabeleni, Emonjeni, Emlalazi, Endlangabo, Injesane, Isisingisingi, Entombe, Ehlomohlomo, Etaka, Emyati, Enhlonyana, Etombe, Ekombela, Linokena, Goyon, Litheyane, and two that are not yet completed. Besides the necessary dwellings and offices at these stations for the missionaries, colonists, and for some of the converted Kaffirs, there are six pretty churches, small and great, and the stations are surrounded by tilled fields and gardens. Herrmannsburg has the look of an imposing village, and hundreds of cattle, almost a thousand sheep, and many horses and swine roam through the fields; poultry crowd the farm-yards, and smiths, carpenters, wheelwrights, shoemakers, tailors and others, all have their workshops. Avenues of gum trees run through the streets, and beyond the town are little forests of peaches. In Herrmannsburg, Etembeni, Litheyane, Linokena, and Goyon, there are altogether one hundred and ninety baptised natives, of whom one hundred and thirty are Bechuanas, and sixty are Kaffirs; in New Hanover there are two baptised families, and in Ekombela the first baptised Zulu. At several stations, such as Empangweni, where all seemed dead, there is now life. The Bechuanas are increasing their attendance at school, so that there are more than a hundred scholars at Linokena, and even the old chief, Moilve, learns his letters, spectacles on nose. This hath God wrought, the same God who so often and so sharply smote us, but who hath not turned away his grace."

These last words show that the mission was not exempt from trial. Those who went out first were roughly enough received; sent from coast to coast, suspected in one place as democrats, in another as Jesuits, and obliged at last to make such shift as they could. The Candace was sometimes in danger; was at one time maliciously inserted in the Shipping-list as lost, and was not always fortunate in a captain. Rumours were spread of the most ludicrous sort: as that Harms had fled to America with the mission-chest, that he had fitted out the Candace as a privateer, manned her with Malays, and was watching vessels at the mouth of the Elbe. Living was found more expensive than had been supposed; and the way north to the Gallas was sometimes suddenly threatened or closed. There were deaths, and alas! even mutual recriminations and dissensions, and some of the oldest missionaries and one or two of the colonists split off from the main body, and stations were seriously crippled and forsaken. Some of these were serious trials, and painful enough to bear; but it all came right in the end; the secessionists returned; and last year there were fresh openings and encouragements. The missionaries were already located with Sechele and the Bechuanas, with Umpanda and the Zulu Kaffirs, and had hopes of pressing on through Mosele-Katse's people. They have now a firm hold on another tribe, the Mamagale, who were mixed up with the Bechuanas, and shared the confusion of the present Boer war. One of them had been taken prisoner by the English, and carried away to Kaffraria. When there he became a Christian, and returned to his people to tell them of Christ. He begged books on every side, and taught them to read in Dutch and in the Bechuana tongue, so that when they clustered round the Herrmannsburg missionary, and he settled among them, there were at once fifty candidates for baptism. A new station has been opened there, called Bethany—a village, laid out with six streets and a church and school—and already seventy-eight persons, including two of the four chiefs, have been baptised. "The women do much for the spread of God's kingdom, even those that are not baptised. In the largest village there is a woman, yet unbaptised, who every evening makes a great fire in the open space, collects the young people about her, and teaches them often till midnight." Altogether, over one hundred and twenty have been baptised by the missionaries last year alone, and not after superficial, but thorough and most painstaking training. At home the asylum for prisoners continues to give satisfaction; some of the former inmates have died, it is believed, in faith; from others in England and elsewhere grateful letters have been received and good accounts; and as an institution the farm is almost self-supporting. So strong does the missionary life continue, that it has overflowed its first limits, and six missionary clergymen have been sent to America, one to Australia, and one to India. The last mission was established through a curious coincidence. Mr. Nagel, of Hamburg, who has been banker, shipper, and factotum to Harms, had a brother-in-law in the Telugu Mission. This mission was not supported, and the missionary, a loyal Lutheran, begged for help from Herrmannsburg. Mylius had been formerly an Indian missionary, but, returning with shattered health, he had been for thirteen years in the Frederiken-Stift, in Hanover. When the matron of this Stift died, the old love for India grew warm in his heart; and he wrote at this time to Harms, "Send me to the heathen, to Africa, anywhere you will, only send me to the heathen;" there was also over 300*l.* in the mission treasury. It appeared impossible to mistake the drift of these circumstances, and Mylius is now in Telugu, expecting fresh helpers from the inexhaustible little parish.

During these certainly not inexpensive labours, Harms never seems to have wanted money. His theory was peculiar. He made no appeal in any public way save to his own church; his people were poor; he was not in favour with the wealthy; he made no literal acknowledgment of money forwarded. He was a reticent, self-contained man, not given to babbling out his own counsel, and he seldom talked of a plan until he was prepared to execute it. Yet he wrote of help mysteriously sent from places with which he had no communication, and at the times when he needed it. "God be thanked," he says, "that I have no need to beg from men. Through Jesus Christ, my great High-Priest, I go joyfully to the throne of grace, and I pray with assured confidence that I shall receive grace when I have need of it. Therefore I say to Him, 'Dear Jesus, thou willest that this mission be carried on: but see, here is one want, and there is another.' Verily, though you should require a thousand crowns or more, you would not apply there in vain." His way of keeping accounts was in unison. "In the whole course of the year I never make a comparison between income and expenditure. What is given I take, and what is to be spent I spend. In this way I spare myself all anxiety about how far the money will reach; and on the day before the annual festival I reckon up." As a theory this is subject to grave objections, and requires unusual conditions; but in Mr. Harms' case it worked well. It requires a larger faith, a deeper mutual confidence, a more genuine simplicity and wisdom, than are readily found; but granted that under certain circumstances it is possible, and there is no doubt of its superior ease—above all of the advantage it gives of a more habitual, personal dependence upon God. His parish supported him with an unsurpassed devotion and self-sacrifice. Some of his parishioners have handed him £50 and £100 at once; some who had no money have presented him with property; and all have laid their gifts down in the open and generous spirit of the early Church; they gave, indeed, what they had, and with a patient and cheerful stinting of themselves that, were it general, would revolutionise our missions. "A short time ago," he once wrote, "I had to pay a merchant on behalf of the missions 550 thaler, and when the day drew near I had only 400. Then I prayed to the Lord Jesus that He would provide me with the deficiency. On the day before, three letters were brought; one from Schwerin with twenty, one from Buckeburg with twenty-five, and one from Berlin with one hundred crowns. The donors were anonymous. On the evening of the same day, a labourer brought me ten thaler, so that I have not only enough, but five over." "Last year," he said in 1858, "I needed 15,000 thaler, and the Lord gave me that and sixty over; this year I needed double, and the Lord has given me double and 140 over." He has never withdrawn from his work for want of means; as it has expanded he has always found his means expand. And this will be best seen from the accompanying table:—

	Expenditure.	Income.	Profit of the Printing Press, includ d in Income.

Besides money, an extraordinary variety of other gifts was poured into the treasury. Clothing, farm produce, school-books, and endless et ceteras accumulated for the annual meeting each year. § If there was building to be done, tradesmen gave their time and farmers their horses. Nothing apparently that could be given was withheld.

It is surprising to read of gifts so various, and confusing in their prodigality; but it is at least as surprising that the mission has been maintained for so little. At the two mission houses and farms there are about 70 people, 48 of them students; at the Refuge farm for the prisoners about 20; about 160 settlers have been sent out to Africa, and those of them who are missionaries are of course entirely dependent on Herrmannsburg; there are about thirty stations—New Herrmannsburg, the oldest, having a population of 109; and these missionaries have been equipped and transported, the ship built and maintained, churches and dwelling-houses erected; upwards of 50,000 acres taken in Africa, and a farm purchased at home; a printing-press set up, and commodious buildings finished for the missionaries in training. To obtain these results for the money that was spent shows very clearly not only a wise administration, but the advantage of a parochial mission. The official expenditure was reduced to the minimum, and on Mr. Harms' theory there was no expense in collecting funds. Deputations and travelling secretaries were unknown. The missionaries were sent out loaded with affectionate gifts, more like sons leaving home for a new country than so many clergymen at given salaries and fixed outfits; and they were ready and urged to live simply, busily, and roughly, to beware of being fine ladies and gentlemen, and to remember that they had been plain people of the Heath. It would be too much to expect many parishes like that in Hanover; yet the parochial working of our missions might be more developed. It would not only be an economy, but a gain to the simplicity and the spirit of the work. It would require, indeed, men with something of Mr. Harms' temper, his devotion, energy and self-sacrifice. Of men exactly like him the Church has produced few.

‡ For 10 months only. And this exclusive of two donations, one of 2,000 thaler, since paid; and a legacy of 2,500, left by a yeoman who had wished to sell his farm and enter the mission-house; but, hindered in that, had bequeathed this sum, payable at the end of last year.

§ Here, for example, is the curious collection for last year:—"Shirts, 720; shifts, 132; children's shirts, 65; frocks, 170; bedticks, 50; pillow-ticks, 40; sheets, 50; pieces of linen, 42; pieces of towelling, 15; linens, 110; towels, 37; pocket-handkerchiefs, 110; neckcloths, 220; aprons, 48; coats, 24; woman's dress, 1; woollen stockings, 800 pair; women's and children's caps, 65 (including 3 golden); a greatcoat, some waistcoats, under-jackets, twine, thread, woollen yarn, sewing needles, knitting needles, steel pens, copy-books, books, cups, plates, thimbles, toys, children's stuff, many sacks of wheat, buckwheat, linseed, and peas; calves, geese, butter, fresh and dried fruit, beef, cabbage, turnips of various sorts, wheaten meal, eggs, sausages, bacon, lard, ham, honey, hay, straw, and firewood.

He was charged with the entire collection and distribution of the money; he maintained a constant correspondence with all the stations; he superintended much of the education of the missionary students: controlled and planned for the Asylum; edited and wrote most of his Missionary Magazine; and watched the printing press. Sometimes for a year together he would thus be chained to his desk twelve hours a day. It was already more than one man's labour; he was secretary, treasurer, principal, committee, and something over. Yet this was merely an addition to the work of pastor that he undertook at his ordination and carried out with unflinching fidelity and pains. His sermons were carefully studied and written in a clear hand, though fifteen to sixteen pages of large octavo in print did not occupy half that space—even unabbreviated—in manuscript. They had a large circulation, for of the two years' that were published the press threw off more than 30,000 copies; and they bear every mark of care, and of accurate, painstaking, faithful teaching. And besides, he found leisure for much reading and for antiquarian pursuits of a nature proverbially tedious. He had never married, he said he was too busy; and it is doubtful if one so energetic and self-consuming would not have felt home ties a burthen; if he would have been satisfied with a wife less actively employed. He had nothing to fall back upon but work; and yet there is a joyous ringing sound in his words, a hearty laughter, a free and quiet humour that almost imply leisure and rest. And they are the more noticeable because his health was indifferent. From the hour of his conversion he scarcely had a day without pain. He was smitten by protracted and most painful sicknesses, so that those who knew him would wonder how it was that a man should suffer so much. The thin, sunken, wasted cheeks, the deep eyes, the firm calm will about the mouth on which there often broke the sweetest smile, the pained look that wore away under the constant enthusiasm, were familiar to all the parish, and they carried a gentle message to every sufferer. No constitution could hold out at such a rate of living, and his friends began to fear that each public appearance would be the last. The tall figure and elastic step were not met so often on the Heath. Then the mission meeting came round last June, and he was wheeled to the church in a chair. He could not climb the pulpit, but preached from the communion table. Preaching there as late as the 5th of November, he sighed, "O Lord Jesus, if I can no longer preach take me from the earth. Of what use can I be, if I can no longer speak of Thee to my brethren?" Soon after, he accompanied a funeral. The next was his own. His death was the first rest he had taken, "dead-tired and dead-faint, an old man of fifty-seven years, but a young man in the fire of his spirit. The last hours of his life were full of unspeakable pains, but his mouth overflowed with prayers. His last prayer was, Help me, O God, always; make me ready for everlasting joy and felicity. Come, Lord Jesus. I can bear it no more. Neither his consciousness nor his faith was disturbed for an instant, and as he slept away at last his wish was fulfilled, O Lord, in pains of death, grant me a quiet countenance. Help me, that when my heart breaks it may break softly, and my life go out like a light, without other woe, quenched in the innocent blood that Thou didst shed for me."

"We cannot believe," said his friends, "that our Harms is dead." Herrmannsburg had filled up every year, for two long summer days of mission festival. The people poured by thousands into the streets of the quiet village, a peasant's festival, Harms said; "distinguished and high people did not come, townspeople only a few. There were even few pastors; elsewhere hundreds go; but there will be twenty, or at most thirty, with us." They heard him preach and read his report; they heard the head of the mission-house with his statistics; they sang, and listened to the choir of forty voices, as they lifted up their glorious chorales to accompanying harmony of trumpets blown by the peasant-students; they joined in their fervent liturgy; and after service in and out of church, that lasted from morning till night, the kindly, hospitable village received its guests, and found mysterious room for them all. By daybreak the next morning, the murmur of family worship broke through the street; and in the early sun all the villagers and their guests poured out along some quiet road cleft through the purple heather; and from every farm and by-path a rivulet of people flowed into the stream. Thus they went on, singing their hymns by the way, till in some secluded vale they halted, and till near sunset the time was spent in hearing missionary addresses, varied with psalms and prayers. On these days Harms was especially the moving spirit; every one looked for him—every one felt his presence. On the 17th of last November a greater crowd than ever filled the streets: but no joy streamed from their faces; people moved and met in silence; tears stood in almost every eye. "The darling of the Christian people, the father of his congregation and the mission, the great teacher of the Church was no more. He lay in a little room of the voiceless vicarage; on his face the grave earnestness of death and the peace of God. Neither wife nor children wept about his bier, but his spiritual children took their place. The coffin was borne away covered with flowers and crowns, and burning lights upon it. Then rose the deep psalm, more wept than sung—

'All men that live must also die.'

It was one of his favourites, that he had sung hundreds of times as he followed his own children to the grave. . . . . My brother once said 'We pastor's children have no home on earth. When the father dies, we must leave the house where we were born. But we have another home in our dear church!' So the body lay in this home, and round it stood the thirty preachers, and his mission students, and in and about the church many thousands. Beloved Niemann was present to represent the High Court of the Consistory, and by charge of the royal family to lay upon the coffin five palms and five wreaths from the King and Queen, the Crown Prince, and the Princesses. And then, with solemn words and broken prayers and solemn psalms they buried him. 'A dear heart is stilled, a precious life is over.'"

"What was it," said Niemann, "that made his lips eloquent, that gave his teaching a living sincerity, his words a mighty force, his often eager voice ever the sweetest tone? What was it that flamed in his rebukes, that quickened his entreaties, that breathed in his simple prayers and drew the soul up with him to God? What else than that to him to live was Christ? What was it that made his heart the heart of his people, that helped him to share all the sorrow and want and sin of the parish and of every one in it with warm sympathy, that led him after the erring, and made him the most welcome visitor to the sick and afflicted, that helped him to receive with gentle kindness the weak and fallen, that made him seek out the publicans and sinners, that made the doubting and despised cling to him, and the penitent and anxious open their hearts, and gave him to see many a sinner turned from the error of his ways, and many a soul saved from death? What else than that to him to live was Christ? What was it that made him work with such self-denial and sacrifice for the kingdom of God, that made him find in it his highest joy, his peace, his all, that helped him to carry it on year by year, day by day, and even hour by hour, without the need of rest, that kept him from forgetting the near in the far, and the far in the near, reaching out to Christians and heathen the same helpful hand, that enabled him to kindle in many a heart the like spirit of sacrifice for the mission work, so that the people builded mission houses with their own hands, and he builded up this parish of Herrmannsburg into an evangelical mission parish? What else than that to him to live was Christ? What was it that kept him undaunted by any difficulty, made him fear no want, held him unmoved by mockery, contradiction, contempt, and laughter of the world, made him cleave bravely to his plan through whatever struggle with the powers of darkness, that held together the perishable tabernacle so that he faithfully carried out his manifold work through many trials, and unspeakable afflictions and bodily pains, and never left it till his last breath, and when he lay prostrate would rise again, and run and not be weary, and walk and not faint? It was this, that to him to live was Christ."

W. Fleming Stevenson.

THE HEAD OF THE HOUSE.

A sadder scene can hardly be fancied than that of a young king mounting a throne with scarcely a thought of the responsibility of the office. In spite of the awkwardness and almost absurdity of the act, there was something morally graceful in the modesty of Saul hiding himself among the stuff when the lot fell on him to be king of Israel. In all Solomon's life, there was no incident more beautiful than the scene at Gibeon, when, with his father's great gifts and experience full in his eye, he said to God, "Thou hast made Thy servant king instead of David my father, and I am but a little child. Give, therefore, thy servant an understanding heart." On the other hand, for a man to jump into a throne as carelessly as a boy leaps upon a wall, or a practised horseman vaults into a saddle, betrays a nature fearfully shallow, and shows a sad insensibility to the results that will spring from a good reign on the one hand, or from a wicked, or it may be only a careless, one on the other.

And yet there is nothing more common. In saying this, I am not thinking of the two or three dozen of crowned heads among whom, as the Almanac shows us, the territories of Europe are divided. I am thinking of kings whose name is Legion, although they have none of the insignia of royalty, and although not one in a hundred, perhaps, ever suspects that he occupies a throne. I am thinking of the careless spirit in which so many wield the domestic sceptre, and exercise the prerogatives of the Head of a Family. For that is a real kingly office. Whoever becomes the head of a house, becomes a ruler by divine right, and begins a career of sovereignty, limited, no doubt, in its area, and modified in its degree, but not the less real, the effects of which may possibly last through all time and through all eternity. The poorest labourer in the land, who shares the end of a cottage with a wife and children, exercises an influence on comfort and character which can never be traced to its end; either on the one hand fitting and helping them for the part for which God has designed them, enlarging their talents, and wisely guiding them in the application of their energies; or, on the other, destroying their capacity for good, quenching their best aspirations, souring their warm affections, driving them to evil,—perhaps completing their ruin for time and for eternity.

I wonder how many of those who occupy the family-throne have any serious thoughts of this kind. No statistics of Registrars can answer the question, or even throw a gleam of light on it. The gradual manner in which family responsibilities come on people often causes them to be little thought of; and, except in the case of serious natures, the first step, the forming of the marriage-tie, is not connected with much earnest thought. Certainly we have no desire to do away with the gladsome feelings that throw a rainbow, as it were, round the marriage-altar, and give something of the visible bloom of Eden to one of the few institutions that are left to remind us of its brightness and its bliss. But we do desire very much that the matter were habitually looked at also on its solemn side; that in mounting the family throne men would think more of the power they are assuming to make or to mar, to benefit or to injure, to bless or to curse the members of their domestic circle; would remember that, according as they are left to themselves or helped by God, they will either freeze the hearts, embitter the lives, and ruin the souls of those about them, or help to turn their existence into a long summer day, and make earth, even with all its sorrows and trials, the vestibule of heaven.

For what is there, next to the purity and efficiency of the Christian Church, on which the true welfare and prosperity of a community depend so much, as the wholesomeness of the influences at work in our homes? Goldsmith could plausibly enough make light of the influence of civil rulers and their laws on the every-day happiness of men:—

> "How small, of all that human hearts endure,
> That part which laws or kings can cause or cure!"

But he could not have said so of domestic kings and family laws. The human plant can no more than the plants of the garden dispense in early life with the due proportions of light and heat, air and moisture, congenial soil, shelter, and training. One night's frost may inflict irreparable injury on the young rose or geranium, and one fierce blast of passion may leave on a child's nature traces of evil never to be remedied. The hardiest plant, if constantly exposed to bitter winds, will show a stunted growth that will seldom disappear, even if it be transplanted to the richest soil and the finest shelter; and the most promising child, if mismanaged at home, will not often be what it might have been, whatever advantages it may enjoy in after life. In particular cases, neglect or pernicious treatment at home may be compensated for by other things, but not as a general rule. A few children may have physical constitutions strong enough to withstand the cold and damp of constant exposure, even although they be clothed in rags, destitute of regular food, and compelled for want of better accommodation to sleep on stairs or in stables, or wherever they can obtain a casual shelter; but such treatment would be fatal to at least nine children out of ten. Instances are not wanting of young persons, who have been reared in most wretched homes, turning out patterns of goodness and trying to guide in the ways of wisdom the wayward wanderers that should have guided them; but such instances are as rare as they are touching. Usually the damage is irreparable that results to the young from evil or even careless example at home: from the sight of vice or idleness, from the influence of a violent temper, from a spirit that shows no consideration for them, and takes no interest in them, and from the want of all regard to the sanctities of religion and the solemnities of eternity.

These facts are now so generally acknowledged that it is almost superfluous to advert to them. The deep impression they have made is seen in the earnest efforts of Christian philanthropists to enlighten and to guide one of the members of the domestic co-partnery in the duties incumbent on her. Wherever Christian zeal shows her banner, mothers' meetings are at work beneath it. If the excellent ladies by whom these meetings are carried on can succeed by God's blessing in kindling in mothers a sense of their duty as helpers of the head of the house, and as practically entrusted with most of the details of the training of their children, they will confer on them and on the community an inestimable benefit. But amid all that is said and done in these days about mothers, it must not be forgot that it is the man that by divine right is constituted head of the house. It is necessary that the man be reminded of the responsibility that lies on him, and urged to carry it out in all its branches. As husband, as father, and as master, there are duties incumbent on him that cannot be done by deputy. Details, in most instances, may be devolved on others; but the guiding, superintending power should be in the hands where God places the responsibility. I would fain speak a few pointed and earnest words to the heads of families on the momentous office they are called to fill; deeply feeling, as I do so, how far short anything I may write must fall of what is due to the importance of the subject.

I.

I begin with the head of the house in his capacity of Husband. I do not know how it is that there is such a disposition to treat this subject with levity; so much so, that one can hardly set one's self to write gravely upon it without feeling pretty sure of raising a smile. Is there not something vulgar in this disposition—something characteristic of those who look at things in their outer aspects and relations, and have little insight into what is deeper and more refined? In the Bible, at least, and particularly in the New Testament, there is no trace of such a tendency. St. Paul adverts to the husband's duty in the very highest connexion, and elevates it by comparisons and sanctions that in an uninspired writer would seem almost profane. "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it; that He might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the Word; that he might present it to Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing; but that it should be holy and without blemish." Our first impression on reading these words probably is, what a magnificent pattern they furnish for a very ordinary duty! Perhaps there is a feeling that the pattern is just rather too fine for the purpose. It looks somewhat as if a painter of village sign-posts were told to make each a copy of some master-piece of Titian or Rubens. But this is only a first impression; when we think what can be the reason for it, we remember the wretched nature of the fellowship that often subsisted in Eastern countries between husband and wife; we remember that often before marriage they knew nothing of each other,—perhaps had never even met; and that their married life was very frequently spent in cold indifference, if not in open hostility and strife. We think, too, how miserable it is still, when those who are one flesh are anything but one in spirit or affection; and how necessary it is, in order that the Christian home may be what it should be—an abode of all Christian graces, a nursery of all Christian worth and beauty,—that the heads of it, instead of living at variance, should be bound by the warm ties of love to each other. And as want of love is more liable to characterise the husband than the wife, we see the fitness of his being urged to his duty by the presentation of so high a pattern—"Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ also loved the church."

Christianity was evidently designed to introduce a higher style of family life than the world had ever known. And for the accomplishment of this, it throws its sweetening influence into the fountain, and having healed the bitter waters there, it provides for the purity of the streams. And let us mark how emphatically the Apostle brings this out, that the husband's love for his wife must resemble in its quality that of Christ for his Church. That is to say, it must be unselfish; it must be a love that seeks the good of its object. That is the great feature of Christ's love for his Church. Very often man's love is little better than a selfish desire. In such a case, what he regards is his own happiness, not his wife's; he desires her because he thinks she will add to his enjoyment, not from any wish to add to hers. But Christ's love is of quite different quality; He looks away from Himself, He considers her. The great desire of His heart is that it may be well with her; for that purpose, He has sacrificed Himself for her, He has given Himself up to death. For that purpose, He takes the utmost pains with her training, and seeks to have her fitted for the high place she is to fill. It is this love that is presented as the husband's model. Husbands, love your wives with this holy love; ever seeking their real welfare, their true spiritual good; ready to sacrifice your comfort to their benefit; anxious that in casting in their lot with you, their character shall sustain no damage; that in sharing your burdens, their back shall not be broken; that in becoming the partners of your cares the lustre of their spirituality shall not be dimmed; praying that married life may prove to them a school for higher attainments, stronger faith, higher courage, deeper love, greater patience, greater prayerfulness; longing above all things to see them as Christ longs to see his bride—holy and without blemish, not having spot or wrinkle, or any such thing.

It is plain, therefore, that no head of a family is doing his duty if in his heart there are no active feelings of this kind towards the partner of his home. And beyond all doubt the expenditure required is one that will bring an ample return. If it be the nature of all human beings to respond in some measure to the influence of love, it is pre-eminently the nature of woman. Her readiness to bear toil and self-denial, if only she have the love of those for whom they are borne, is proverbial. Drudgery ceases to be drudgery, and sacrifice to be sacrifice, if only love overshadows her. What a wonderful change in homes innumerable would result from the active exercise of this spirit on the part of the husband toward the wife! To how many a heart would any expression of sympathy from a long-careless husband come like the breath of spring! What new joys as of Paradise itself would thrill through her being, to hear him express his regret that he had thought of her welfare so little, and his earnest desire in future to consult for her highest good. With what new heart and hope would she spring forward to her routine of duty! And what precious results would flow from this unity of heart to their household. We may well conceive them singing,—

> Now is the winter of our discontent
> Made glorious summer by this sun of love;
> And all the clouds that lowered upon our house
> In the deep bosom of the ocean buried.

II.

The second function of the head of the house, is that of Father. How is he to discharge his duty to his children? How is he to make the group of young persons entrusted to his charge a happy and a holy commonwealth—living in the fear of God, and in favour with all good men?

By far the most important step in this direction will be taken, if he regard his authority over his children as a solemn trust, committed to him by God; if, under this conviction, he exercise the trust as God's deputy or viceroy, ruling his house, as far as possible, in God's own spirit, and making it his great aim in the management of his children not to gratify any mere wish of his own, but to promote the ends which God would accomplish, to make them what God would have them to be.

Does it need to be proved that the father's authority is a trust committed to him by God? Is not the family relation altogether a thing of God's formation? Human beings might each have been created separately, or in full maturity, like the angels, or like Adam and Eve; but by Divine arrangement they come into the world as infants, the very symbols of helplessness and witlessness. What then? Is God chargeable with forming human beings without the strength and the wisdom needed for self-preservation? By no means. His arrangement is, that in place of giving these directly and at once to the children, he gives them for a time in trust to the parents. The surplus strength and wisdom of the parents is a trust-fund they are to administer for the benefit of their offspring. As each is placed by God in the parental arms the charge is given—I constitute you my trustees for the rearing of this young life, this seedling of immortality, which I might have placed under my angels in heaven, but which I have chosen to entrust to you, that your hands may work for him, your heart may cherish him, your head may think for him, your eye may watch him, and your faith bear him on its wings to heaven! "Bring up this child for me, and I will pay thee thy wages."

If then the authority of the father is a divine trust, by all means let it be exercised in God's own spirit. Let the Heavenly Father be our pattern and example, and let the mode of rule in his family be the standard in ours. And what is the mode of rule in his family? It is marked by a wonderful combination of two qualities—authority and love. Authority, not merely recommending or advising, but requiring that its will be obeyed; but that authority the very reverse of a selfish despotism—an authority steeped in love, based on the deepest interest in us and the tenderest sympathy, and aiming in every arrangement at our good. So let it be in your parental rule. Let the claim of authority be asserted, especially in the earlier years of your government; but let it not be the despotism of selfishness, let it be the rule of love. Let your children not be forced to submit simply because they are weak and you are strong, and because you are selfishly determined that in your own house your will shall prevail; but let love soften the rigour of law, and smooth the way for its fulfilment; let them have ground for believing that whatever you require of them is determined by a loving regard for their welfare; and as years pass on, let their feelings crystallize into a settled confidence in you, as one who has uniformly tried to avoid whatever would have hurt them, and done everything in your power to promote their good.

If you thus try to exercise your authority in God's spirit you are pretty sure to direct it to God's ends. The selfish objects for which many fathers train their children will be carefully eschewed. You will not rear them in order to their making a figure in the world. You will not make it your avowed wish or your secret aim, that they may become rich, or prosperous, or great. You will not desire simply that they may be useful to yourselves in the occupation which you follow. Your heart will rise to the high end expressed in the well-known words,—"Man's chief end is to glorify God and to enjoy him for ever." Your ruling desire will be that they may be truly united to the Son of God, who came to seek and to save the lost; that, through the Holy Spirit, their nature may be renewed, and, rich in all pure feelings and holy desires, they may pursue through life whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; that they may diffuse a blessed fragrance wherever Providence may order their lot; and bequeath to those that follow them the memory of the just, and an example which all good men shall delight to honour.

In the busy times in which our lot is cast, it is neither easy nor possible for many fathers to attend personally to all the details connected with the early training of their children. A great share of this training must, of course, devolve upon the mother. But let not the father infer that he is excused from actively concerning himself in the rearing and training of his family. There are some things that he may do and ought to do, without trenching on the time and strength that are ordinarily taken up in his daily employment. Of these things, perhaps the most important of all is, to give, by his own life and example, a true Christian tone and character to the whole economy of the household. Let him be seen and known in his family as an earnest, faithful follower of the Lord. Let his whole life proclaim that he bows to God's authority, that he believes in Jesus Christ, that he strives daily after conformity to God's will, that his rule of life is to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with his God. And let there be no visible and glaring inconsistency with his profession. Let him be a true man. Let there never be veiled under the cloak of religion a mean worldly greed, or a low selfish aim. Let there be no lax principles in the daily life, no lack of self-control, no habitual outbreaks of peevishness, no gusts of passion. Let his life be so thoroughly Christian, that if ever his children shall be tempted to disbelief, they shall never be able to get over the argument supplied by his genuine and steadfast piety, by the even tenour of his blameless life, by the holy beauty of his consistent example. Such a man, though he should not come often into close contact with his children, would be a tower of strength on the side of religion; a silent power, like the magnetic pole, that would draw his family with resistless attraction.

But even where a minute charge may not be taken of the training of each child, much may be done in the way of superintending and directing the whole process on the part of others. Many a Christian mother will tell us, that though her husband did not personally do much, he gave her his counsel and support, especially in cases of difficulty, and by this means very greatly strengthened her hands. Anything more blameworthy can hardly be conceived than the conduct of a father who leaves to the mother the entire management of the children, and, instead of counsel and encouragement, gives her nothing but words of impatience when she makes allusion to her difficulties. Let the father be the busiest of men, he is bound to take all the care he can that a right method be followed in the nurture of the family; that their minds be imbued, while yet young and tender, with the great truths and lessons of the Gospel; that their hearts be neither soured by constant chiding, nor relaxed by indiscriminate indulgence; that scope be given to their joyous feelings and sportive tendencies; that their errors be corrected and their wilful faults restrained and punished; that they be trained in the love and practice of all that is good and true, and the cordial hatred of whatever is mean and wicked; that they be warned against the snares and temptations that beset the young, both open and concealed; that they practise the reading of the Bible, and secret prayer; that they reverence God's day, and attend his house; and that, when come to years, they be solemnly dealt with to give themselves to Christ, and bind themselves personally and deliberately in a holy covenant to Him. Whatever of this he may be able to do in person, the Christian head of a family is at the least bound to charge himself with the duty of using his best efforts to have it done by some means.

There is one day in the week that to most fathers is free from ordinary employment. And it is one of the ways in which the purpose of this day may be answered, and happy and hallowed feelings may be associated with it, when it is made a day of affectionate family intercourse, as well as of religious exercise and employment. Of things to be avoided on that day, the straggling and scattering of families should surely be one. Let them spend it, as far as may be, together. Let the heads of the family encourage the development of family interest and affection on that day, as well as of those feelings which are more immediately directed to God. Among other things, let there be some simple Bible exercise in which all the family are brought together, and in which all, or almost all, can take a part. Let the father head the procession that moves to the house of God, and be seen sitting there with his family, or alternating with the mother, if both cannot be in church together. Let him see that the sacred day is devoted to its great Divine ends, but take care, at the same time, not to overlay the spirit of cheerfulness that in children pre-eminently is the condition and the expression of happiness. Sundays so spent will be looked back on with a serene and holy satisfaction, as remote as can be conceived from the empty restlessness of those who, careless alike of the claims of God and their duty to their family, devote the day to mere selfish pleasure.

III.

The third function of the head of the house, is that of MASTER. The relation of master and servant is constituted by a voluntary agreement on certain definite points; but, as every one knows, besides what is in the bond a good deal more is required to give it a thoroughly Christian character.

But whatever is in the bond, let it be carefully discharged. "Masters give unto your servants that which is just and equal;" and never let the reproach go forth against you, "Behold the hire of the labourers who have reaped down your fields which is of you kept back by fraud, crieth; and the cries of them that have reaped have entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth." There is such inexpressible meanness in the conduct of those who try to effect a miserable saving by starving their servants, or by placing them in apartments or rather holes, hurtful to health and dangerous to life, that we cannot fancy any of our readers in so disgraceful a position.

But most masters expect from their servants a good deal more than is in the bond, and if they would have their expectations fulfilled, they must be prepared to give more, too, on their part. If more is wanted than hired work, more must be given than the hireling's pay. Servants like Eliezer of Damascus are not to be had at a fixed price at the register office. The dollar is not almighty here. I believe it is only under the shade, or rather the sunshine of such natures as those of Abraham and Sarah that such servants as Eliezer are formed or found. A thoughtful, considerate, affectionate man, feeling as much interest in his master's family as if it were his own, delighting to be of service to Isaac, though he had cut him out of the succession to his master's property, and to take steps for continuing the line of the family whose possessions would otherwise have been his own. The Bible gives us not a few glimpses of such servants: Deborah, Rebekah's nurse; the captive maid in Naaman's household that told her mistress of the prophet in Israel; Ebedmelech, the Ethiopian, that pitied Jeremiah, and had him drawn from the dungeon; Onesimus, the Christian slave, once indeed unprofitable, but so changed by God's grace as to become, in St. Paul's words to his master, "profitable to thee and to me." In servants of this type we may see the fruit of high Christian principle. I remember being once told by one who in early life had been a servant in a well-known family, that when her mistress first engaged her, she made a bargain with her to devote so much time to prayer, as the first thing each morning, for, she said, if you are not faithful to your Master in Heaven, you cannot be faithful to me. But further, if servants are desired of a willing, genial, thoughtful character, sympathy must be shown towards them by their employers, and arrangements made for the free development of the legitimate feelings of their nature. Friendly bonds must be woven between master and servant. The master that always speaks to his servants in the cold distant terms of authority can never expect to secure the considerate regard of that servant for himself and his family. When the master's house is but another name for a servant's prison, when no home-feelings can twine round it, when every natural instinct is driven in, when no species of relaxation, however harmless, ever comes to break the monotony of service, how is it possible for the servant's nature to develop freely or healthily? Then there is the danger of an opposite extreme,—masters exercising no moral or social control over their servants, and allowing an almost unlimited license as to hours and relaxations. Happy the household which has found the golden mean! Where, on the part of the masters, there is an unselfish desire for the temporal and spiritual welfare of the servants, and a human interest is felt in them, as partakers of the same nature, and sharers of the same cravings as their employers. Where pains are taken to instruct the ignorant, and enourage the backward. Where the value of their souls is recognised, the value of their character, and the value of their happinesss. Where it is earnestly sought that their contact with the family, be it of longer or of shorter duration, shall not only give them a tasting of sober and steady enjoyment, but shall impart to them principles that give an upward bearing to the whole life, and make the path like the shining light, shining more and more unto the perfect day.

IV.

Called as the head of the house is to functions so high and so difficult, what can be more incumbent on him than to ask very earnestly from above the grace and the wisdom needed for their right discharge?

Let him survey his work deliberately, and ponder its responsibilities, its dangers, and its privileges. All the three functions have very solemn issues, but let us limit our attention to one. Take the case of a single child. What delicate mechanism is inside that bosom, what harm will be done by unskilful handling, and what good by successful training! Suppose you cross and fret his temper by vexatious interferences, you do more harm, you lay the foundation of more misery through life than if you should dislocate some of his joints and send him limping through life a cripple. Suppose you are too indulgent, and through weakness and want of nerve allow serious faults to grow unchecked, the hurt is more fatal than if his body should be disfigured with horrible tumours. Suppose that selfishness gets the ascendant in your heart, and your life is governed by the single desire to please yourself. Suppose the world is allowed to fill your soul, and the whole influence of your example engages your child after you in the pursuit of shadows and vanities. Suppose, while you profess religion, your life and temper contradict the profession, and encourage him to nauseate what passes under that holy name. Do you not tremble at the thought of the mischief you may be doing to one you are so bound to love? Do you not feel how solemn a thing it is that you, who are yourself so full of sin and error, should be constituted the guide and guardian of so many besides? How earnest should your pleadings be at the throne of grace, and how firm the hold you take of the promise—"If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, who giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not."

And as you should pray for your household, so you should pray with them too. Family worship has ever been recognised as at once the badge and the stronghold of the Christian house. Like every other mode of Divine service, it may be abused or corrupted, and made to present a mere dead form in place of a living spirit. But in its true ideal it is a blessed privilege, and specially helpful to the head of the house. Here the whole family go hand in hand, as it were, to their common Father, and looking up, through Christ, on his reconciled countenance, thank Him for all their mercies; thank Him for their peaceful nights and tranquil days, for health preserved or health restored, for the door of heaven set open, for the beams of coming glory that even now brighten earth's dull path, for Jesus Christ, God's unspeakable gift, and for all the promises that in Him are yea, and in Him amen. Here they go together to lay their hands by faith on the head of the Lamb of God, and to receive the grace and guidance of the Holy Spirit. Here, when encompassed with distress and trouble, they come for relief to their father's bosom; pressed by anxiety, they ask direction; here they remember each other's sorrows and weaknesses or duties; here, separated in body, with oceans rolling between, they meet in spirit; here they commend each other to the eye that neither slumbers nor sleeps; and even when the wings of death are fluttering over their dwelling, they find a joy unspeakable and full of glory. Alas, that so blessed a service should be so rare, especially in the families of the poor! That it is kept up in the more earnest of them, and greatly prized there, shows that if there were but a will, there would be a way of maintaining it in all. What a pagan, nay, worse than pagan aspect the absence of everything of the kind gives to many of the homes of Protestant Britain! The pagan had his household gods, symbols in some shape of his dependence on heaven. But what is there to remind one of heaven in the house where there is neither family Bible nor family altar? It is not likely that, in the absence of these, there will be much of God's Spirit, or that hearts and lives will be so carefully ordered as to show that formal service may be dispensed with there.

I cannot refrain from closing this paper with a hymn of Spitta's. I should like above all that its spirit were left in the reader's heart, and its rhythm in his ears.

I.

O happy house, O home supremely blest,
Where Thou, Lord Jesus Christ, art entertained
As the most welcome and beloved guest,
With true devotion and with love unfeigned,
Where all hearts beat in unison with thine,
Where eyes grow brighter as they look on Thee;
Where all are ready, at the slightest sign,
To do thy will, and do it heartily.

II.

O happy house, where man and wife are one,
Thro' love of Thee, in spirit, heart, and mind,
Together joined by holy bands, which none,
Nor death itself, can sever or unbind;
Where both on Thee unfailingly depend,
In weal and woe, in good and evil days,
And hope with Thee eternity to spend,
In sweet communion and eternal praise.

III.

O happy house, where with the hands of prayer
Parents commit their children to the Friend,
Who, with a more than mother's tender care,
Will watch and keep them safely to the end;
Where they are taught to sit at Jesus' feet,
And listen to the words of life and truth,
And learn to lisp His praise in accents sweet
From early childhood to advancing youth.

IV.

O happy house, where men and maid pursue
Their daily labours as unto the Lord;
Divining only that whate'er they do
May be according to His will and word;
As servants, yet as friends and brethren too,
Their love with deep humility combined;
No less in little than in great things true,
They serve Him gladly with a willing mind.

V.

O happy house, where Thou dost share the weal,
Where none forget Thee, whatsoe'er befall;
O happy house, where Thou the wounds dost heal,
The Healer and the Comforter of all;
Till every one his stated part hath done,
And all at length shall peacefully depart
To the bright realms where Thou thyself art gone,
The Father's house where Thou already art.

A WATCHMAN'S GLANCE EASTWARD AND WESTWARD.

WATCHMEN are needed in many kinds of work, and among many classes of workers. In ancient times, and in pastoral countries, the conception was associated chiefly with shepherds and their flocks: in our day it more readily attaches itself to the occupation of soldiers and sailors.

The watch is a first necessity in war. By maintaining it, the weak have often proved victorious; by neglecting it, the strong have often been lost. In 1860, a small army of French and English penetrated to the capital of China, and dictated terms to the Emperor in his own palace. In camp or on march, that handful of skilful warriors were safe as long as they kept watch by night and day; if they had been even once caught off their guard, they would have been swallowed up by the myriads that hung on their skirts, like Pharaoh's army when the Red Sea's water walls collapsed. Such is the situation of the Christian Church—and such the situation of a believing man in the world. The watchful have no cause to fear; but the careless will certainly suffer loss. To be on our guard makes all the Redeemer's strength our own; to be off our guard leaves us exposed to the enemy who goeth about seeking whom he may devour. Satan could never cause a soul to stumble, if he did not surprise a soul asleep.

In like manner, as seamen need to keep a constant outlook for rocks and currents until they enter the gates of the harbour, so Christians, in their individual as well as their corporate capacity, need to watch and pray lest they should drift with some tendency of the age, or be overcome by some sudden strong temptation. No disaster can be compared to the shipwreck of the soul.

The question addressed to the watchman in the vision of the burden of Dumah (Isa. xxi. 11), has reference generally to night—"Watchman, what of the night?" The sense ordinarily attached to the metaphor in its moral application, points to the darkness and consequent danger of night, in contrast with the light and consequent comparative safety of day. This conception is both true and obvious; but the figure contains another equally true, though not so obvious. Assuming the reference which is manifest, I request attention to another which is somewhat veiled.

The night has a larger world than the day. It is only when we limit our view to the surface of this one planet that we associate night with darkness. The night that hides things at hand, reveals things distant; the night that covers earth, opens heaven. Our business with this world must be done in the day-time; but our intercourse with other worlds must be maintained by night. Night accordingly is the astronomer's period of activity; while the labourer who digs among the clods is bending homeward his weary steps for rest, the philosopher who marks the motions of the stars is setting out to his employment on his own appropriate field. The bright sun-light which reveals this earth, conceals the universe.

Astronomy began with shepherds. Their nightly watching while fellow-men were asleep, threw them upon the stars for company. It was when shut out from earth that they became acquainted with heaven. To shepherds watching their flocks by night the heavenly host announced the birth of Jesus.

Strange as the announcement may at first appear, the Sabbath is in this aspect like the night. It veils off for a time things near and earthly that things spiritual and eternal may come into view. Like night, the Sabbath covers up and sets aside the business of this world; while it opens heaven to man's upward gaze, and invites him to examine all its glories.

"Watchman, what of the night?" The night in this question intimates, in one aspect, that dangers are rife around; but it may also be permitted to suggest that the attention of the watchman is called not to things seen and temporal, but to things unseen and eternal. The question does not regard the affairs of time; they may be better observed by day. Watchman, overlooking the immediately surrounding cares, what shall we eat, and what shall we drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed, lift your eye upward, and cast your eye forward, and tell us, as far as human observation can reach, how it goes with the Kingdom of God in the world.

From the watch-tower let us search the horizon, and mark the objects of interest that lie on it.

Not, indeed, the distant East and paganism. Let Asia and Africa be supposed for the present to lie beneath our horizon. We look to Europe on the one side, and America on the other. Two objects, one on either of these two continents, tower above all others, and attract the observer's view. Two species of slavery, one the bondage of the soul, and the other the bondage of the body, have seemed for a long time to defy God and to destroy men on these continents. Let us look upon them separately and successively as they wage war against the Kingdom of Christ, and mark how He who sits King upon the floods, makes the wrath of man to praise Him, and restrains the remainder thereof. The Papal power oppressing Europe, and the system of slavery that rent America, are, for the past season, the bulkiest objects that lie within the watchman's view.

1. The Papacy. At the present day this is a study of intense interest to a Christian. If the student has no political object to be attained, and no exaggerated alarm to sound, and no foregone conclusion to uphold, he cannot fail to profit by his researches. In presence of this gigantic oppression, two errors diverge in opposite directions, equally foolish and equally fatal, into one or other of which men, according to their several tendencies, are apt to fall. Some dread the Papacy too much, and some too little. The rule which the Scriptures give for keeping the golden mean under personal suffering, might be accommodated to the great apostasy. "My son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint when thou art rebuked of him." Of the public tyranny, as of the private suffering, the rule equally holds good, that we should neither despise it on the one hand, nor faint before it on the other. We should neither boast as if we could overcome it, nor despair as if it were too strong for God.

God's goings as ruler of the world are in the deep; but to reverent inquirers some of his footprints occasionally appear. Mark them in the leading events of recent history.

In our own day the Papacy has been shaken, its territory circumscribed, and its resources dried up, in such measure as to make tyrants tremble, and persecuted Christians to sing aloud for joy. Italy, although not to any great extent so enlightened as to abandon Popery, has through all its borders thoroughly broken with the government of the Pope. At the Reformation the force that shook the Papacy began in men's souls and wrought outward: the force that shakes it to-day begins externally, among things temporal, but it may please God to employ these rendings on the surface as openings through which the word of life shall find its way to the nation's heart. We wait in hope for the end of the Lord. Meantime it is cause of fervent gratitude to God in every Christian heart, that, with the exception of Venetia and Rome, all Italy is open to the Bible and the Gospel.

More particularly note the recent course and present position of the two great Powers on which Popery has long depended for protection—Austria and France. In modern times the destinies of Europe have been mainly controlled under Providence by five great Powers. Of these, two are mainly Protestant, Britain and Prussia; two are Popish, France and Austria; and one, Russia, is neither Protestant nor Popish. On the political power and influence of the two great so-called Catholic monarchies, the throne of the Pope has been accustomed to lean in its difficulties. But in recent times, when its difficulties were at the height, these two Powers were arrayed against each other in the field of battle. Of these two, the Pope trusted the one, but feared the other. The one that he trusted succumbed; the one that he feared was victorious. The monarchy that has the will to support the Papacy lacks the power; and the monarchy that has the power lacks the will. With Austria the Pope would have been in a protector's arms; with France he has been in some sort in a jailer's hands.

Yet one step farther trace this strange history. The deeper you penetrate into the stratum of Providential sovereignty, the greater wonders will you discover. Two things were done about the same time some fifteen years ago, both at the time deemed the wisest means of strengthening the Papacy. One was the act of France; the other was the act of Austria. The one was the siege and occupation of Rome by the French army; the other was the Concordat concluded between the Austrian Government and the Pope. By the one, the Roman patriots were crushed, and the Pope reinstated as their despot; by the other, the vast territories and populations of the Austrian Empire were placed under the heel of the Pope and his cardinals. The privileges of many nations were wrenched away, and Italian priests constituted their virtual lawgivers.

Both secular governments were driving at selfish ends, while they masked their selfishness under the semblance of devotion to the Papacy. France needed the Pope's good will to keep the Gallican Church to its loyalty; and Austria needed the Pope's authority to keep down her subjects, ever bordering on insurrection.

But Ahithophel's counsel has on both sides been turned to foolishness. These two things have greatly contributed to the humiliation of the Pope. The Austrian Government has been so weakened by its base subserviency to the Papacy, that, so far from being able to support its tottering ally, it can hardly stand on its feet. The Concordat with Rome, it is well known, has done much to alienate the several nationalities of the Austrian Empire, and to produce the dead lock which for years has weakened its influence and even endangered its existence.* On the other side, Napoleon has turned out by no means a pleasant protector to the Pope. An observation on this point, profound and far-reaching in its nature, has been repeated so often that it has become common property, and I know not to whom we owe it. It is this: Had the Pope been swept away in the tide of the Italian war, sympathy with the unfortunate might have greatly modified, in the hearts of the Roman people, the disgust which his misgovernment was fitted to produce; but, by adding ten years to his lease, Napoleon, without knowing what he did, has afforded the Pope an opportunity, which that potentate has amply occupied, of wearing out and discharging from the heart of his subjects the lingering remnants of hereditary reverence for their priestly king. The blister left rankling for ten years on this spot of Italy, while the rest of her soil is free, will probably do much to widen and deepen the chasm between the Italian children and their self-styled Father.

But while these events that have taken place on the soil of Italy are deeply interesting and instructive, —while they have already told with effect on the spiritual system which has its head at Rome,—we must beware of over-estimating their importance. They have done something already ; they may yet do more ; but they will not,—they cannot do all.

* Two or three years ago I lodged several nights in a small but comfortable hotel in St. Mark's Place, Venice, whose windows commanded a full view of the great square. My landlord was an intelligent German, of Austrian birth and Austrian sympathies. He informed me one afternoon that at a certain hour in the evening a grand display of music would be made in the centre of the square by the bands of the Austrian garrison. My host and I took our places at the open window half an hour before the time. Then the whole square was thronged by Venetians of all ages and all ranks, promenading and listening at times to small groups of volunteer Italian musicians. As the hour for the commencement of the Austrian concert approached, the people disappeared, as if by magic, and the square was left desolate. Into the empty space marched the military musicians, and performed their parts. My host confessed that the people refused to remain within ear-shot of music made by their task-masters. While the brass instruments of the soldiers were belching out their mighty notes, and glancing in the evening light, I pointed to the left, under the piazza of the Doge's Palace, where a row of polished brass guns stood loaded, with their ugly muzzles looking through the iron railing point blank upon the square, and their gunners standing on the alert behind them, remarking that the one set of brass instruments perhaps tended to make the other set sound less harmonious in Venetian ears. My host assented, and volunteered the remark that the Concordat with Rome was a mistake, and had done much to alienate the different nationalities from the Government of the Emperor.—It is announced in the English newspapers that a Monseigneur Paterson—what an odd match between a French ecclesiastical title and a plain English or Scotch patronymic, as bad as the yoking together of an ox and an ass, which was forbidden in the Hebrew polity—has been begging in Vienna for a Romish cathedral in London, and that his Apostolic Majesty has contributed £200—a very pious gift, to be sure; but it is taken out of borrowed money, for his Majesty's outlay exceeds his income.

The analogy sometimes suggested of a wild beast, when wounded in the head or heart, losing soon the power that he formerly possessed in his extremities, does not in point of fact hold good here. The analogy must be taken not from animal but from vegetable life. The spiritual system of Popery is not a beast, whose members would be paralysed if the head were pierced ; it is rather a plant, such as ivy, that has grown ages ago in a certain spot, and has slowly, steadily sent out branches in all directions, and to a great distance, across hills and dales, until it covers nearly all the land. In process of time people discover that this plant is possessed of noxious properties ; and that it renders the ground almost barren wherever it spreads. The people rise against it, and although it is defended by interested parties, they succeed at last in cutting its original stem quite through. The sufferers, supposing that they are now rid of their persecutor for ever, sing a premature pæan, and stand expecting that the branches will all wither, now that the stem is severed. But, alas ! although all these outspreading branches came from the parent stem, and still continued to have vital connection with it, they also threw out roots at every joint, and these struck down into the earth, so that they are an innumerable host of separate plants, capable of living still on their own roots when their original parent is destroyed. This is the true natural history of Popery as a spiritual system. It came from Rome, and is connected with Rome, but strikes down its roots in Ireland, in England, in Scotland. It lives, a poisonous plant, on the corrupt affections of human hearts, wherever its finds them. The collapse of the Papacy as a visible monarchy in Italy will probably weaken the system throughout all its members, and give us an advantage in the conflict ; but Popery will not be destroyed until the grace of God shall have cast out this, and with it every other unclean spirit, from its home in human hearts.

2. Turning now westward, the American civil war meets and fills the eye, to the exclusion of all others, in the panorama of the past year, like a huge mountain standing on the plain, and touching with its top the sky.

Let the oppressed go free, said God in his Word, and by his providence, to the American States, as loudly and clearly as to the king of Egypt when Israel were captives there. The American taskmasters hardened their hearts like the king of Egypt : and now, after many preliminary plagues, an open sea has closed and overwhelmed a mightier host than that which pursued the fugitive Hebrews. A wail, like that of Rachel for her first-born, has gone up from each American home, for sons and brothers slain. The land has been converted into a place of tears.

Why ? What power moved those mighty hosts ? What was the cause of the war ?

In human breasts, both North and South, many motives moved and twisted and hissed like living serpents : but the cause of causes,—the one true origin of the war,—was slavery. God, who reigns on the throne of the world, would no longer bear ; the decree had gone forth that the foul spot should be wiped from his fair creation. The fears and hopes, the pride and other passions of men, were employed, as the flaming fire and stormy wind are employed as instruments in accomplishing the grand design. We have lived to see the end of the Lord in these commotions. Every bond is broken, and an oppressed race of four millions is this day free.

I am well aware that many in this country said, the North did not go to war in order to give liberty to the slaves ; and that, as their motives were not pure, they did not deserve success. True, the North did not draw the sword to abolish slavery. Matters were arranged by a higher Hand, so as to lay upon the slaveholders a far heavier condemnation. The election of Mr. Lincoln did not mean abolition of slavery ; it meant the permission of slavery and the maintenance of the slaveholder's rights, but the limitation of the system that it should not virtually rule the country and spread into new States. Right well did the leaders of the South know that the election of Mr. Lincoln implied not the abolition of slavery where it existed, but only the prevention of its diffusion into the opening regions of the West. The North did not make war on the South in the cause of the slaves, or in any other cause ; the South rebelled against the lawful government, not because their rights as slaveholders were threatened, but because they saw that they could no longer control the legislature, and so indefinitely extend the area of human bondage. The North took up arms to quell a rebellion, and preserve the integrity of the country. At the beginning of the war, a portion of the North desired to abolish slavery ; but a larger portion desired to maintain it. It was in the progress of the war that the North came to be united in a determination that slavery should wholly and for ever cease. It was for slavery that the South went to battle, and that in process of time compelled the North to go to battle against it. It was because the South made the support of slavery the central pivot on which their efforts turned, that the North, as the struggle progressed, found themselves under the necessity of making abolition their watchword. This they did as a nation, not from motives of humanity in order to give liberty to the blacks, but from the exigencies of a bloody war, in order to take a position face to face with the adversary. Thus it was the attitude assumed by the South that compelled the North to take their stand on absolute abolition. Had the rebellion been sooner and easier suppressed, the slaves would not have been set free. Thus the slaveholders, by the determination to keep the fetters on, became the instrument of breaking them off. It is not a new thing under the sun. It is the Exodus over again. The tyrant in ancient and modern times alike determines that he will yield nothing ; and that determination it is that in the end strips him of all. It is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in our eyes.

"Watchman, what of the night ?" Glad tidings of great joy from the West. Within the year that has passed away, the greatest civil war ever known in the world has ceased; and with its ceasing a nation of slaves, numbering four millions, goes out free. A great defiling blot is wiped away from this beautiful creation; and especially a stain is washed from the garments of the Christian Church, that marred her beauty and unnerved her arm. Perhaps in the end the greatest profit will accrue to the slaveholders themselves: for they will now be delivered from the fatal bias that led them to the Word of God in search of authority for their own tyranny, and so induced them to pervert it to their own destruction. Ah! if any man will—that is, is disposed in heart to—do His will, he shall know of the doctrine. The poor slaveholders, hardened by a hereditary exercise of an inhuman power, went to the Bible with a bent, and found there what they wished, rather than what they needed. Now they will be free. The emancipation of the masters is as precious as the emancipation of the slaves.

The difficulties are not over: the work is not done. The freed men and their families have suffered much, and in spite of every effort will suffer more ere the waters of that war-flood subside again within the wonted channels; but the difficulties that sprang from emancipation do not prove that slavery should have been let alone. When the gangrened limb is off, the patient is weaker than he was the day before; but now at least you may proceed in hope to apply restoratives. Before, nothing could be done for the negroes. Now everything done for them is a contribution towards raising a nation of downtrodden immortals to their place in the common brotherhood of our kind.

I hope there lingers not amongst us now much of that dubious sort of piety that resents a clear, full reference to emancipation, as unsuitable amongst the themes of the Lord's day, or the holy exercises of the sanctuary. If we suffer from muscular Christianity on one extreme, we suffer as much from sentimental Christianity on the other. Oh for the golden mean! What is the Gospel? Redemption from all evil,—redemption of the whole man, soul and body, and admission into the liberty of God's children. Slavery was man-stealing; it made marriage impossible,—made marriage a mockery; it kept God's Word hidden from human souls, that human bodies might be more docile as beasts of burden; and, to crown all, it impudently appealed to God's Word to sanction that wholesale violation of God's Law—that impious desecration of God's image.

Let those who think this a semi-secular subject, which should be excluded from sacred themes and associations, observe the work and listen to the Word of the Lord Jesus. A woman that had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up herself, came within his view. He laid his hands on her; and immediately she was made straight, and glorified God. When the Jews objected that this was introducing things secular among things sacred, He replied, with a glow upon his words, as if they flowed direct from a hot heart: "Ought not this woman, being a daughter of Abraham, whom Satan hath bound, lo these eighteen years, to be loosed?"

On the whole, the watchman's glance across the world should confirm our faith in God. "The Lord reigneth. Unto the upright light shall arise. He that believeth shall not make haste." Let us possess our souls in patience, and await the end of the Lord.

WILLIAM ARNOT.

REMONSTRANCE.

GOD! I am straiten'd sore,
I cannot bear much more;
Thou mad'st the flesh, and Thou dost know
That overstrain'd may be the bow—
All stringing o'er.

Christ! thou hast left me lone—
Am I not Then thine own?
The one sheep in the wilderness,
Thou lovest more—my Christ!—not less—
I am that one.

Though closed the door, I ween,
I'll pass my hand between,
And hold it wide—till Thou
In ruth say, "Come in now
To pastures green."

THE FIRST ASSURANCE IN THE TWENTY-THIRD PSALM.

CHRISTIAN assurance is a humble but firm sense of present acceptance with God in his Son Jesus Christ. Though a doctrine, which does not always receive the consideration it deserves from good and thoughtful men, it is so essentially bound up with our ideas of God and our interpretation of Scripture, it bears so directly on our daily religious life, whether held in sober cheerfulness or in ignorant presumption, in plain truth, it has so much to do with our happiness, our usefulness and our holiness, that on the threshold of a subject which cannot possibly be explained or understood without some reference to it, it may be well for us to try to think out what it really means. For we may regard it either with contempt, or with dislike, or with timidity, or with thankfulness. Those who regard all religious consciousness whatever as a hysterical pietism will of course ignore it as folly, or denounce it as fanaticism. With other arguments, from other standing points, we must approach minds like these. Dislike to it is commonly based on the supposed presumptuousness of venturing to interpret God's hidden purposes, and of taking the keys of the kingdom of heaven out of his hands into our own. Forgiveness, men may say, is not so cheaply, nor so hastily granted. There must be time to test the sincerity and to confirm the repentance. It dilutes the malignity of sin to make pardon too easy. It confers impunity on sinners, if we permit personal feeling to be the guarantee of the favour of God. At the close of life God may possibly reward a long penitence by the vision of his reconciled countenance; but really humbled men will be content to walk softly all their days under the shade of the cross, hoping for mercy when they die.

Those, again, who regard it with timidity, or a kind of softened distrust, mostly so regard it, not from any sense of inherent impossibility in God to forgive instantly or entirely, so much as from a real feeling (deepened, it may be, by a painful and long experience) of the deceitfulness of human nature, the shallowness of human feeling, and the weakness of human strength. It is not that they dishonour God by doubting his mercy, or misrepresent Him through ignorance of his word; but, knowing that they cannot deserve pardon, they fear they may fail to obtain it; confession with the lips is easy, with the heart is hard. Once more there are those who, grounding it on God's express revelation of Himself, both in his word, and in their own moral nature, unhesitatingly, intelligently, joyfully recognise it as the mainspring of their obedience and joy. They are careful indeed to distinguish between the rash religionism that asserts it to be necessary to salvation, and the sober experience that declares it essential to peace. They avoid almost with terror those mischievous exaggerations of it, which confound the deep convictions of the heart to which God has spoken, with the heated and emotional passionateness which dares to say, "I must be saved because I feel to be." Statements like these, by their offensive and revolting irreverence, have grievously caricatured the blessed truth hidden beneath them, and have scared cautious men from the very use of a word which seemed synonymous with antinomianism. It is not too much however to say that Christian assurance, both in the philosophical and Scriptural aspect of it, is one of the most reasonable positions in our theological system; and it rests impregnably on the three-fold foundation of the character of God, the teaching of Christ, and the nature of man.

The character of God, as it is revealed in this Psalm, and as the Saviour revealed it in the parable of the Prodigal Son, is that of a holy and tender Father, who Himself moves us to repentance, that his heart may be once more satisfied with our filial love—who not only accepts our confession, but anticipates it; for He not only welcomed the returning prodigal, but when "he was yet a great way off, saw him, and had compassion, and ran and fell on his neck and kissed him." The teaching of Christ is in harmony with the character of God. Though He was wont to make the pardon of sin of more importance than the healing of sickness, it was also his rule to accept at once the sorrow and repentance which He discerned to be genuine; and when He had forgiven men, to tell them so. "Thy sins are forgiven thee," whether to a sinful woman or a fallen apostle, was at once the letter and the spirit of his treatment of penitents. For, once more, He who had made man, knew what was in man. He who had taken upon Him our nature in all its completeness—sin only excepted, well understood how alienation and distrust sadden the soul and weaken it, how confidence and love brace and ennoble it.

Yes, the deepest foundation of Christian assurance is in the person and character of God. It is not so much what we are that we rest on, as what He is. He gives, and we receive. He declares, and we listen. He promises, and we believe. If our hearts deceive us, He is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things; but if we pray not to be deceived, if we love the truth and wish to know it, will He give us over to believe a lie? Indeed, if presumption and irreverence affect the subject at all, may they not be found quite as much in doubting if God means what He says, as in being over hasty to believe it? We do not see what we are doing in dwarfing the Divine perfections, so as to make them fit in with our puny notions, in supposing Him slow to forgive, because through ignorance and suspiciousness we are slow ourselves.

This Twenty-third Psalm is the Old Testament doctrine on this most blessed subject. In revealing the Person of God, in describing his relation to us under an endearing and familiar image, it teaches us to rest the hope of our salvation, not on our own changeful and erring frames and feelings, but on Divine Love. The New Testament tells us of three kinds of assurance: "the full assurance of understanding" (Col. ii. 2); "the full assurance of faith" (Heb. x. 22);

"the full assurance of hope unto the end" (Heb. vi. 11). Though sooner or later they almost imperceptibly blend into each other, there is nevertheless a real distinction between them, and in a logical order they approach and possess the soul. That order is plainly discernible in this Psalm. The last verse is the triumphant expression of the full assurance of hope unto the end: "Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life." The fourth verse is the calm utterance of faith in the very presence of death: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for Thou art with me." The first verse is a confession of the first assurance of a believing soul, its starting point in that knowledge of God which alone is eternal life: "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want."

Let us observe here three distinct ideas. The soul's discovery of God. Its discovery of God's personal relation to itself. Its confidence resulting from that discovery.

The discovery of God is the discovery of his name. In a sense God is his name. Here Jehovah calls Himself a shepherd, not for the first time, nor for the last. So Jacob had already called Him on his deathbed: "From thence is the shepherd, the stone of Israel" (Gen. xlix. 24). Thus Asaph addresses Him in prayer: "Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, thou that leadest Joseph like a flock" (Ps. lxxx. 1). Zechariah, approaching the advent, applied it to Messiah: "Awake, O sword, against my shepherd." In the New Testament, it is the title of the Lord Jesus. Of Himself the Saviour said, "I am the good shepherd." In the Hebrews we read of Him as "the great shepherd of the sheep;" and St. Peter, specially impressed it may be by the figure from having been himself thrice bidden to feed the sheep and the lambs, in one place describes the Lord as "the shepherd and bishop of our souls" (1 Pet. ii. 25); in another as "the chief shepherd" (1 Pet. v. 4).

Now when we think of the confused, ignorant, defective way in which many men think and speak of God, how thankful we should be for this blessed name, on which to repose our own hearts, under which to speak of Him to others. He is, indeed, the Almighty Maker of all things, who can create and destroy. Yet mere sense of power never made a penitent yet. To confine our notion of God to that of a mighty artificer, is to ignore his moral attributes and to place his redeemed creatures on the same level with the earth and the sea and the trees. Doubtless, also, He is a judge, who pulleth down one, and setteth up another. Yet if He is only this, what hope is there for us? sinful men must draw back in terror. The word shepherd draws us "with cords of a man" to one who can save as well as condemn, for it includes Knowledge, and Protection, and Provision, and Tenderness.

First, there is individual knowledge. In Europe, where a shepherd rules by fear, not by love, drives his flock in front of him instead of going first himself to show the way, it is hard to appreciate this. In the East it is far otherwise; to borrow the Saviour's words, "He calleth his own sheep by name, and leadeth them out; and when he putteth forth his own sheep, he goeth before them, and the sheep follow him, for they know his voice." Then the shepherd must protect his sheep, often at great risk to himself, always with labour and fatigue. In the snowdrifts of winter he must dig them out; in the heats of summer they would die of drought if he did not find them water; in the stormy wind and tempest he leads them under the cover of the sheltering hill. The wolf would come and scatter the sheep, if the shepherd were not ready to lay down his life for them. Provision is another feature in the office of shepherd, which will be more fully considered under another verse; and there is also tenderness. The shepherd knows his sheep, protects them, provides for them, not only because they are his property, and worth so much money, but because he loves them. This idea is beautifully brought out by Isaiah in reference to Christ,—"He shall feed his flock like a shepherd; He shall gather the lambs with his arms, and carry them in his bosom, and gently lead those that are with young." It has been strikingly observed, that in that wandering, dangerous life, where the shepherd and the sheep pass days and weeks together without seeing any other living creatures than themselves, there springs up a kind of friendship between the man and the brute. The shepherd feels a pitiful love to the dumb helpless creatures whom the Maker of man and beast has given into his hand. The sheep come at last to connect him with their daily food and safety, and in their way look up to him with a dependant grateful affection.

Such then being the office and qualities of a good shepherd, this illustration may help to show us, though in a very imperfect way, what Christ is to his Church. He knows his sheep, every one of them, from the least to the greatest. Each has his own name, each his own place in the family of God. "I know my sheep, and am known of mine." And He protects them. Not however, by securing them immunity from "the changes and chances" of life. It would be but a poor manifestation of Divine wisdom and mercy, to shelter us from that discipline of trial and sorrow by which the elect of God are trained for home. But in the temptations of Satan, whether they be doubts that undermine our faith, or sudden assaults that would take it by storm, or anodynes that send it to sleep, or allurements that enchant it, "the name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it and is safe." And He provides for them. The Son of Man who once taught us to say, "Give us day by day our daily bread," now hears that prayer, and Himself answers it from heaven. And as for love! How Christ can love, with all the strength of Godhead, with all the sympathy of manhood, let those try to say who have once felt it, let those believe who desire to know what it can be. The love of God is a boundless ocean, with neither breadth, nor length, nor depth, nor height; and while we timidly stand on the shore, and only suffer the rippling waves to cover our feet, instead of bravely plunging in, and trusting all our life, all our happiness to it, we can know but little of what it must be to saints and angels.

But the verse does not merely say, "The Lord is" a "shepherd," it says, "The Lord is my shepherd." This is a step further in the soul's discovery of God. If, as we have already seen, there are three kinds of assurance, and the assurance of understanding comes first; in this assurance of understanding again, there are two steps or growths of knowledge: one, the abstract discovery of what God is in Himself, the other the actual apprehension of what He is by those who love Him.

Now the former, so far from being necessarily connected with the latter, is often separated from it by a long and painful interval. Like a starving man gazing through a window on a well-spread board, at which he dare not go in to sit down, the soul that seeks God, but has not yet found Him, may appreciate with fatal distinctness the riches of his grace and the counsel of his love for others; and yet through seeing but not believing, may find its own burden only more insupportable than before. It reasons thus: I know what God is in Himself, and what He is to his people, but how can I induce Him to be all that to me? "Wherewith shall I come before the Lord, and bow myself before the High God." Clearly I must in some way obtain his love, whether by prayers, or alms, or sorrow. Who then shall tell me, when I have wept or prayed enough to pay up in full the purchase-money of my Redeemer's pity? When may I dare to say, as I hear others saying, "Jesus Christ is for me?" When will He say to me, as once He said to another, "Thy sins be forgiven thee?"

It is something indeed to have got so far as this, even to understand Christ's work, and to desire a share in it. Yet such a one only sees men as trees walking; and while looking through a mist at the letter of the Gospel, staggers heavily on under the burden of the law.

The next step, and that which alone completes our knowledge of God, is to say, "The Lord is my shepherd. I know both what God is in himself, and what he can be to his people, not from books, nor from hearsay, but simply from what he has himself been to me. I am not reasoning myself into what I ought to feel; I feel from what I possess, and what no man can take from me, for no man gave it to me. The Lord is my shepherd, for he has been a shepherd to me; not from what He has promised, but from what He has performed, I know in whom I have believed. And a blessed truth it is, when God the Holy Ghost writes it on the soul. The Saviour is mine, and I am his: all to me that a shepherd can be to a sheep, all to me that God can be to a creature. He thinks of me, He cares for me, He shelters me, He understands me. He is as much and as really mine as if I were at this moment with Him in heaven, faultless before the presence of his glory."

Once more, as the result of this discovery is the soul's confidence, "I shall not want." The positiveness of this sentence is as striking as its comprehensiveness. It is not the utterance of a prayer, it is the statement of a conviction; while memory unlocks the treasures of past mercy, hope reposes itself on the unchangeableness of God.

And if it is positive, it is "exceeding broad." "I shall not want." The Psalmist, we observe, did not even think it worth while to specify any of the things he was likely to want. Every need of his life seemed absolutely guaranteed to him as he rested under the wing of God. Security? "The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms." Provision? "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" Grace? "My grace is sufficient for thee." Love? That deepest, saddest, most unutterable, most insatiable of all the needs of man! When God can be faint or weary, when He can turn his face from the poor destitute in anger or scorn, when He can grow cold towards those whom He has loved, and redeemed, and called, then our doubts and fears may have some foundation. But to think that God can change, is to deny that He is God. "He hath loved us with an everlasting love, and with loving-kindness He hath drawn us."

Blessed, blessed truth of the sufficiency and faithfulness of God, if we would but let it possess our hearts. Whatever our needs, He can supply them, for He is God. He will supply them, for "God is love." Incessant as may be our wants, small and trifling as may be our cares, harassing and anxious, as with the manliest and strongest of us, this daily earthly life must sometimes be, the Son of God is still Son of Man. In his own human nature, glorified indeed, yet human still, human always, "He ever liveth to make intercession for us." "We have not an high-priest which cannot be touched with a feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are, yet without sin."

Let us believe, let us believe, and our joy shall be full. Let us honour God by trusting Him entirely.

Let us be as willing to receive as He is willing to bestow. Let us give Him the only thing in the world He cares for; the only thing we have to give Him worth giving; the only thing He will not take by force: for unless given freely it is worthless; the gift that He has Himself first given us, only it does not seem worth our looking at—even the heart; and then, not in a greater willingness on his part to bestow, but in a greater capacity on ours to accept, the Lord will be our shepherd. He will possess what He died to win; we shall be the dwelling-place of God.

Two thoughts more will tolerably complete this part of our subject. Christ is a shepherd for all who wish for Him. Christ is a shepherd for all possible conditions of place, and age, and time.

The former of these truths is good to kindle hope in hearts which have grown sick over the deferred conversion of children or friends, may even possibly stir a movement of faith and repentance in a soul now paralysed by the thought that it is cast away.

It is wonderful how fertile the human heart can be in inventing reasons why God should not save us; it is equally wonderful how the blessed Saviour anticipated all such reasons during his ministry on earth. Is it said, "I am lost?" "The Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which is lost." Is it said, "I can give no reason why God should save me, except that I wish to be saved?" "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters: and he that hath no money, come ye buy and eat: yea, come buy wine and milk without money, and without price." Is it said, "God requires faith, and to believe is just the one thing I cannot do, for I am full of doubts and difficulties?" "Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Is it said, either of one by himself, or by others about him, "There is no fear, no desire, no care about these things in that soul. Would there were—for then he might flee from the wrath to come. But now, how can we hope; what can we do for him?" The answer is, "That soul is redeemed, for Jesus died to save it. Wait and pray." The angel's message to the shepherds at Bethlehem is perhaps the fullest, freest Gospel ever preached to man. Learn it by heart. "Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ the Lord." Not a merited, not a purchased, but a born Saviour: not only for Jews at Bethlehem, but for all people everywhere: on whom the single claim for mercy is our lost humanity, with whom the only condition is "Come unto me."

And if the Word of God is not sufficient to give confidence—not through any doubting of its truth or blessedness, but through the inability of the soul to appropriate it to its own needs—two points still deserve to be suggested; for we know not "whether shall prosper either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good."

One of them is a fact, visible before our eyes everywhere, even the Church of God. As an external witness to the historical truth of Christianity, the mere existence of the Church, apart from any explanation of it, has yet to be appreciated at its full value. If Mahometanism is a testimony to the existence of Mahomet, Christianity is a monument to the memory of Christ. Our present object is, however, to consider it, in the person of its faithful and living members, as an evidence of the mercy of God. The Church, in one aspect, is a portion of redeemed humanity saved in Christ for ever; or, in St. Paul's account of it, it is the possession of Christ, already purchased by his blood, and presently to be redeemed from death in the resurrection unto life. And the question to ask is, If we behold here an evident purpose of God to save some, why, my brother, or my sister, should not that purpose extend to you? Why should not you be among those whom God will glorify? Why should you be shut out from the benefits of that Cross and Passion endured for the sins of the whole world? If no one has come from heaven to tell you that you are to be saved, no one has come to anyone else to tell them so. Certainly no one has come to tell you that you are to be lost. Even if you were a heathen, and had only just heard of Christ, that would be no bar to your salvation. Every man and woman on this redeemed earth may plead the Saviour's name with the Father who gave Him, and need not fear to plead in vain.

But to be in the Church of God is to have a special invitation to his mercy; and just as every circumcised Jew was justified in regarding himself as one of the peculiar people, so every baptised Christian may plead the name which is above every name, as the name by which he himself is called. Whatever may be the difficulties of belief, or the diversities of doctrine about holy baptism (and they chiefly spring from the silence of Scripture about the baptism of infants), if we believe anything about it, surely we must believe that it brings us into a nearer relation to God than we were before; that if it pledges us to filial obedience, it pledges Him to fatherly love; that if it is a responsibility, it must also be a privilege; that if it is a reality and not a mockery, it must be a sign of his readiness to save. Now, if any one doubts God's mercy towards him, or towards one He loves, let such a one, with all reverence, but with all simplicity and earnestness, plead this baptism with God. Let him say, "Lord, thou hast begun the work, wilt not Thou finish it? Thou didst look on me in favour, when I could not with my own lips pray to Thee. Now that I ask of Thee thy favour for myself, wilt Thou send me empty away? If I do not deserve thy mercy now, I did not deserve it then. Hast Thou kindled hopes only to disappoint them? Hast Thou taught me to call Thee Father, only to refuse to own me as a child? I ask for thy love and for thy grace, that I may walk humbly with Thee as a son with a parent. Not because I have a right to it, but because Thou hast promised it to them that ask Thee, give me thy free, thy full salvation."

Once more, the briefest glance at this Psalm may satisfy us, that it traces David's history over his entire life: and so far from being the sudden voice of a youthful enthusiasm, is the profound experience of grey hairs.

The Lord Jesus Christ is a friend for life. For all its seasons, whether youth, or manhood, or old age; for all its risings and fallings, its losses and gains, its joys and cares, his brotherly sympathy is ready, and entire and full. To wish to shut Him out of any part of our life, or any possession of our heart, or any crisis in our history, or any secret of our experience, is to grieve Him—is yet more to impoverish ourselves.

And if this is the area of our privilege, it is the condition of our peace. No doubt it is a solemn thing, if we adequately grasp it, to take the Lord Jesus Christ with us wherever we go, to surrender to Him whatever we possess, to consult Him in whatever we do. Yet life will be less frivolous if we try to live it under His eye. It need not be less happy, for He who gave his presence at the marriage feast in Cana recognises and sanctifies all human and innocent joy. "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want:" here is at once our safeguard, our dignity, our gladness. How can we fear anything, how can we miss anything, when God and Christ are ours?

FLORAL AND BOTANICAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE HOLY LAND.

Sometimes even now the desert rejoices and blossoms as the rose. Clouds are rare, welcome like that little one detected from Carmel's top, the harbinger and the pledge of the coming rain, as it rose from the western sea. But when there is a shower, when some straggling thunder-clouds, which have wandered out of their ordinary course, descend on the parched sands in life-giving drops, they pour forth, but do not waste "their sweetness on the desert air."

Such a shower it was once our lot to witness in the southern desert. Even after a drought of many months, the desert of Judæa, though sea-like in its vastness and its silence, is by no means without vegetable life. Herbs and shrubs of many species—brown or sandy in colour, dwarf, or rather microscopic in foliage, all inconspicuous and shabby in appearance, but highly aromatic when bruised or crushed—stud the surface, sometimes in groups, sometimes almost in a carpet, but more frequently sparsely scattered. The camels of the Kâabineh and other southern tribes here find abundant pasturage, or rather they browse on the bushes and crop them into dense rounded tufts. The inside of these shrubs soon collects the sand, and gradually forms a cone, which, matted by the fibrous roots, resists the wind, and breaks the sweep of the sand storms. The brightest of all the shrubs, the only one whose colour contrasts with the soil from which it springs, is the Salicornia or soap plant, the red and green stems of which afford support to myriads of chalky-white snails, which, clustering in tufts, present the effect of a sheet of snowy bloom. Strangely out of place in so dry and thirsty a land seemed the sea-gulls, which hovered over-head or stalked among the bushes; nor could we account for their presence till we observed that they, recognising the mollusc as their food in the wilderness as well as in the sea, had come to pasture on these desert shell-fish.

But in twenty-four hours after the rain, all this was changed. Tiny cotyledons pushed up from the sand. Bulbs sent out their tall leaves, and scented labiate flowers began to exude, in blue, red, or yellow buds, from the dry twigs of the scrub. Several species of mignonette appeared in straggling tufts, and the air was perfumed with the odour of a sweet stock, with crimped and fringed petals (Mathiola odoratissima). Here and there the nibbled and stunted shrubs pushed delicate white or pink papilionaceous blossoms from under the shelter of their bristling prickles, which proclaimed, by their shape, their kindred to our furze and broom, the desert Astragali. From under the loosest sand there shot up the long stalks of various species of garlic, which had scarcely breathed the air before they unfolded their flowering tufts, and betrayed by their unmistakeable scent the family to which they belonged. In two or three days more, the bulbs opened their cup-shaped flowers; the saffron alluded to in Cant. iv. 14, a small crocus with its blue petals delicately veined with white, as well as another species closely allied to the familiar yellow crocus of our gardens. It seemed as though the powers of nature in the desert were constantly held in hand, ready to burst forth at the gentlest call in all their vigour. Another week, and all was over. The bulbs were in seed, the shrubs had formed their tiny pods, and the little leaves of the scented stock looked as though they would have drooped, had they not been too stiff.

Here and there, by the rare wells in the desert, a few clumps of palm-trees remain, nourished like the righteous by unseen moisture (Psalm xcii. 12), and recalling the once carefully counted threescore and ten palm-trees of the wells of Elim (Ex. xv. 27). We were told too of another tree sometimes to be found in the rocky dells, but with which we did not ourselves meet, the "Thuya," a species of juniper—probably the thyine tree of Rev. xviii. 12, yielding an ebony-like, hard, and odoriferous wood. One bush we did observe, which recalls the expressions of Jeremiah, concerning the "man who maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord": "He shall be like the heath in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh" (xvii. 6). Again, "Flee, save your lives, and be like the heath in the wilderness" (xlviii. 6). The Hebrew "'Arad" is exactly represented in the vernacular Arabic, and applied to the savin juniper bush (Juniperus sabina), a dwarf species, which occasionally struggles out from between the chinks of the rocks in the desert wadys, gnarled, stunted, and gloomy-looking. In forcible contrast to the shrub of the arid desert, is "the man that trusteth in the Lord. He shall be as a tree planted by the waters" (Jer. xvii. 8.)

As we approach Beersheba we leave the dry chalky plains, strewn with flints, and enter upon rolling downs, with gently rounded hills, which can scarcely claim the epithet of grassy, but still have a greenish hue. In the wide hollows which have been scooped out by rivers long since extinct, the wandering Bedouin have scratched various irregular patches, and sown them with barley, just now (in January) beginning to shoot. The scenery was prairie rather than desert, without a tree, or bush, or one distinctive feature to mark the landscape. But the plants were lovely. We pitched our tents amidst a meadow of mallow, near the wells—to the delight of our horses and mules, but to the evident dissatisfaction of the grumbling camels, who preferred the dried and aromatic herbage of the desert. A natural parterre surrounded us: three or four species of Malva, a bright marigold (Chrysanthemum coronarium), the asphodels, the familiar grape hyacinth of our English gardens (Muscari racemosum), calendulas, purple scorzoneras, and blue anchusas, scented stocks, and, above all, the small "Star of Bethlehem" (Ornithogalum Arabicum), helped to paint this flower-bed of the wilderness. Yet here, too, destruction played its part. The pretty bulbs, and the branching asphodels were not allowed to seed undisturbed. Many a rough furrow marked where the wild boar out of the forest had been rooting up the fragrant dainty (Psalm lxxx. 13); and many a time did the boar unconcernedly cross our path in this open land, where the absence of cover seemed to render him indifferent to observation.

And now we were crossing the "South Country," or "Negeb" of Judah, a region as distinct in all its physical characters from the desert to its south, as it is from the hill-country to the north. It was the home of the Prophet Amos, the country from which his idioms and illustrations are drawn; and which can only be fully appreciated by keeping clearly before the mind the physical features of this portion of Judæa. It is a pastoral, grassy country in winter and spring, and studded with a profusion of flowers. Besides the crocuses, which continued to increase in number and variety, blue, white, and yellow, there was a lovely little ixia (Ixolirion montanum), which we also found peeping from under the edge of the snow on Mount Hermon, a small narcissus, a Gasteria (?), several bright star-like Scillas, a Frittilaria, an iris, and in abundance, conspicuous by its beauty, the Tulipa gesneriana (?). There was also an Eryngium and Lotus Arabicus. The grasses, too, were as varied as the flowering plants; but these I will not venture to name. Probably the season was too early for the pheasant's eye (Adonis), the ranunculus, and the anemones, which are the true floral glories of Palestine, and which we found everywhere else in the greatest profusion. I must not omit a pretty little creeping plant, Paronychia argentea, with silvery trailing runners, conspicuous on every dusty, trodden path, and gathered by the Arabs and dried to serve as a substitute for tea.

Amidst all this profusion of flowers scarcely a single tree varies the outline of the horizon throughout the whole south country. Well might it be marked as an event, when Abraham planted a grove at Beersheba, a clump of terebinths, to afford shade and refreshment at the wells he had digged. Now, not only every tree, but every shrub has long since been uprooted for fuel—a most precious commodity in this bare and open country. Abraham's grove was of terebinths, the real oak of Mamre; and, indeed, in most passages in our version "terebinth," and not "oak," is the correct rendering. A few still remain, preserved by religious feeling, as marking the burial place of some Mohammedan saint or sheikh. Among these is not the oak of Abraham at Mamre, which has long since disappeared, and for which a true oak, the ever-green holm oak (Quercus pseudo-coccifera), has been substituted. Many a Scripture incident comes vividly back to memory as we rest for our noon-day halt under one of these oaks or terebinths of the south country. Under such a terebinth the Angel of the Lord sat when he came to Ophrah to call Gideon to the deliverance of his nation (Judges vi. 11). Under such an one the man of God made his fatal halt, and was thence led back to Bethel by the lying prophet (1 Kings xiii. 14.). The little pyramid of stones, and the fluttering rags on the gnarled boughs, while they mark the grave of the desert sheikh, remind us that when an honourable resting-place was sought for the bones of Saul, and Jonathan his son, it was under the terebinth in Jabesh (1 Chron. x. 12).

When we began to pass from "the south country" or "Negeb" to "the hill country" (Luke i. 65) marked indeed was the change from easy, smooth tracks, over gently-rolling downs, to rocky, slippery paths, up and down narrow valleys, between rugged hills full of caves. As we saw the little scraps of corn cultivation here and there in the nooks, and our horses sprawled about over the rocks, the question of Amos, himself an inhabitant of the south country, came home to us full of meaning: "Shall horses run upon the rock? Will one plow there with oxen?" (vi. 12.) The plants were rapidly changed. The desert bulbs, the garlics and ixolirion, gave place to the more familiar species of southern Europe. Many bushes were making a vigorous struggle for existence on the scanty soil of the hill sides. The prickly oak, kept down by the continual browsing of the goats to the size of a shrub, was the predominant plant. Here and there were some scattered trees; the terebinth was not unfrequent, the lentisk was very common with its dark foliage; and, more sombre still, the solid-looking boughs of the carob or locust-tree (Ceratonia siliqua) occasionally stood out conspicuous above the others, inviting the wayfarer to rest under its dense shade. Under such a tree the Prodigal Son sat and mused over his wasted life, and, as he gnawed its bean-like pods, on which the swine around him were greedily feeding, with the cravings of unsatisfied hunger the pangs of remorse and penitence wrung his soul.

Here and there the myrtle-tree was coming-up instead of the briar (Is. lv. 13), as it did in the days of Nehemiah, when the people went forth to the mount to fetch myrtle-branches to make booths (viii. 15), and its fragrant white blossoms were already beginning to burst forth. The bright red bark of the strawberry-tree (Arbutus andrachne) was occasionally conspicuous; and every here and there the yellow blossoms of several species of broom (Genista) varied the colouring of the thickets.

Among these hills the ruins of the ancient cities of Judah, desolate and without inhabitants, crowded each other fast and thick; long archways, tunnels and caves, store-pits, walls, and olive-presses, and the adapted dwellings of the ancient Horites or dwellers in caves, overgrown with nettles six feet high (Urtica pilulifera), compared with the sting of which our English nettle has a velvet touch. "Thorns shall come up in her palaces, nettles in the fortresses thereof." (Is. xxxiv. 13.) "The pleasant places for their silver, nettles shall possess them." (Hos. ix. 6.)

The ground carpet of the hill country, wherever not absolutely choked, is in early spring most lovely and varied. From among the roots of every bush, from out of every chink and crevice in the rocks, often with the greater part of its tubes protruding and exposed, peers forth the lovely Cyclamen latifolium, with its tufts of recurved blossom of every shade of hue, from purest white to deepest lilac and purple. Varying in colour, in size and form of leaf, and in habit of growth, the Palestine cyclamen has been divided into many species, but which, I believe, are mere varieties from situation and soil. Next in abundance were the anemones, lilac, white, and red, most generally a brilliant scarlet (Anemone coronaria), the plant which, as the most brilliant, the most conspicuous in spring, and the most universally-spread of all the floral treasures of the Holy Land, has been with reason taken to be the "Lily of the Field" of our Lord's discourse. Certainly if in such wondrous richness of bloom any one plant can claim pre-eminence, it would be the anemone, the most natural for our blessed Lord to pluck and seize upon as an illustration, whether walking in the fields or sitting on the hill side. Almost a rival of the anemone in brilliancy, though less common and smaller, was the scarlet Ranunculus asiaticus; and in the open, the large pheasant's-eye (Adonis palestina). All these abound round the Holy City, not least on the Mount of Olives.

Cultivation changes, but not to any great degree, the character of the wild flowers. The bulbs become scarcer in the olive-yards and vineyards of Hebron and Bethlehem, with the exception of the slender and graceful Gladiolus segetum and Byzantinus, and the beautiful Iris caucasica; but annuals are infinitely more abundant, and those travellers who have only visited Judæa and central Palestine at the ordinary season of April and May can have little idea of the brilliancy of the olive-yards and bare hill-sides in February. Most conspicuous are the various flaxes or linums, yellow, white, blue, and red, especially the pink L. sibthorpianum and the yellow L. flavum. Very beautiful and very abundant, but very transient in its glory, was a little pink lychnis, which spread a glowing sheet of rose under the shade of the olive-trees for a week, and then passed away; a delicate soap wort (Saponaria vaccaria), pimpernels, red, yellow, and blue, opening in large tufts to welcome the noon-day sun, pinks (Dianthus and Silene), both genera in great variety of species, though not sufficiently crowded to give a character to the botany.

The olive is still the true wealth of the hill country, and is more or less cultivated from Hebron to the roots of Lebanon, "A land of oil olive" (Deut. viii. 8); but in order to secure a full and regular harvest, it is necessary to dig but not to crop the soil in which it grows, a maxim which is often neglected by the present inhabitants, while a heavy tax per tree discourages the extension of its cultivation. It is often said to be a gloomy tree, but in early spring the pale blue sheen of its foliage in the sunlight, dappled with its tiny blossoms, is most pleasing and refreshing. It is forty years in reaching maturity, and has a power of renewing its youth by forming fresh wood, and as it were, a new stem within its decayed and hollow trunk, which renders it probably the most long-lived of trees, and makes the tradition that the celebrated olive-trees in the garden of Gethsemane have survived the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, far from improbable. They are the most venerable-looking trees in the land, and resemble those of the old olive-yards near Carthage, which there is not the slightest reason for suspecting to have been ever renewed by man since the destruction of the Roman power in Africa.

Unlike the olive, the vine has not retained its ancient pre-eminence in the land. This arises partly from the greater care required in its cultivation, and chiefly from the prohibition of wine among the Moslems. The blessing of Judah was "Binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass's coat unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes: his eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk" (Gen. xlix. 11, 12); but now "the boar out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it" (Psalm lxxx. 13). Few are the vineyards that lingera mong the ruined terraces of the Judæan hills. There are a few, and these are rapidly increasing in the environs of Jerusalem; many about Bethlehem, where a delicious white wine is made by the Christian inhabitants, and a few among the Christian villages of the passes of Benjamin and Ephraim. Elsewhere the cultivation of the vine is scarcely to be noticed, till we reach the slopes of Hermon and Lebanon. But one spot of patriarchal memory yet retains its ancient features. We read that the spies sent by Moses "came unto the brook of Eshcol, and cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes, and they bare it between two upon a staff" (Numb. xiii. 23). Still the fruitful valley of Eshcol is devoted to the cultivation of the vine, and its branches are of extraordinary size. This great bulk and weight of the individual branches is partly artificial, caused by pruning and thinning, and partly a peculiarity of the Syrian vine. The grapes of Eshcol, being now the property of Moslems, are used for making sweet syrups and raisins, instead of for wine; and the ancient wine vats and presses may be seen disused, hewn out of the rocks by the way side.

With the vineyard is generally combined the fig-tree, which, though rarely having exclusive plots devoted to it, is planted everywhere in the corners, pieces of waste, or over the walls (where its shade is not only grateful, but valuable), or against the terrace walls. To sit every man under his fig-tree not only conveyed the idea of peace, security, and protection, but the large leaves and dense foliage render its shade among the most effectual of the trees of the East. The first fig-trees we met with on our entrance from the south, and indeed the first trees of any kind, were a group of fig-trees overhanging and concealing a well at Tell Hhora, not far from Beersheba. The celebrated well of Gennesaret, Ain et Tin, derives its name from its fig-tree; and what wanderer from the far West cannot recal his many noontide halts by the wayside well or pool, under the fig-tree's shade?

The mulberry is one of the few plants the cultivation of which has increased since Scripture times, owing to the introduction of the silkworm. In the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and alongside the track to Nablous, the mulberry now mingles with the vine and the fig-tree, the least graceful, but commercially the most important of all; and in the Lebanon it is the staple support of the industrious mountaineers. It is only once mentioned in Scripture, and the appropriateness of the translation has been justly called in question (2 Sam. v. 23). Its fruit is so poor and insipid, that before the introduction of silk-culture the tree could be of little value.

The same botanical features mark the whole central country till we reach the plain of Esdraelon. All is fresh and green in December and January, bright and spangled in February and March, rich and golden in April, scorched, withered, burnt by June. Of ferns there are very few south of the Lebanon. But who that has visited the pools of Solomon, or the pool of Siloam, can forget the tresses of maidenhair fern, Adiantum capillus-veneris, which festoon the moist sides of every well and cave? In many a niche of the rocks, a little tuft of the ceterach (C. officinarum) may be detected with brown and cottony fronds, and in a few of the more shady valleys we gathered the dwarf Cheilanthes fragrans. The place of ferns in the dry climate of Palestine is supplied by many wall plants, some of which have been supposed to be the hyssop that springeth out of the wall; though the weight of argument seems to incline to the caper plant, which is rare in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. These wall plants abound particularly about the enclosure of the Haram, the ancient Temple area, and among them a small blossoming ranunculus (R. myriophyllus), a mignonette (Reseda suffruticosa), Hyoscyamus aureus, very common, Anchusa italica, and many boraginous plants. Several species of Onosma were very beautiful, and few of our cultivated species could surpass these and the labiates in beauty, during the short period of their flowering.

When from Jerusalem we descend to Jericho, "the city of palm-trees," a very different flora meets us. Our climate and productions are more completely changed than in the journey from England to Italy. During the first part of the ride across the bleak wilderness of Judæa, the characteristic plants are the leguminous, especially the astragali, the mints and thymes, the borages, and the labiates. No shrubs exist, unless the little Poterium spinosum deserves the name. The perfume of the thymes and the hum of the bees remind us that we are in a land "flowing with honey," in that very wilderness where John the Baptist fed on locusts and wild honey. The prevailing type of insect life is still the orthopterous, or locust tribe. Locusts and grasshoppers with wings of every colour—red, blue, green, yellow, brown and white, start up at every step, and with their harsh grill almost drown the soothing hum of the bees. The common wild bee of the wilderness is the same as the domesticated species, Apis ligustica, and very closely allied to our hive bee. The aromatic desert herbs supply it with abundant material for its stores, and many of the Bedouin earn their subsistence by hunting the wild bees' nests in the rocks, and selling the honey in Jerusalem and Jaffa. "With honey out of the stony rock would I have satisfied thee."

When the deep valley of the Jordan has once been reached, 1300 feet below the sea level, as Jerusalem is 1780 above it, all is changed. True, the palm-tree from which Jericho derived its name and wealth (Deut. xxxiv. 3), waves no more its feathery crown over the plains. We found but one lingering clump several miles further down. There are no straggling balsam-trees in the wild and thorny tangle to recall the memories of the rich gardens of Herod and Cleopatra, or perhaps of Solomon himself. "I am come into my garden. . . I have gathered my myrrh with my balsam" (Cant. v. 1). The former cultivation of the sorghum or sugar-cane ("Thou hast bought me no sweet cane with money:" Is. xliii. 24) yielded a princely revenue to the crusading knights of Jerusalem, and its importance is yet attested by the ruined pile of sugar mills; but no sweet cane springs up by the water courses among the brakes of bamboos. Yet the vegetation is still exuberant, fed by the copious and never-failing supplies from the Prophets' Fountain, which percolate through the plain in little artificial rills for several miles. The blessing of Elisha has healed the waters unto this day—"Thus saith the Lord, I have healed these waters; there shall not be from thence any more death or barren land" (2 Kings ii. 21).

Where Herod's city stood on the road to Jerusalem was once an avenue of palms and sycamores (Ficus sycamorus), and we found two aged sycamore fig-trees in the ravine to the south of the city, in illustration of the Gospel narrative when our Redeemer halted under the sycamore-tree and bade Zaccheus come down and receive him at his house. The sycamore or sycamine fig-tree is very different from our sycamore, and is a near relative of the Banyan-tree of India, very easy to climb, with large forked lateral branches, a true fig-tree, but bearing a worthless fruit, insipid and woody. Such were those figs in the second basket in the Prophet Jeremiah's vision, which he pronounced to be "very naughty figs, which could not be eaten, they were so bad" (xxiv. 2); apt emblems of the rejected Zedekiah and his people.

The most abundant trees were the small Jujube tree (Ziziphus Spina-Christi) or thorn tree, the Nubk of the Arabs, and the fine large variety or Dôm-tree. It derives its botanical name from the tradition that of its boughs was plaited the crown of thorns. The fruit is a bright yellow berry, of which the crop is enormous and long-continued, of a pleasant subacid flavour, the food of Arabs, dormice, and birds, which congregate here in myriads. The foliage of these trees was often varied by large tufts of the parasitic Loranthus indicus, the bright and tropical-looking blossoms of which hung in crimson festoons from the topmost boughs of the thorn-trees. The wild olive (Elæagnus angustifolius), and more abundantly the false balsam-tree, Balanites ægyptiaca, by their deep green foliage pleasantly relieved the paler hue of the thorn-trees. From the large olive-like fruit of the latter, the Zukkûm of the natives, an oil is extracted and sold to the pilgrims as the Balm of Gilead. The castor-oil plant (Ricinus officinalis) flourishes by the side of the stream, and becomes a goodly shrub. The false Sodom apple (Solanum sanctum), with blue potato-like blossom, and bright yellow fruit balls on its prickly stem, together covered the ground and mingled its thorns with the spring Paliurus aculeatus. The pretty Vitex agnus castus united with the gorgeous oleander (the true "willow by the water courses" of Scripture) to form a perfect tangle in the moister ground, the winter quarters of many a little bird familiar to our English gardens in summer, warblers, whitethroats, and nightingales, which here made acquaintance with the sun-birds and the bulbuls of the tropics.

When from the oasis of Jericho we turn our steps towards the mountain behind, known as the Mount of Temptation, we are at once in a tropical desert. Here we found a very singular and local plant, the rose of Jericho; not, however, that alluded to in in Ecclus. xxiv. 14, "I was as a rose plant in Jericho," but the Anastatica hierochuntina, a tiny ligneous cruciferous plant, with leaves and blossoms so inconspicuous that it is scarcely possible at first sight to recognise it among the sand, but which possesses the curious quality, when plunged into water, of expanding and opening its petals months after it has been gathered. In the clefts of the rocks here we gathered for the first time the true hyssop (Capparis ægyptiaca) in blossom. Nothing can be in more startling contrast with the scorched and scathed rocks to which it clings, than the brilliant green hue of its thick foliage and the delicate pink of its large but fragile blossoms. It may well, from its pure colour and appearance, as well as from its being a plant of the Sinaitic desert, be the hyssop of Moses in the law, and that to which, springing out of the wall, the botanical knowledge of Solomon extended; but it scarcely seems, from its form and fleshy foliage, appropriate as the hyssop on which the sponge was placed and offered to our Lord during his crucifixion. Any other plant used in purification, as, for instance, the rue, might have been so termed.

When, from Jericho, we ride down to the Jordan, we find among the trees on its banks several which occur incidentally in Scripture story, as the tall poplar (Populus Euphratica); not one of our species, but similar to them (Gen. xxx. 37); most luxuriant willows (Salix octandra), not, however, the willow of Scripture, which is the oleander; and, commonest of all, the tamarisk-tree, not mentioned in Holy Writ, but very characteristic of the banks of the southern Jordan, as well as of the neighbourhood of the Dead Sea. All the species are very graceful when in flower, their waving catkins covering as with a gauzy veil the deep green foliage beneath.

When, from the Jordan, we penetrate to the recesses of Engedi and to the south end of the Dead Sea, we still find new and unfamiliar flowers mingled with some well known in story, but rarely seen by the ordinary traveller. Thus, at Engedi, besides the scattered tamarisk-trees, were many gnarled old acacias, the true seyal or shittimwood of the desert, the traditionary burning bush, as being the only timber tree of Sinai, and the undoubted material of the tabernacle in the wilderness. The seyal is a weird-looking tree, yet, when its blossom covers the "yellow-haired acacia," not without a certain beauty; but its form and growth seem always to tell of a hard struggle for life against unkindly fortunes. Here, too, for the first time we met with the Osher, or true Sodom apple (Calotropis procera), a shrub rather than a tree, of the Asclepiad family, with bark light and thick as cork, wrinkled and furrowed, and huge glossy leaves, from which, when broken or punctured, a flow of acrid milk was discharged. The blossoms are like a small magnolia, and the fruit, which it bore at the same time, like an orange in shape and size, of a golden yellow, soft to the touch, but if ripe, cracking like a puff-ball when slightly pressed, and containing only a long thread of seeds on a half-open pod, winged with a tuft of silky filaments.

The bright green hyssop clung to the cliffs above, and the colocynth, the wild gourd of 2 Kings iv. 40, straggled over the gravel near the shore. Its tendrils run along for many yards, and the fruit looks like a ripe melon, tempting both in appearance and odour. Nothing could be more natural to one not familiar with the plant than to make the mistake of Elisha's servant, and to gather it as a melon. This colocynth still exists about the plain of Jordan, near Gilgal, but was scarcely likely to be known by a man from the upper country. Of the vineyards of Engedi nothing remains save the arid and calcined terraces, with the cemented cisterns and water-courses; and even the camphire recorded by Solomon—"My beloved is unto me as a cluster of camphire in the vineyards of Engedi" (Cant. i. 14)—is all but extinct. In one or two sheltered nooks remain a few bushes of this pretty shrub, with branches of pinkish white blossom shedding a pungent aromatic perfume around. To botanists it is well known by the name of Lawsonia alba, but many readers of the Canticles may not be aware that the camphire of Scripture is identical with the "henna" of oriental commerce, the indispensable requisite of the toilet of the harem, with which every lady, old or young, paints her eyebrows and fingers. "Though thou rentest thy face (Hebr. eyes) with painting, in vain shalt thou make thyself fair" (Jer. iv. 30).

But the most attractive shrub (at least at Christmastide) which Engedi produces is the graceful retem (Retama monosperma), a near relative of our brooms, with long pendant branches of small pink flowers, and minute foliage, growing sometimes to the height of ten or twelve feet. This is the tree mentioned in 1 Kings xix. 5, as the juniper (rothem), under which Elijah lay and slept in the wilderness. Of old, as now, it was considered to yield the best charcoal ("Sharp arrows of the mighty, with hot burning coals"—lit. "coals of retem": Ps. cxx. 4); and its bark can be used to support life in times of extremity, whence Job speaks of those who cut up mallows by the bushes and juniper roots (roots of retem) for their meat as the most miserable of the outcasts.

It was at Engedi, also, that we first found the Salvadora persica, a tropical tree, which, because it bears a pungent seed, has been by some set down as the mustard-tree of our Lord's parable. But it is a tree exclusively in Palestine confined to the hot seething recesses round the Dead Sea; it never could grow in the upper country, and could not have been familiar to the people of the land. The mustard of our Lord's parable must have been a common plant, and it must have been a garden herb. It is therefore wholly unnecessary to travel beyond the common mustard (Sinapis nigra), which at a later period of the year we saw overrunning the fields of the country, just as the wild mustard overspreads our corn-fields in England. There is not a word in the New Testament about the birds building their nests in the mustard-tree, only that they "lodge" or perch in it, which they certainly do in the common mustard—there a much larger and more vigorous plant than here.

The flora of the south end of the Dead Sea is different again from that of its western shores. But on all sides of it the soap plant (Salicornia fruticosa) and salsolas of two species abounds; alluded to in Jerem. ii. 22: "Though thou take thee much sope, yet thine iniquity is marked before me, saith the Lord;" and by Malachi, "He is like a refiner's fire and like fuller's sope" (iii. 2.) The Bedouin burn it for alkali or soap, as kelp used to be burnt on the Scottish coasts; and it is interesting to note that its Arabic name is "kali," from which of course our "alkali" originates.

The ground carpet which is in its full glory in January, introduces us at once to the flora of Arabia, and of Nubia. We found eighty-two species in blossom in that month, and with the exception of a few weeds of almost world-wide distribution, none of them were European; but mostly Nubian, or Abyssinian, with a few Indian stragglers. In fact, just such a flora as we should expect in Arabia, lying between Africa and India; but geographically much nearer to the former. Richer still, but not varied in its shrubs and flowers, was the wide strip of watered land on the south-east of the Dead Sea, the "Ghor es Safieh," which has scarcely ever been penetrated by travellers, and where we saw butterflies of Nubian type, sipping the floral sweets in mid-winter, under a glowing sun, while sunbirds warbled, and thousands of Indian turtle-doves filled the air with their soothing murmurs. This region was the southern "Nimrim" of Moab (Isaiah xv. 6; Jer. xlviii. 34), beyond the furthest boundaries of Judah, with a climate as seductive, luxurious, and enervating as that of the northern Shittim at the other extremity of the sea. But this region is scarcely referred to in Holy Writ, beyond the allusions mentioned above to the verdure, the freshness, and the abundant waters of Nimrim. Let their "waters be cut off," and the herbage must wither and the plain be as desolate as the salt region, the lifeless Arabah to the south. While the Jordan valley is thus enjoying its floral summer, the mountain regions of Lebanon and Hermon are buried in snow; and Carmel, the glory of Israel, is bare and desolate. Each of these regions possesses a distinctive botanical character, and may be explored at different periods of the year; and it is to these districts especially that we must look for the flowers, and still more for the trees and shrubs, alluded to in Scripture. But for the present we must postpone plucking the almond of Carmel, roaming under the oaks of Bashan, or climbing to the cedar of Lebanon.

H. B. Tristram.

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.

In the effort to stamp out both the Fenian conspiracy and the cattle-plague with which England has been so much occupied during the winter and spring, it has become more and more apparent that each of these phenomena has a moral as well as a physical aspect, and that both of these aspects must be attended to, if the evils are to be effectually cured. In regard to Fenianism, it is becoming more clear that very little progress is made towards real victory, even by the arrest and punishment of all suspected or troublesome persons. A fact remains behind—more ominous than all Fenian organisations and risings—that even when they have left their native country, and risen to prosperity in a far-away land, Irishmen continue to cherish the most active hatred to the dominant classes in Ireland, and deem it wise and patriotic to contribute their money, to risk their freedom, and to peril their lives and those of their countrymen at home, in the endeavour to emancipate them from thraldom. The origin of this feeling, the causes, real or imaginary, to which it is due, and the manner in which it is to be dealt with, form the real problem of the Fenian conspiracy. Whether anything effectual will be done towards sweetening the breath of Irish society; whether the measures that may be proposed, while meant to conciliate, may not in the end increase the evil; or whether, the immediate danger being removed, the whole subject will not drop out of sight and out of mind, to be brought up, half-a-generation hence, in some far more aggravated form, are questions which every well-wisher of that interesting land is now anxiously putting, and which may well increase the fervour of our prayers for the Divine wisdom to guide those who are entrusted with the destinies of Erin.

In spite of Professor Tyndall, Mr. Cranbrook, and other masters of modern thought, the serious mind of the country has deliberately gravitated to the conclusion that there are moral elements so connected with the cattle-plague as to make a solemn and earnest appeal to the Heavenly Father the fit duty of his children in their time of perplexity and need. Account for the Rinderpest as we may, the Christian instinct of the nation has recognised in it one of those dark shadows which sin casts upon our world, and under which the evil fruits of sin rush up, with a force and rapidity that appal us. Agricultural possessions have generally been counted so much more certain than those of commerce, that the temptation to hold one's self independent of Providence has been peculiarly strong in the case of those whose wealth is in the solid soil. Here is a lesson that agricultural as well as commercial riches may take to themselves wings and flee away, and that no class in the community can be exempted from the obligation to pray meekly and humbly, "Give us this day our daily bread." If any should be disposed to fix the guilt that has called for this chastisement on the agricultural class alone, the principle that "if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it" comes in to correct the limitation. The Christian part of the nation has been regarding the cattle-plague in this light, in the exercises of humiliation and prayer that have been held in connexion with it. They have been trying to look on it as a national reproof and chastisement for abounding sin; and endeavouring to cherish the feeling, that it is of far more essential moment that the sins that have rendered it necessary should be forsaken than that the calamity should pass away if the sinful spirit remain.

The critical spirit of the age, so severe on every institution that rests in any considerable measure on traditional grounds, is ever apt to be excited against the sermons of the present day. Dean Ramsay, mainly through a single fact brought out in two recent lectures on preaching, has been the unwitting occasion of reviving the complaints which "Habitans in Sicco" and others used to urge so strongly three or four years ago. According to the calculations of Dean Ramsay, nearly four millions of sermons are preached annually from British pulpits. The fact has set some persons to speculate on the amazing disproportion between the labour applied and the results achieved by this extraordinary discharge of preaching artillery. It seems to be taken for granted that because there is a great amount of labour wasted in poor, feeble, inefficient sermons, the whole system must be essentially at fault. In such representations, little or no allowance is made for the nature of the case, or the difficulty of securing the results to which preaching is directed. It is impossible to secure that all preachers shall be efficient, or even to tell in every case when a preacher is efficient, and when he is not so. It is unfair to put preaching in the category of a mechanical craft, and to judge of it accordingly. Preaching is the chief means of awakening men to the true glory of their being, of bringing them to God, and of creating and renewing the spirit of faith and love; of reverential regard for the unseen; of self-control, self-improvement, philanthropy, and many kindred graces, that would have little or no influence without it. It is necessarily a somewhat indefinite art. That on the whole, in spite of all its defects, it succeeds better in achieving these results than anything else could, would probably be best seen if it were to be discontinued for a twelvemonth, and the Sunday evening lecturers of St. Martin's Hall were to occupy all the pulpits. The remarkable thing is, that notwithstanding all the sermons that church-going people hear as a matter of course, they are still capable of relishing more. Additional lectures announced, especially when they bear on topics that come home to the business and the bosom, command large assemblages. We may point to the instances of lectures recently delivered in Edinburgh and Glasgow, on some of the sceptical tendencies of the day. The lesson should not be lost on preachers, that the more their discourses are thus brought home to actual thoughts and feelings the more interest will they excite. Even in Berlin, notoriously a non-church-going city, such lectures are well attended. Under the auspices of the Evangelical Society a course is now going on in Berlin on such subjects as these:—Modern Infidel Views and Divine Revelation; the Nobility and the Church; the Liberal Tendencies in our Era; Inspiration; the Trinity; Romanism and Protestantism. As yet, at least, there is not much sign that the popularity or the power of the pulpit is to be numbered among the things that have passed away.

Efforts on behalf of the poor of London continue to be made, but great difficulty is felt in getting machinery brought to bear on existing evils, at all commensurate with their fearful magnitude. Among the Bills introduced into Parliament, one by Mr. Villiers provides for the relief of the casual poor; one by Mr. Childers proposes to enable the Public Works Commissioners to make advances towards the erection of houses for the working classes; and one by Mr. McCullagh Torrens has the same provision, but makes the erection of new houses compulsory when they are plainly required. Meanwhile, fresh glimpses are given of the moral and religious state of some districts where the working classes cluster. The Rev. J. McCrie, a missionary in connexion with Mr. Brock's congregation at Bloomsbury, lately observed: "In the district of one missionary, comprising but little over 100 houses, there were, among others, 350 fallen women. There were also eight public-houses, the value of which was measured by the poverty of the people. In the case of one, 17,000*l.* was paid by an incoming to the outgoing tenant on transfer. Almost in a ring fence about Seven Dials, where he (Mr. Mc C.) was accustomed to preach in the open air, to congregations as attentive as the present meeting, there were twenty-seven public-houses, whose annual takings were estimated at 46,000*l.* The social degradation and cruelty which the missionaries had to confront were fearful beyond description. Yet even among such as these the Gospel—not secularism or Sunday oratorios—was proving (as he showed by examples) the power of God unto Salvation. Yes! St. Giles's was changing and improving every day; old St. Giles's was ceasing to exist, and new St. Giles's was beginning to come."

A journal of some note in France, the "Etudes Religieuses, Historiques, et Litteraires," edited by the Fathers of the Company of Jesus, has been giving its readers some curious information respecting the movements of Dr. Pusey, and other friends of union with the Romish Church. The editors (according to the Paris correspondent of the Guardian) doubt whether, as they have been assured, that eminent "plenipotentiary of peace" has really at his back the majority of the Anglican Episcopate and the most considerable part of the English Church; nor do they regard the advances made towards communion with the Eastern Church as any indication of an advance to Rome. A correspondent of the "Etudes" in England dwells on the eminent services Dr. Pusey has rendered for the salvation of souls, especially by causing millions of heeetical infants to be purified, by real baptism, from the original taint of sin, and to become legions of angels in heaven. This correspondent thinks the present movement much more hopeful than the timid one of 1840, as "the re-establishment of [Roman] Catholic sacerdotal ornaments" in so many churches in England is expressive of "a complete profession of faith on the the eucharistic sacrifice." In a second paper the editors speak more despondingly, having regard to the severe judgment passed on the "Eirenikon" by the "Month," and confessing that the conversion en masse of the English Church would be "only short of a miracle, a real coup d'état of Providence." The correspondent in England thinks that the great difficulty in the way of the conversion of the Church is the hold which the Queen, Parliament, and ecclesiastical tribunals possess over it, and the low esteem in which baptism and ordination have been held. He regards Anglican baptism and ordination as null and void, and quotes the remark of a converted Anglican clergyman, who said of himself that "he was no more a priest than a horse." Dr. Pusey is held to be in error in separating the popular religious belief of the Church of Rome from its dogmatic teaching. Even the doctrine of Liguori that "by the intercession of the Virgin we may obtain every grace necessary to avoid evil and do good," is founded, it is said, "on the most solid theology." It is hoped by these people that Dr. Pusey will see his error in attributing to the Church views which are only the exaggerations of a few pious writers, and give up "that pretended popular system" which Dr. Newman has refuted in his recent letter. It is affirmed that Dr. Pusey's most earnest wish is, that Rome would speak out, and give the olive branch to eager Anglicans. It would appear that Rome is quite willing to give them the olive branch, and everything else, if only these Anglicans would accept her terms of "unqualified submission."

The readers of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE are familiar with the marvellous charitable establishments that have sprung into existence and prosperity at Laforce, in France, under the cherishing hand of that hero of faith and devotion, M. John Bost. (See Vol. I., p. 711.) Called some twenty years ago to be the pastor of a handful of godly people, who were virtually thrust out of the communion of the Reformed Protestant Church by the intrusion of a rationalist minister, M. Bost has made his little church the nucleus around which no fewer than five great charitable institutions have been gathered, La Famille Evangelique, Bethesda, Siloé, Eben-ezer and Bethel; where "the daughters of females of bad character, incurables, the infirm, the blind, the sick blind, the idiot, the imbecile, the epileptic from all parts of France and Switzerland," have received a kind and most Christian treatment. The labours of M. Bost in collecting funds for the erection and yearly support of these institutions, where more than 200 unfortunate beings find a home and Christian nurture, form one of the most interesting records of modern Christian enterprise. The time has now come when these institutions must be recognised by the State. All M. Bost's best friends are of this opinion. This is necessary, in order to have the title-deeds of the property rightly constituted according to the law of France. But in carrying out this arrangement for the charitable institutions, the chapel must be put on a separate footing, and in order to do this, the existing chapel is to be turned into dormitories, infirmaries and schools, and a new chapel of much larger size and of peculiar construction is to be built. It will be fitted up in such a way as to allow all the patients—the insane and epileptic included, to worship in it. Six apartments, separate from the body of the chapel, are to be prepared for them. They will see and hear the pastor, and join, says M. Bost, in singing praises to the Lord who made when on earth the sick, the poor, the lunatics, the objects of his tender care. The chapel is to cost £1500, and will hold 1000 persons. M. Bost has issued an appeal for £500, to which we cannot doubt the friends and admirers of his charities will most readily respond.

The year 1867, as our readers know, is proposed to be signalised at Paris by a Universal Exhibition. The commissioners have made a proposal of a gratifying kind, for recognising the efforts of missionary societies, in connexion with this exhibition. They have offered to the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society, under the charge of their committee, to grant accommodation for a general exhibition connected with all the Protestant Missionary Societies in Europe and America. The proposal is that the different Societies send all they deem calculated to give an idea of the religious, intellectual, and social condition of the nations among whom they labour; native implements, weapons, dress, and produce, both in agriculture and industry, before and since the introduction of Christianity; imitations, on a reduced scale, of their pristine and present dwellings; translations of the Bible, books, tracts; journals printed in the stations; works published by missionaries, especially on travels and philology; specimens of the writing of native converts in their respective languages, and those of Europe which they have learned; idols, and all sorts of curiosities; specimens which may throw light on points of natural history, &c. These proposals have been made to us (says the Paris Evangelical Missionary Society) in the most liberal spirit, and we hope they will meet with the approval of your committee. A precious opportunity is offered to Protestantism to show itself to the world in its missionary character, that cannot fail to create a most favourable impression on its behalf, and will be especially beneficial to visitors coming from the southern countries of Europe, and in general to the fractions of the Latin race who have hitherto remained ignorant of what we do for the spreading of the Gospel in the world. Although the room be common to all the Societies, and one general inscription on the entrance blend them together, the name of each Society shall be affixed to the part of the boards assigned to it. It is expected that the French Government will make arrangements with all steam companies to lessen as much as possible the costs of conveyance for all the exhibitors.

The approach of the time stipulated for the evacuation of Rome by the French garrison excites increasing, though in many instances suppressed, interest in the results by which that step will be followed. The belief prevails in many influential quarters that when the French leave there will be no conflict, because all classes at Rome will unite in seeking annexation to the kingdom of Italy. The speech of the leader of the advanced opposition, M. Jules Favre, in the French Chamber, on the Roman question, is said to have made a deep impression. Its conclusion is striking. In answer to the question, Whence came the regeneration of the Pagan world? (of whose despotism and degradation he had given a striking picture) he said:—"From a God born poor and in a manger, and twelve poor fishermen who taught his doctrine, but who had to aid them neither fleets, nor armies, nor capital, nor material agents, nor anything save the light of truth reflected from their own souls. Christianity, be assured, gentlemen, has entered upon its philanthropic phase, and is only strengthening itself by the light of science. Instead of barring the way to this development, open the door wide that it may make a new compact of alliance with the age; that they may be reconciled to each other, that the age may profit by the moral power of Christianity, and Christianity by the material power of the age, after first raising it to its own level. If such be your faith, as it is mine, humiliate it not by subjecting it to formalities which are in flagrant contradiction to it; offend not God by the supposition that his eternal doctrines can be subordinate to the errors and incidental passions of his creatures."

Whatever other effects the Roman question may have, it seems to be opening the eyes of many to the spiritual character of true Christianity, and its essential glory as a heavenly power, doing its work by the divine force of truth, love, and purity. Even the first Napoleon, in his conflict with the Pope, caught glimpses of this truth, although it seems to have produced in him but little fruit. The nineteenth volume of his correspondence, lately issued, shows the ideas he had on the subject when he made up his mind, in 1809, to overthrow the Pope's temporal authority. Although it was to serve his own ambitious projects that he caught at the idea of the spirituality of Christ's kingdom, he expresses himself on the subject with great point and force. In a letter to his Foreign Minister he says:—"Jesus Christ, born of the race of David, did not desire to be a king. The founders of our religion during centuries were not kings. There is no doctor of the Church, no historian of good faith, who will not admit that the temporal power of the Popes has been fatal to religion. 'My kingdom is not of this world,' said Jesus Christ; and by that doctrine He for ever condemned all blending of religious interests and worldly ambition. The interests of religion and those of the people of France, of Germany, and of Italy equally compel his Majesty to put an end to this ridiculous temporal power—the feeble remains of the extravagances of the Gregories, &c., who pretend to reign over kings, to give away crowns, and to have the direction of the affairs of the earth as well as those of Heaven." Again, writing to the Bishops of France on the 13th of July, he says, with a fling at Protestants and Calvinists, that shows how exclusively political his stand-point was:—"Our Lord Jesus Christ, though sprung from the race of David, did not desire a temporal reign; on the contrary, He desired that Cæsar should be obeyed in the administration of worldly affairs. He was animated only by one great object—the redemption and salvation of souls. As the inheritor of the power of Cæsar, we are resolved to maintain the independence of our throne and the integrity of our rights. We will persevere in the great work of the re-establishment of religion. We will encircle its ministers with the respect which only we can give them. We will listen to their voice in all that relates to things spiritual and to conscience. . . . We shall not be turned aside from the great object we aim at, and which we have in great part attained—the re-establishment of the altars of our religion—by disposing us to believe that its principles are incompatible, as the Greeks, the English Protestants, and Calvinists have pretended, with the independence of thrones and nations. God has enlightened us sufficiently to be on our guard against sharing such errors; our heart and those of our subjects feel no such fear. We know that those who would make the eternal interest of our conscience and of spiritual affairs depend on that of a perishable temporal authority, are strangers to the charity, the spirit, and the religion of Him who has said, 'My empire is not of this world.'"

If the present Napoleon shares these sentiments, it is likely enough that the destruction of the temporal power would be followed by special efforts on his part, as on the part of the Roman Catholic sovereigns, to uphold the Church in its spiritual interests and influence. For the direct work of the Gospel, therefore, it is evident that little reliance is to be placed on any political changes that may occur at Rome. We turn with deeper interest than ever to the efforts of the Waldenses and other Evangelical bodies to scatter Bibles and diffuse the truth as it is in Jesus throughout Italy. On behalf of the Waldenses, a strong effort has been making to establish auxiliary societies in this country, for supplying them steadily and liberally with the means of carrying on their work. Dr. Revel, M. Prochet, and Dr. Stewart of Leghorn, have been prosecuting their object in Scotland with great success; when they go south to England, it is to be hoped they will be received with not less enthusiasm.

The great missionary societies seem to be passing through a financial crisis. The necessity of curtailing their operations has most reluctantly been pressed upon some of them. It is not that the receipts have become less, but the limit of expansion seems to have been reached in regard to spontaneous contributions, but not in regard to operations. Most of the committees are issuing appeals, in the hope of realising such an addition before the close of their financial years as shall avert the calamity of curtailment. The Wesleyan Missionary Society have issued an appeal for fifteen thousand extra pounds, and have had the gratification, as soon as their wants were made known, of receiving a third part of the whole, or 5000*l.*, from a single lady. But the fact that the revenue is not spontaneously increasing with the increasing operations of the great societies, is an instructive one. It cannot be pretended that the limit of ability to contribute is reached, especially when the country is in such a prosperous state. It seems as if the time had come when it is necessary to indoctrinate the Christian community with the principle of systematic beneficence. The separation of a specific portion of the income from ordinary uses, and its solemn dedication to the Lord, for the service of his cause and the relief of his poor, if systematically and generally practised, while it would vastly increase the revenue of philanthropic societies, would react with most beneficial effect on the givers, deepening their feeling of responsibility, and teaching them, in all their spendings, to have more regard to the will of God.

An interesting narrative occurs in the "Church Missionary Intelligencer" of a missionary tour in the interior of the province of Fuh-kien, in south-eastern China, by the Rev. J. R. Wolfe. In that province every town and village are at present open to the Gospel, and Mr. Wolfe, accompanied by a Christian merchant, a colporteur, and some coolies, spent a month lately in exploring a part of it. The whole journey, with the exception of seventeen miles, was performed on foot, and the travellers passed through two "Fu," cities, fourteen large towns, and countless villages of from 800 to 3000 population. They were the first Europeans that had ever been seen by the natives, at least in the northern part of the province. At every village the entire population turned out to look at them. Labourers in the distant fields would leave their implements, and run to see them, and woodcutters on the cliffs would rush down to meet them by some by-path. The children often screamed, and fled at the approach of the "barbarian ghosts." Their eyes and noses struck the natives most. They frequently ventured to touch their noses and examine their eyes closely. Their dress, too, excited much curiosity, but after a time they became so accustomed to the treatment, that they would fall asleep while the natives were handling their clothes. On the whole, the country presented a high appearance of prosperity and civilisation. The temples of Confucius were very elaborate, large sums of money being often expended on their adornment. Idols and idolatrous shrines and altars met them at every turn, reminding them of the remark of the satirist, that "in Athens it was easier to find a god than a man." The scenery is often very fine, and at a distance the towns look like celestial paradises; but on closer inspection, the awful filth effectually breaks the enchantment.

At the town of Kang-chia, they witnessed a gorgeous procession. It was in honour of a great idol in the town, and consisted of men and boys. Some were beating drums and gongs, which made a confused noise; others played a sort of fife. In the centre of the procession, borne on men's shoulders, was a large boiled hog, tastefully decorated with flowers. Immediately behind the hog was borne, in like manner, a boiled goat, and after the goat a cooked fowl. These were to form an offering to the idol, in order to appease his wrath. The missionary tried to turn the occasion to account by telling of the true God, and Jesus Christ the Saviour, and distributing Bibles and tracts. In one place, when speaking to the people of the ill effects of opium smoking, they invariably turned round and said, "Then why do you bring it to us, and even compel our emperor to allow it into the kingdom? Go, talk to your own people, and tell them of their crime." Mr. Wolfe set out with the intention of leaving one copy of the New Testament in every town and village through which he passed, but the number of villages proved to be ten times more than the number of Testaments he had with him. In so rapid a tour, he could do little more than scatter a few handfuls of seed by the way side; but his narrative shows plainly what vast multitudes of immortal beings in that district are accessible to the missionary, and increases the regret which all good men must feel that the means and the men are so inadequate to the vast area that needs to be supplied with the Gospel.

Among the books that have lately appeared, we notice first the "Boyle Lecture for 1865," which has for its subject the Conversion of the Northern Nations to Christianity. The Lecturer is the Rev. Charles Merivale, well known in the literary world as the author of an elaborate and able work, in seven volumes, on the History of the Romans under the Empire. The present volume is a continuation of the Boyle Lecture of the preceding year, the subject of which was the Conversion of the Roman Empire. The subject is treated from a philosophical point of view, and if one opened the book in the hope of finding interesting details of the way in which the Gospel spread among the Goths or Huns, one would be quite disappointed. The object of Mr. Merivale is very similar to that of Mr. Gladstone in his late address to the students of Edinburgh; it is to trace a providential preparation for the Gospel both among the Romans, and the Northern nations. He holds that for long ages, God in his wonderful providence, was making ready a people for Christianity, and that to a large extent this was done by keeping alive among them certain of the great truths of that primitive revelation which God is believed to have made to the first men,—such as the existence of God, the evil of sin, and the responsibility of man. When Christianity was made known among some of the pagan nations, it caught hold of them, as it were, by these truths, on which it threw a flood of new light; while at the same time it irevealed to them truths respecting grace, atonement, sanctification and eternal life which were entirely new. In the case of the northern nations, Mr. Merivale finds a groundwork for Christian doctrines in several of their characteristic beliefs. Another preparation for their conversion lay in certain events that occurred before the final irruption of the barbarians into Rome. Long before that, many of them had been brought to Rome as prisoners, and had made sport for their conquerors in the gladiatorial fights of the amphitheatre. Some had been employed in military service, and many of both had probably come into contact with earnest Christians, and had wafted to their distant homes tidings of a body of people whose warm love was such a contrast to the usual harshness and heartlessness of their masters. The persecutions of the early ages had driven many Roman Christians for shelter among the barbarians, who had thus the opportunity of becoming personally acquainted with a people of so remarkable a spirit. Then when the barbarians did rush upon the empire, they were often met, not by the sword and spear of the warrior, but by bands of Christian men, exposing themselves defenceless to their arms. "From realm to realm, from city to city, we see the bishop marching with his clergy, singing psalms, addressing invocations, arresting the inundation, slaying the plague. Sometimes he prays, sometimes he adjures, sometimes he offers the example of holy martyrdom. And so he conquers his conquerors." The rush of the barbarians seemed to many Christians to presage the end of the world; and nothing could have been more beautiful than the manner in which the chaos gave way, the storm was changed into a calm, and the barbarians themselves came to sit at the feet of Jesus.

"Some Words for God" is the not very well chosen title under which the Rev. H. P. Liddon publishes a volume of Oxford University sermons, preached chiefly during the years 1863—5. Mr. Liddon's is a name that has already become famous in his own circle, and that bids fair to become famous over a much wider area. The Bampton Lecturer for the present year, and one of the most influential men among Oxford students, his writings claim a special interest. This volume of sermons is one of remarkable ability and suitableness for the times. The sermons are to a large extent religious essays, but written with an earnest practical tone that establishes their claim to the former epithet. Here and there a certain tinge of sacramentarianism indicates the author's ecclesiastical leanings, but the great articles of the Christian faith are stated with a faithfulness and vindicated with a power that make us feel thankful that such a voice is heard and loved in Oxford. The fairness with which Mr. Liddon treats his opponents is conspicuous in every page. His frankness in admitting the dangers of high education in general, and the defects of Oxford training in particular, is equally remarkable. Yet, when unfolding how "the Son of God loved me and gave himself for me," he stands on the old ground, on which saints and martyrs have stood from the beginning, and vindicates "the substitution of Christ for the guilty sinner the ground of the satisfaction which Christ has made on the cross for human sin."

In "Little Foxes," Mrs. Beecher Stowe gives us a series of lively little homilies on "The Insignificant Little Habits which mar domestic happiness." Papa, it seems, was in the habit of giving his young folks a course of evening readings every winter; and somewhat to the consternation of his family, he one day announced his intention of preaching them a course of household sermons. The doubt of the young folks whether this was the right way to entertain them was somewhat relieved, when he announced his text, "Take us the foxes, the little foxes that spoil the vines, for our vines have tender grapes." Whether it be right to rank foxes among clean beasts, may be a question; but like Noah's clean beasts in the ark, the little foxes are here in a group of seven. These are: 1. Fault-finding; 2. Irritability; 3. Repression; 4. Self-will; 5. Intolerance; 6. Discourteousness; 7. Exactingness. Mrs. Standfast is an excellent woman, but little fox No. 1 has made fearful havoc of her grapes. She is perpetually finding fault—servants, children, husband, all are constantly in the wrong. The Rev. Mr. X. is the victim of fox No. 2. In the pulpit he appears with the face of an angel; he soars away into regions of exalted devotion where his people can but faintly gaze after him; he tells them of the victory that overcometh the world, of an unmoved faith that fears no evil, of a serenity of love that no outward event can ruffle; and all look after him and wonder, and wish they could so soar. All except his poor wife, who knows that all this, following as it does a fortnight's incessant work, involves an unnatural excitement of his brain and nerves that will cause a painful reaction. She knows that he who spoke so beautifully of the peace of a soul made perfect, will not be able to bear the cry of his baby, or the pattering feet of the poor little X.'s, who must be sent > "Anywhere, anywhere > Out of his sight;"

he who discoursed so devoutly of perfect trust in God will be nervous about his butcher's bill, sure of going to ruin, because both ends of the salary don't meet; and he who could so admiringly tell of the silence of Jesus under provocation, will but too often speak unadvisedly with his lips.

In the field of Christian missions, there is an interesting book by the late Mrs. Mullens—"Faith and Victory; a Story of the Progress of Christianity in Bengal." The story was written rather for the Hindus than for the English; but Mrs. Mullens thought that what might be useful in instructing the one, might also be of service in interesting the other in the condition of their oriental brothers and sisters. It is a history of a Hindu family, one of whose members was converted to Christ, and it is designed to show the tremendous difficulties in the way of the reception of the truth, arising from the social habits and feelings of the people, as well as from causes of more general influence. A Brahmin has four sons, to all of whom, except the first, he gives a good English education. The first grows up a bigoted Hindu. The second is inwardly pretty much of an unbeliever, though outwardly adhering to Hinduism. The third is attracted by the truth, and ultimately becomes a Christian; the fourth wavers. The interest of the story chiefly centres in the third son. He has a friend who has been converted to Christianity; from him he gets a copy of the New Testament, which he reads with deep interest; he is convinced of its truth; leaves home, and goes to a missionary. His father is in a fearful rage, and with his other relatives, tries every means of turning him from his purpose—first, persuasion; then, law; thirdly, force. On the eve of his baptism, he is carried off and hid. His eldest brother is commissioned to administer a poison that shall make him an idiot. This plan is frustrated by the grandmother, who has a regard for the youth, and some sympathy with his Christian tendencies. Instead of the poisoned sherbet, she administers a draught which for twelve hours produces an insensibility that looks like death. Under the influence of this, he is supposed to be dead. His eldest brother comes to bury him. In the midst of the funeral rites, he recovers, and starts up, terrifying all, and driving his brother clean mad. In the confusion that ensues, he makes his escape. Like his brother, he had been early married; the wives of all, and several other women, lived together, and a part of the story is occupied with the description of their social life and habits. After his recovery, the grandmother asks him about Christ, and when she dies she is heard praying to Jesus. His own wife becomes anxious about the truth, and desirous of rejoining her husband. This she at last accomplishes. They both throw in their lot with the Christians, and the book ends by contrasting the blessed life of their Christian home with the miseries of a Hindu domestic establishment. The pictures of Hindu life are exceedingly instructive; and the book is well fitted to give a vivid conception of the habits of the people, and of the terrible and often tragical struggles through which it is often necessary for the inquirer to wrestle, on his way to Christ.

Lord Kinloch, one of the judges of the Court of Session, who has already given the public a volume of religious verse and one of prose, has added to the list a book entitled "Studies for Sunday Evenings." They are a collection of lay sermons on practical subjects, not remarkable for great depth or power, but fresh and interesting, as the contributions of an independent, earnest, pious mind, on the most vital subjects of religious interest. Conservative in his leanings, and verifying the old judgments in most of his conclusions, Lord Kinloch at the same time claims a freedom of opinion on some points that shows that he has not slavishly endorsed established tenets. His volume will be greatly prized by earnest readers, and by publishing it the learned author has laid the Christian public under a fresh obligation.

"The Rev. Father Pius, a Sp. Sancto Passionist," has written the life of one of the modern saints and miracle-workers of the Church of Rome—Father Ignatius of St. Paul, as he was called. The Hon. and Rev. George Spencer, son of the Earl Spencer who was First Lord of the Admiralty in the time of Nelson's victories, became a convert to Roman Catholic views some thirty-five years ago, swinging like a pendulum in full motion from the extreme of worldliness on the one hand, to the extreme of asceticism on the other. His entrance into holy orders seems to have been effected without any preparatory study; and when he obtained charge of the parish of Brington, his fame as a hunter and a waltzer appears to have suffered no abatement, while his profuse and indiscriminate charities brought him a great share of popular favour. Impulsive, unsettled, and probably unsatisfied, he was induced, at the instigation of a boy of seventeen, to join the Church of Rome; and then he became a member of the order of the Passionists, subjecting himself to the most constant and rigorous privations, and begging his way from place to place. His special function was to pray for the conversion of England to the Catholic faith; and at one time he was in great hopes that through the aid of the Emperors of France and Austria this object would be accomplished; but he does not seem to have been able to persuade these monarchs to get their bishops to make the clergy pray for it. According to his biographer, Father Ignatius had the gift of miracles; but this was not very remarkable, for many priests possess it too. This poor devotee, whose zeal and self-sacrifice, under enlightened auspices, might have made him an honour to Christ's Church and a blessing to his country, was found dead at the roadside two years ago, on his way to the house of his brother-pervert, Mr. Monteith, of Carstairs.

"PUT THAT TABLE DOWN DIRECTLY!"

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

XVI.

One little matter I forgot to mention as having been talked about between Dr. Duncan and myself that same evening. I happened to refer to Old Rogers.

"What a fine old fellow that is!" said Dr. Duncan.

"Indeed he is," I answered. "He is a great comfort and help to me. I don't think anybody but myself has an idea what there is in that old man."

"The people in the village don't quite like him, though, I find. He is too ready to be down upon them when he sees things going amiss. The fact is, they are afraid of him."

"Something as the Jews were afraid of John the Baptist, because he was an honest man, and spoke not merely his own mind, but the mind of God in it."

"Just so. I believe you're quite right. Do you know, the other day, happening to go into Weir's shop, to get him to do a job for me, I found him and Old Rogers at close quarters in an argument. I could not well understand the drift of it, not having been present at the beginning, but I soon saw that, keen as Weir was, and far surpassing Rogers in correctness of speech, and precision as well, the old sailor carried too heavy metal for the carpenter. It evidently annoyed Weir; but such was the good humour of Rogers, that he could not, for very shame, lose his temper, the old man's smile again and again compelling a response on the thin cheeks of the other."

"I know how he would talk exactly," I returned. "He has a kind of loving banter with him, if you will allow me the expression, that is irresistible to any man with a heart in his bosom. I am very glad to hear there is anything like communion begun between them. Weir will get good from him."

"My man-of-all-work is going to leave me. I wonder if the old man would take his place."

"I do not know whether he is fit for it. But of one thing you may be sure—if Old Rogers does not honestly believe he is fit for it, he will not take it. And he will tell you why, too."

"Of that, however, I think I may be a better judge than he. There is nothing to which a good sailor cannot turn his hand, whatever he may think himself. You see, Mr. Walton, it is not like a routine trade. Things are never twice the same at sea. The sailor has a thousand chances of using his judgment, if he has any to use; and that Old Rogers has in no common degree. So I should have no fear of him. If he won't let me steer him, you must put your hand to the tiller for me."

"I will do what I can," I answered; "for nothing would please me more than to see him in your service. It would be much better for him, and his wife, too, than living by uncertain jobs as he does now."

The result of it all was, that Old Rogers consented to try for a month; but when the end of the month came, nothing was said on either side, and the old man remained. And I could see several little new comforts about the cottage, in consequence of the regularity of his wages.

Now I must report another occurrence in regular sequence.

To my surprise, and, I must confess, not a little to my discomposure, when I rose in the reading-desk on the day after this dinner with Dr. Duncan, I saw that the Hall-pew was full. Miss Oldcastle was there for the first time, and, by her side, the gentleman whom the day before I had encountered on horseback. He sat carelessly, easily, contentedly—indifferently; for, although I never that morning looked up from my prayer-book, except involuntarily in the changes of posture, I could not help seeing that he was always behind the rest of the congregation, as if he had no idea of what was coming next, or did not care to conform. Gladly would I, that day, have shunned the necessity of preaching that was laid upon me. "But," I said to myself, "shall the work given me to do, fare ill because of the perturbation of my spirit? No harm is done, though I suffer; but much harm if one tone fails of its force because I suffer." I therefore prayed God to help me; and feeling the right, because I felt the need, of looking to Him for aid, I cast my care upon Him, kept my thoughts strenuously away from that which discomposed me, and never turned my eyes towards the Hall-pew from the moment I entered the pulpit. And partly, I presume, from the freedom given by the sense of irresponsibility for the result, I being weak and God strong, I preached, I think, a better sermon than I had ever preached before. But when I got into the vestry I found that I could scarcely stand for trembling; and I must have looked ill, for when my attendant came in he got me a glass of wine without even asking me if I would have it, although it was not my custom to take any there. But there was one of my congregation that morning who suffered more than I did from the presence of one of those who filled the Hall-pew.

I recovered in a few moments from my weakness, but, altogether disinclined to face any of my congregation, went out at my vestry-door, and home through the shrubbery—a path I seldom used, because it had a separatist look about it. When I got to my study, I threw myself on a couch, and fell fast asleep. How often in trouble have I had to thank God for sleep as for one of his best gifts! And how often when I have awaked refreshed and calm, have I thought of poor Sir Philip Sidney, who, dying slowly and patiently in the prime of life and health, was sorely troubled in his mind to know how he had offended God, because, having prayed earnestly for sleep, no sleep came in answer to his cry!

I woke just in time for my afternoon service; and the inward peace in which I found my heart was to myself a marvel and a delight. I felt almost as if I was walking in a blessed dream come from a world of serener air than this of ours. I found, after I was already in the reading-desk, that I was a few minutes early; and while, with bowed head, I was simply living in the consciousness of the presence of a supreme quiet, the first low notes of the organ broke upon my stillness with the sense of a deeper delight. Never before had I felt, as I felt that afternoon, the triumph of contemplation in Handel's rendering of "I know that my Redeemer liveth." And I felt how through it all ran a cold silvery quiver of sadness, like the light in the east after the sun is gone down, which would have been pain, but for the golden glow of the west, which looks after the light of the world with a patient waiting.—Before the music ceased, it had crossed my mind that I had never before heard that organ utter itself in the language of Handel. But I had no time to think more about it just then, for I rose to read the words of our Lord, "I will arise and go to my Father."

There was no one in the Hall-pew; indeed, it was a rare occurrence if anyone was there in the afternoon.

But for all the quietness of my mind during that evening service, I felt ill before I went to bed, and awoke in the morning with a headache, which increased along with other signs of perturbation of the system, until I thought it better to send for Dr. Duncan. I have not yet got so imbecile as to suppose that a history of the following six weeks would be interesting to my readers—for during so long did I suffer from low fever; and more weeks passed, during which I was unable to meet my flock. Thanks to the care of Mr. Brownrigg, a clever young man in priest's orders, who was living at Addicehead while waiting for a curacy, kindly undertook my duty for me, and thus relieved me of all anxiety about supplying my place.

XVII.

But I cannot express equal satisfaction in regard to everything that Mr. Brownrigg took upon his own responsibility, as my reader will see. He, and another farmer, his neighbour, had been so often re-elected churchwardens that at last they seemed to have gained a prescriptive right to the office, and the form of election fell into disuse; so much so, that after Mr. Summer's death, which took place some year and a half before I became Vicar of Marshmallows, Mr. Brownrigg continued to exercise the duty in his own single person, and nothing had as yet been said about the election of a colleague. So little seemed to fall to the duty of the churchwarden that I regarded the neglect as a trifle, and was remiss in setting it right. I had, therefore, to suffer, as was just. Indeed, Mr. Brownrigg was not the man to have power in his hands unchecked.

I had so far recovered that I was able to rise about noon and go into my study, though I was very weak, and had not yet been out, when one morning Mrs. Pearson came into the room and said,—

"Please, sir, here's young Thomas Weir in a great way about something, and insisting upon seeing you, if you possibly can."

I had as yet seen very few of my friends, except the Doctor, and those only for two or three minutes; but although I did not feel very fit for seeing anybody just then, I could not but yield to his desire, confident there must be a good reason for it, and so told Mrs. Pearson to show him in.

"Oh, sir, I know you would be vexed if you hadn't been told," he exclaimed, "and I am sure you will not be angry with me for troubling you."

"What is the matter, Tom?" I said. "I assure you I shall not be angry with you."

"There's Farmer Brownrigg, at this very moment, taking away Mr. Templeton's table because he wont pay the church-rate."

"What church-rate?" I cried, starting up from the sofa. "I never heard of a church-rate."

Now before I go farther, it is necessary to explain some things. One day before I was taken ill, I had had a little talk with Mr. Brownrigg about some repairs of the church which were necessary, and must be done before another winter. I confess I was rather pleased; for I wanted my people to feel that the church was their property, and that it was their privilege, if they could regard it as a blessing to have the church, to keep it in decent order and repair. So I said, in a by-the-by way, to my churchwarden, "We must call a vestry before long, and have this looked to." Now my predecessor had left everything of the kind to his churchwardens; and the inhabitants from their side had likewise left the whole affair to the churchwardens. But Mr. Brownrigg, who, I must say, had taken more pains than might have been expected of him to make himself acquainted with the legalities of his office, did not fail to call a vestry, to which, as usual, no one had responded; whereupon he imposed a rate according to his own unaided judgment. This, I believe, he did during my illness with the notion of pleasing me by the discovery that the repairs had been effected according to my mind. Nor did any one of my congregation throw the least difficulty in the churchwarden's way.—And now I must refer to another circumstance in the history of my parish.

I think I have already alluded to the fact that there were dissenters in Marshmallows. There was a little chapel down a lane leading from the main street of the village, in which there was service three times every Sunday. People came to it from many parts of the parish, amongst whom were the families of two or three farmers of substance, while the village and its neighbourhood contributed a portion of the poorest of the inhabitants. A year or two before I came, their minister died, and they had chosen another, a very worthy man, of considerable erudition, but of extreme views, as I heard, upon insignificant points, and moved by a great dislike to national churches and episcopacy. This, I say, is what I had made out about him from what I had heard. My reader will very probably be inclined to ask, "But why, with principles such as yours, should you have only hearsay to go upon? Why did you not make the honest man's acquaintance? In such a small place, men should not keep each other at arm's length." And any reader who says so, will say right. All I have to suggest for myself is simply a certain shyness, for which I cannot entirely account, but which was partly made up of fear to intrude, or of being supposed to arrogate to myself the right of making advances, partly of a dread lest we should not be able to get on together, and so the attempt should result in something unpleasantly awkward. I daresay, likewise, that the natural shelliness of the English had something to do with it. At all events, I had not made his acquaintance.

Mr. Templeton, then, had refused, as a point of conscience, to pay the church-rate when the collector went round to demand it; had been summoned before a magistrate in consequence; had suffered a default; and, proceedings being pushed from the first in all the pride of Mr. Brownrigg's legality, had on this very day been visited by the churchwarden, accompanied by a broker from the neighbouring town of Addicehead, and at the very time when I was hearing of the fact was suffering distraint of his goods. The porcine head of the churchwarden was not there by accident, nor without significance.

But I did not wait to understand all this now. It was enough for me that Tom bore witness to the fact that at that moment proceedings were thus driven to extremity. I rang the bell for my boots, and, to the open-mouthed dismay of Mrs. Pearson, left the vicarage leaning on Tom's arm. But such was the commotion in my mind, that I had become quite unconscious of illness or even feebleness. Hurrying on in more terror than I can well express lest I should be too late, I reached Mr. Templeton's house just as a small mahogany table was being hoisted into a spring-cart which stood at the door. Breathless with haste, I was yet able to call out,—

"Put that table down directly."

At the same moment Mr. Brownrigg appeared from within the door. He approached with the self-satisfied look of a man who has done his duty, and is proud of it. I think he had not heard me.

"You see I'm prompt, Mr. Walton," he said. "But, bless my soul, how ill you look!"

Without answering him—for I was more angry with him than I ought to have been—I repeated,—

"Put that table down, I tell you."

They did so.

"Now," I said, "carry it back into the house."

"Why, sir," interposed Mr. Brownrigg, "it's all right."

"Yes," I said, "as right as the devil would have it."

"I assure you, sir, I have done everything according to law."

"I'm not so sure of that. I believe I had the right to be chairman at the vestry-meeting; but, instead of even letting me know, you took advantage of my illness to hurry on matters to this shameful and wicked excess."

I did the poor man wrong in this, for I believe he had hurried things really to please me. His face had lengthened considerably by this time, and its rubicund hue declined.

"I did not think you would stand upon ceremony about it, sir. You never seemed to care for business."

"If you talk about legality, so will I. Certainly, you don't stand upon ceremony."

"I didn't expect you would turn against your own churchwarden in the execution of his duty, sir," he said, in an offended tone. "It's bad enough to have a meetin'-house in the place, without one's own parson siding with t'other parson as won't pay a lawful church-rate."

"I would have paid the church-rate for the whole parish ten times over before such a thing should have happened. I feel so disgraced, I am ashamed to look Mr. Templeton in the face. Carry that table into the house again, directly."

"It's my property, now," interposed the broker. "I've bought it of the churchwarden, and paid for it."

I turned to Mr. Brownrigg.

"How much did he give you for it?" I asked.

"Ten shillings," returned he, sulkily, and muttered something about returning a part of it.

"Ten shillings!" I exclaimed; "for a table that cost two or three pounds, I daresay.—What do you expect to sell it for?"

"That's my business," answered the broker.

I pulled out my purse, and threw a sovereign on the table, saying,—

"Cent. per cent. will be, I think, profit enough even on such a transaction."

"I did not offer you the table," returned the broker. "I am not bound to sell except I please, and at my own price."

"Possibly. But I tell you the whole affair is illegal. And if you carry away that table, I shall see what the law will do for me. I assure you I will prosecute you myself. You take up that sovereign, or I will. It will go to pay counsel, I give you my word, if you do not take it to quench strife."

I stretched out my hand. But the broker was before me. Without another word, he pocketed the money, jumped into his cart with his man, and drove off, leaving the churchwarden and the parson standing at the door of the dissenting minister with his mahogany table on the path between them.

"Now, Mr. Brownrigg," I said, "lend me a hand to carry this table in again."

He yielded, not graciously,—that could not be expected—but in silence.

"Oh! sir," interposed young Tom, who had stood by during the dispute, "let me take it. You're not able to lift it."

"Nonsense! Tom. Keep away," I said. "It is all the reparation I can make."

And so Mr. Brownrigg and I blundered into the little parlour with our burden—not a great one, but I began to find myself failing.

Mr. Templeton sat in a Windsor chair in the middle of the room. Evidently the table had been carried away from before him, leaving his position uncovered. The floor was strewed with the books which had lain upon it. He sat reading an old folio, as if nothing had happened. But when we entered he rose.

He was a man of middle size, about forty, with short black hair and overhanging bushy eyebrows. His mouth indicated great firmness, not unmingled with sweetness, and even with humour. He smiled as he rose, but looked embarrassed, glancing first at the table, then at me, and then at Mr. Brownrigg, as if begging somebody to tell him what to say. But I did not leave him a moment in this perplexity.

"Mr. Templeton," I said, quitting the table, and holding out my hand, "I beg your pardon for myself and my friend here, my churchwarden"—Mr. Brownrigg gave a grunt—"that you should have been annoyed like this. I have——"

Mr. Templeton interrupted me.

"I assure you it was a matter of conscience with me," he said. "On no other ground—"

"I know it, I know it," I said, interrupting him in my turn. "I beg your pardon; and I have done my best to make amends for it. Offences must come, you know, Mr. Templeton; but I trust I have not incurred the woe that follows upon them by means of whom they come, for I knew nothing of it, and indeed was too ill——"

Here my strength left me altogether, and I sat down. The room began to whirl round me, and I remember nothing more till I knew that I was lying on a couch, with Mrs. Templeton bathing my forehead, and Mr. Templeton trying to get something into my mouth with a spoon.

Ashamed to find myself in such circumstances, I tried to rise; but Mr. Templeton, laying his hand on mine, said—

"My dear sir, add to your kindness this day by letting my wife and me minister to you."

Now, was not that a courteous speech? He went on—

"Mr. Brownrigg has gone for Dr. Duncan, and will be back in a few moments. I beg you will not exert yourself."

I yielded and lay still. Dr. Duncan came. His carriage followed, and I was taken home. Before we started, I said to Mr. Brownrigg—for I could not rest till I had said it—

"Mr. Brownrigg, I spoke in heat when I came up to you, and I am sure I did you wrong. I am certain you had no improper motive in not making me acquainted with your proceedings. You meant no harm to me. But you did very wrong towards Mr. Templeton. I will try to show you that when I am well again; but——"

"But you mustn't talk more now," said Dr. Duncan.

So I shook hands with Mr. Brownrigg, and we parted. I fear, from what I know of my churchwarden, that he went home with the conviction that he had done perfectly right; and that the parson had made an apology for finding fault with a churchwarden who was doing his best to uphold the dignity of Church and State. But perhaps I may be doing him wrong again.

I went home to a week more of bed, and a lengthened process of recovery; during which many were the kind inquiries made after me by my friends, and amongst them by Mr. Templeton.

And here I may as well sketch the result of that strange introduction to the dissenting minister.

After I was tolerably well again, I received a friendly letter from him one day expostulating with me on the inconsistency of my remaining within the pale of the Established Church. The gist of the letter lay in these words:—

"I confess it perplexes me to understand how to reconcile your Christian and friendly behaviour to one whom most of your brethren would consider as much beneath their notice as inferior to them in social position, with your remaining the minister of a church in which such enormities as you employed your private influence to counteract in my case are not only possible, but certainly lawful, and recognized by most of its members as likewise expedient."

To this I replied:—

"My dear Sir,—I do not like writing letters, especially on subjects of importance. There are a thousand chances of misunderstanding. Whereas, in a personal interview, there is a possibility of controversy being hallowed by communion. Come and dine with me to-morrow, at any hour convenient to you, and make my apologies to Mrs. Templeton for not inviting her with you, on the ground that we want to have a long talk with each other without the distracting influence which even her presence would unavoidably occasion.

"I am, &c. &c."

He accepted my invitation at once. During dinner we talked away, not upon indifferent, but upon the most interesting subjects—connected with the poor, and parish-work, and the influence of the higher upon the lower classes of society. At length we sat down on opposite sides of the fire; and as soon as Mrs. Pearson had shut the door, I said,—

"You ask me, Mr. Templeton, in your very kind letter——" and here I put my hand in my pocket to find it.

"I asked you," interposed Mr. Templeton, "how you could belong to a church which authorizes things of which you yourself so heartily disapprove."

"And I answer you," I returned, "that just to such a church our Lord belonged."

"I do not quite understand you."

"Our Lord belonged to the Jewish Church."

"But ours is His church."

"Yes. But principles remain the same. I speak of Him as belonging to a church. His conduct would be the same in the same circumstances, whatever church he belonged to, because He would always do right. I want, if you will allow me, to show you the principle upon which He acted with regard to churchrates."

"Certainly. I beg your pardon for interrupting you."

"The Pharisees demanded a tribute, which, it is allowed, was for the support of the temple and its worship. Our Lord did not refuse to acknowledge their authority, notwithstanding the many ways in which they had degraded the religious observances of the Jewish Church. He acknowledged himself a child of the church, but said that, as a child, He ought to have been left to contribute as He pleased to the support of its ordinances, and not to be compelled after such a fashion."

"There I have you," exclaimed Mr. Templeton. "He said they were wrong to make the tribute, or church-rate, if it really was such, compulsory."

"I grant it: it is entirely wrong, a very unchristian proceeding. But our Lord did not therefore desert the church, as you would have me do. He paid the money, lest he should offend. And not having it of his own, He had to ask his Father for it; or, what came to the same thing, make a servant of his Father, namely, a fish in the sea of Galilee, bring him the money. And there I have you, Mr. Templeton. It is wrong to compel, and wrong to refuse, the payment of a church-rate. I do not say equally wrong: it is much worse to compel than to refuse."

"You are very generous," returned Mr. Templeton. "May I hope that you will do me the credit to believe that if I saw clearly that they were the same thing, I would not hesitate a moment to follow our Lord's example."

"I believe it perfectly. Therefore, however we may differ, we are in reality at no strife."

"But is there not this difference, that our Lord was, as you say, a child of the Jewish Church, which was indubitably established by God? Now, if I cannot conscientiously belong to the so-called English Church, why should I have to pay church-rate or tribute?"

"Shall I tell you the argument the English Church might then use? The Church might say, 'Then you are a stranger, and no child; therefore, like the kings of the earth, we may take tribute of you.' So you see it would come to this, that dissenters alone should be compelled to pay church-rates."

We both laughed at this pushing of the argument to illegitimate conclusions. Then I resumed:

"But the real argument is, that not for such faults should we separate from each other; not for such faults, or any faults, so long as it is the repository of the truth, should you separate from the church."

"I will yield the point when you can show me the same ground for believing the Church of England the National Church, appointed such by God, that I can show you, and you know already, for receiving the Jewish Church as the appointment of God."

"That would involve a long argument, upon which, though I have little doubt upon the matter myself, I cannot say I am prepared to enter at this moment. Meantime, I would just ask you whether you are not sufficiently a child of the Church of England, having received from it a thousand influences for good, if in no other way, yet through your fathers, to find it no great hardship, and not very unreasonable, to pay a trifle to keep in repair one of the tabernacles in which our forefathers worshipped together, if, as I hope you will allow, in some imperfect measure God is worshipped, and the truth is preached in it?"

"Most willingly would I pay the money. I object simply because the rate is compulsory."

"And therein you have our Lord's example to the contrary."

A silence followed; for I had to deal with an honest man, who was thinking. I resumed:—

"A thousand difficulties will no doubt come up to be considered in the matter. Do not suppose I am anxious to convince you. I believe that our Father, our Elder Brother, and the Spirit that proceedeth from them, is teaching you, as I believe I too am being taught by the same. Why then should I be anxious to convince you of anything? Will you not in his good time come to see what He would have you see? I am relieved to speak my mind, knowing He would have us speak our mind to each other; but I do not want to proselytize. If you change your mind, you will probably do so on different grounds from any I give you, on grounds which show themselves in the course of your own search after the foundations of truth in regard perhaps to some other question altogether."

Again a silence followed. Then Mr. Templeton spoke:—

"Don't think I am satisfied," he said, "because I don't choose to say anything more till I have thought about it. I think you are wrong in your conclusions about the church, though surely you are right in thinking we ought to have patience with each other. And now tell me true, Mr. Walton,—I'm a blunt kind of man, descended from an old Puritan, one of Cromwell's Ironsides, I believe, and I haven't been to a university like you, but I'm no fool either, I hope, —don't be offended at my question: wouldn't you be glad to see me forced to leave your parish now?"

I began to speak, but he went on.

"Don't you regard me as an interloper now—one who has no right to speak because he does not belong to the church?"

"God forbid!" I answered. "If a word of mine would make you leave my parish to-morrow, I dare not say it. I do not want to incur the rebuke of our Lord—for surely the words 'Forbid him not' involved some rebuke. Would it not be a fearful thing that one soul, because of a deed of mine, should receive a less portion of elevation or comfort in his journey towards his home? Are there not countless modes of saying the truth? You have some of them. I hope I have some. People will hear you who will not hear me. Preach to them in the name and love of God, Mr. Templeton. Speak that you do know, and testify that you have seen. You and I will help each other, in proportion as we serve the Master. I only say that in separating from us you are in effect, and by your conduct, saying to us, 'Do not preach, for you follow not with us.' I will not be guilty of that towards you. Your fathers did the church no end of good by leaving it. But it is time to unite now."

Once more followed a silence.

"If people could only meet, and look each other in the face," said Mr. Templeton at length, "they might find there was not such a gulf between them as they had fancied."

And so we parted.

Now I do not write all this for the sake of the church-rate question. I write it to commemorate the spirit in which Mr. Templeton met me. For it is of consequence that two men who love their Master should recognize each that the other does so, and thereupon, if not before, should cease to be estranged because of difference of opinion, which surely, inevitable as offence, does not involve the same denunciation of woe.

After this Mr. Templeton and I found some opportunities of helping each other. And many a time ere his death we consulted together about things that befell. Once he came to me about a legal difficulty in connection with the deed of trust of his chapel; and although I could not help him myself, I directed him to such help as was thorough and cost him nothing.

I need not say he never became a churchman, or that I never expected he would. All his memories of a religious childhood, all the sources of the influences which had refined and elevated him, were surrounded with other associations than those of the church and her forms. The church was his grandmother, not his mother, and he had not made any acquaintance with her till comparatively late in life.

But while I do not say that his intellectual objections to the Church were less strong than they had been, I am sure that his feelings were moderated, even changed towards her. And though this may seem of no consequence to one who loves the church more than the brotherhood, it does not seem of little consequence to me who love the church because of the brotherhood of which it is the type and the restorer.

It was long before another church-rate was levied in Marshmallows. And when the circumstance did take place, no one dreamed of calling on Mr. Templeton for his share in it. But, having heard of it, he called himself upon the churchwarden—Mr. Brownrigg still—and offered the money cheerfully. And Mr. Brownrigg refused to take it till he had consulted me! I told him to call on Mr. Templeton, and say he would be much obliged to him for his contribution, and give him a receipt for it.

XVIII.

Perhaps my reader may be sufficiently interested in the person, who, having once begun to tell his story, may possibly have allowed his feelings, in concert with the comfortable confidence afforded by the mask of namelessness, to run away with his pen, and so have babbled of himself more than he ought—may be sufficiently interested, I say, in my mental condition, to cast a speculative thought upon the state of my mind, during my illness, with regard to Miss Oldcastle and the stranger who was her mother's guest at the Hall. Possibly, being by nature gifted, as I have certainly discovered, with more of hope than is usually mingled with the other elements composing the temperament of humanity, I did not suffer quite so much as some would have suffered during such an illness. But I have reason to fear that when I was lightheaded from fever, which was a not uncommon occurrence, especially in the early mornings during the worst of my illness—when Mrs. Pearson had to sit up with me, and sometimes an old woman of the village who was generally called in upon such occasions—I may have talked a good deal of nonsense about Miss Oldcastle. For I remember that I was haunted with visions of magnificent conventual ruins which I had discovered and which, no one seeming to care about them but myself, I was left to wander through at my own lonely will. Would I could see with the waking eye such a grandeur of Gothic arches and "long-drawn aisles" as then arose upon my sick sense! Within was a labyrinth of passages in the walls, and "long sounding corridors," and sudden galleries, whence I looked down into the great church aching with silence. Through these I was ever wandering, ever discovering new rooms, new galleries, new marvels of architecture; ever disappointed and ever dissatisfied, because I knew that in one room somewhere in the forgotten mysteries of the pile sat Ethelwyn reading, never lifting those sea-blue eyes of hers from the great volume on her knee, reading every word, slowly turning leaf after leaf; knew that she would sit there reading, till, one by one, every leaf in the huge volume was turned, and she came to the last and read it from top to bottom—down to the finis and the urn with a weeping-willow over it; when she would close the book with a sigh, lay it down on the floor, rise and walk slowly away, and leave the glorious ruin dead to me as it had so long been to every one else; knew that if I did not find her before that terrible last page was read, I should never find her at all; but have to go wandering alone all my life through those dreary galleries and corridors, with one hope only left—that I might yet before I died find the "palace-chamber far apart," and see the read and forsaken volume lying on the floor where she had left it, and the chair beside it upon which she had sat so long waiting for some one in vain.

And perhaps to words spoken under these impressions may partly be attributed the fact, which I knew nothing of till long afterwards, that the people of the village began to couple my name with that of Miss Oldcastle.

When all this vanished from me in the returning wave of health that spread through my weary brain, I was yet left anxious and thoughtful. There was no one from whom I could ask any information about the family at the Hall, so that I was just driven to the best thing—to try to cast my care upon Him who cared for my care. How often do we look upon God as our last and feeblest resource! We go to Him because we have nowhere else to go. And then we learn that the storms of life have driven us, not upon the rocks, but into the desired haven; that we have been compelled, as to the last remaining, so to the best, the only, the central help, the causing cause of all the helps to which we had turned aside as nearer and better.

One day when, having considerably recovered from my second attack, I was sitting reading in my study, who should be announced but my friend Judy!

"Oh, dear Mr. Walton, I am so sorry you have been so ill!" exclaimed the impulsive girl, taking my hand in both of hers, and sitting down beside me. "I haven't had a chance of coming to see you before; though we've always managed—I mean auntie and I—to hear about you. I would have come to nurse you, but it was no use thinking of it."

I smiled as I thanked her.

"Ah! you think because I'm such a tom-boy, that I couldn't nurse you. I only wish I had had a chance of letting you see. I am so sorry for you!"

"But I'm nearly well now, Judy, and I have been taken good care of."

"By that frumpy old thing, Mrs. Pearson, and—"

"Mrs. Pearson is a very kind woman, and an excellent nurse," I said; but she would not heed me.

"And that awful old witch, Mother Goose. She was enough to give you bad dreams all night as she sat by you."

"I didn't dream about Mother Goose, as you call her, Judy, I assure you. But now I want to hear how everybody is at the Hall."

"What, grannie, and the white wolf, and all?"

"As many as you please to tell me about."

"Well, grannie is gracious to everybody but auntie."

"Why isn't she gracious to auntie?"

"I don't know. I only guess."

"Is your visitor gone?"

"Yes, long ago. Do you know, I think grannie wants auntie to marry him, and auntie doesn't quite like it? But he's very nice. He's so funny! He'll be back again soon, I daresay. I don't quite like him—not so well as you by a whole half, Mr. Walton. I wish you would marry auntie; but that would never do. It would drive grannie out of her wits."

To stop the strange girl, and hide some confusion, I said:

"Now tell me about the rest of them."

"Sarah comes next. She's as white and as wolfy as ever. Mr. Walton, I hate that woman. She walks like a cat. I am sure she is bad."

"Did you ever think, Judy, what an awful thing it is to be bad? If you did, I think you would be so sorry for her, you could not hate her."

At the same time, knowing what I knew now, and remembering that impressions can date from farther back than the memory can reach, I was not surprised to hear that Judy hated Sarah, though I could not believe that in such a child the hatred was of the most deadly description.

"I am afraid I must go on hating in the meantime," said Judy. "I wish some one would marry auntie and turn Sarah away. But that couldn't be, so long as grannie lives."

"How is Mr. Stoddart?"

"There now! That's one of the things auntie said I was to be sure to tell you."

"Then your aunt knew you were coming to see me?"

"Oh, yes, I told her. Not grannie, you know. —You mustn't let it out."

"I shall be careful. How is Mr. Stoddart, then?"

"Not well at all. He was taken ill before you, and has been in bed and by the fireside ever since. Auntie doesn't know what to do with him, he is so out of spirits."

"If to-morrow is fine, I shall go and see him."

"Thank you. I believe that's just what auntie wanted. He won't like it at first, I daresay. But he'll come to, and you'll do him good. You do everybody good you come near."

"I wish that were true, Judy. I fear it is not. What good did I ever do you, Judy?"

"Do me!" she exclaimed, apparently half angry at the question. "Don't you know I have been an altered character ever since I knew you?"

And here the odd creature laughed, leaving me in absolute ignorance of how to interpret her. But presently her eyes grew clearer, and I could see the slow film of a tear gathering.

"Mr. Walton," she said, "I have been trying not to be selfish. You have done me that much good."

"I am very glad, Judy. Don't forget who can do you all good. There is One who can not only show you what is right, but can make you able to do and be what is right. You don't know how much you have got to learn yet, Judy; but there is that one Teacher ever ready to teach if you will only ask Him."

Judy did not answer, but sat looking fixedly at the carpet. She was thinking, though, I saw.

"Who has played the organ, Judy, since your uncle was taken ill?" I asked, at length.

"Why, auntie, to be sure. Didn't you hear?"

"No," I answered, turning almost sick at the idea of having been away from church for so many Sundays while she was giving voice and expression to the dear asthmatic old pipes. And I did feel very ready to murmur, like a spoilt child that had not had his way. Think of her there, and me here!

"Then," I said to myself at last, "it must have been she that played 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' that last time I was in church! And instead of thanking God for that, here I am murmuring that He did not give me more! And this child has just been telling me that I have taught her to try not to be selfish. Certainly I should be ashamed of myself."

"When was your uncle taken ill?"

"I don't exactly remember. But you will come and see him to-morrow? And then we shall see you too. For we are always in and out of his room just now."

"I will come if Dr. Duncan will let me. Perhaps he will take me in his carriage."

"No, no. Don't you come with him. Uncle can't bear doctors. He never was ill in his life before, and he behaves to Dr. Duncan just as if he had made him ill. I wish I could send the carriage for you. But I can't, you know."

"Never mind, Judy. I shall manage somehow. —What is the name of the gentleman who was staying with you?"

"Don't you know? Captain George Everard. He would change his name to Oldcastle, you know."

What a foolish pain, like a spear-thrust, they sent through me—those words spoken in such a taken-for-granted way!

"He's a relation—on grannie's side mostly, I believe. But I never could understand the explanation. What makes it harder is, that all the husbands and wives in our family, for a hundred and fifty years, have been more or less of cousins, or half cousins, or second or third cousins. Captain Everard has what grandmamma calls a neat little property of his own from his mother, somewhere in Northumberland; for he is only a third son, one of a class grannie does not in general feel very friendly to, I assure you, Mr. Walton. But his second brother is dead, and the eldest something the worse for the wear, as grannie says; so that the Captain comes just within sight of the coronet of an old uncle who ought to have been dead long ago. Just the match for auntie!"

"But you say auntie doesn't like him."

"Oh! but you know that doesn't matter," returned Judy, with bitterness. "What will grannie care for that? It's nothing to anybody but auntie, and she must get used to it. Nobody makes anything of her."

It was only after she had gone that I thought how astounding it would have been to me to hear a girl of her age show such an acquaintance with worldliness and scheming, had I not been personally so much concerned about one of the objects of her remarks. She certainly was a strange girl. But strange as she was it was a satisfaction to think that the aunt had such a friend and ally in her wild niece. Evidently she had inherited her father's fearlessness; and if only it should turn out that she had likewise inherited her mother's firmness, she might render the best possible service to her aunt against the oppression of her wilful mother.

"How were you able to get here to-day?" I asked, as she rose to go.

"Grannie is in London, and the wolf is with her. Auntie wouldn't leave uncle."

"They have been a good deal in London of late, have they not?"

"Yes. They say it's about money of auntie's. But I don't understand. I think it's that grannie wants to make the captain marry her; for they sometimes see him when they go to London."

XIX.

The following day being very fine, I walked to Oldcastle Hall. I remember well how much slower I was forced to walk than I was willing. I found to my relief that Mrs. Oldcastle had not yet returned. I was shown at once to Mr. Stoddart's library. There I found the two ladies in attendance upon him. He was seated by a splendid fire, for the autumn days were now chilly on the shady side, in the most luxurious of easy-chairs, with his furred feet buried in the long hair of the hearthrug. He looked worn and peevish. All the placidity of his countenance had vanished. The smooth expanse of his forehead was drawn into fifty wrinkles, like a sea over which the fretting wind has been blowing all night. Nor was it only suffering that his face expressed. He looked like a man who strongly suspected that he was ill-used.

After salutation,—

"You are well off, Mr. Stoddart," I said, "to have two such nurses."

"They are very kind," sighed the patient.

"You would recommend Mrs. Pearson and Mother Goose instead, would you not, Mr. Walton?" said Judy, her grey eyes sparkling with fun.

"Judy, be quiet," said the invalid, languidly and yet sharply.

Judy reddened and was silent.

"I am sorry to find you so unwell," I said.

"Yes; I am very ill," he returned.

Aunt and niece rose and left the room quietly.

"Do you suffer much, Mr. Stoddart?"

"Much weariness worse than pain. I could welcome death."

"I do not think, from what Dr. Duncan says of you, that there is reason to apprehend more than a lingering illness," I said—to try him, I confess.

"I hope not indeed," he exclaimed angrily, sitting up in his chair. "What right has Dr. Duncan to talk of me so?"

"To a friend, you know," I returned, apologetically, "who is much interested in your welfare."

"Yes, of course. So is the doctor. A sick man belongs to you both by prescription."

"For my part, I would rather talk about religion to a whole man than a sick man. A sick man is not a whole man. He is but part of a man, as it were, for the time, and it is not so easy to tell what he can take."

"Thank you. I am obliged to you for my new position in the social scale. Of the tailor species, I suppose."

I could not help wishing he were as far up as any man that does such needful honest work.

"My dear sir, I beg your pardon. I meant only a glance at the peculiar relation of the words whole and heal."

"I do not find etymology interesting at present."

"Not seated in such a library as this?"

"No; I am ill.

Satisfied that, ill as he was, he might be better if he would, I resolved to make another trial.

"Do you remember how Ligarius, in Julius Cæsar, discards his sickness?—

> 'I am not sick, if Brutus have in hand
> Any exploit worthy the name of honour.'"

"I want to be well because I don't like to be ill. But what there is in this foggy, swampy world worth being well for I'm sure I haven't found out yet."

"If you have not, it must be because you have never tried to find out. But I'm not going to attack you when you are not able to defend yourself. We shall find a better time for that. But can't I do something for you? Would you like me to read to you for half an hour?"

"No, thank you. The girls tire me out with reading to me. I hate the very sound of their voices."

"I have got to-day's Times in my pocket."

"I've heard all the news already."

"Then I think I shall only bore you if I stay."

He made me no answer. I rose. He let me take his hand, and returned my good morning as if there was nothing good in the world, least of all this same morning.

I found the ladies in the outer room. Judy was on her knees on the floor occupied with a long row of books. How they had got there I wondered; but soon learned the secret which I had asked in vain of the butler on my first visit—namely, how Mr. Stoddart reached the volumes arranged immediately under the ceiling, in shelves, as my reader may remember, that looked like beams radiating from the centre. For Judy rose from the floor, and proceeded to put in motion a mechanical arrangement concealed in one of the divisions of the book-shelves along the wall ; and I now saw that there were strong cords reaching from the ceiling, and attached to the shelf or rather long box sideways open which contained the books.

"Do take care, Judy," said Ethelwyn. "You know it is very venturous of you to let that shelf down, when uncle is as jealous of his books as a hen of her chickens. I oughtn't to have let you touch the cords."

"You couldn't help it, auntie dear ; for I had the shelf half-way down before you saw me," returned Judy, proceeding to raise the books to their usual position under the ceiling.

But in another moment, either from Judy's awkwardness, or from the gradual decay and final fracture of some cord, down came the whole shelf with a thundering noise, and the books were scattered hither and thither in confusion about the floor. Ethelwyn was gazing in dismay, and Judy had built up her face into a defiant look, when the door of the inner room opened and Mr. Stoddart appeared. His brow was already flushed ; but when he saw the condition of his idols (for the lust of the eye had its full share in his regard for his books), he broke out in a passion to which he could not have given way but for the weak state of his health.

"How dare you ?" he said, with terrible emphasis on the word dare. "Judy, I beg you will not again show yourself in my apartment till I send for you."

"And then," said Judy, leaving the room, "I am not in the least likely to be otherwise engaged."

"I am very sorry, uncle," began Miss Oldcastle.

But Mr. Stoddart had already retreated and banged the door behind him. So Miss Oldcastle and I were left standing together amid the ruins.

She glanced at me with a distressed look. I smiled. She smiled in return.

"I assure you," she said, "uncle is not a bit like himself."

"And I fear in trying to rouse him, I have done him no good,—only made him more irritable," I said. "But he will be sorry when he comes to himself, and so we must take the reversion of his repentance now, and think nothing more of the matter than if he had already said he was sorry. Besides, when books are in the case, I, for one, must not be too hard upon my unfortunate neighbour."

"Thank you, Mr. Walton. I am so much obliged to you for taking my uncle's part. He has been very good to me ; and that dear Judy is provoking sometimes. I am afraid I help to spoil her ; but you would hardly believe how good she really is, and what a comfort she is to me—with all her waywardness."

"I think I understand Judy," I replied ; "and I shall be more mistaken than I am willing to confess I have ever been before, if she does not turn out a very fine woman. The marvel to me is that with all the various influences amongst which she is placed here, she is not really, not seriously, spoiled after all. I assure you I have the greatest regard for, as well as confidence in, my friend Judy."

Ethelwyn—Miss Oldcastle, I should say—gave me such a pleased look that I was well recompensed—if justice should ever talk of recompense—for my defence of her niece."

"Will you come with me ?" she said ; "for I fear our talk may continue to annoy Mr. Stoddart. His hearing is acute at all times, and has been excessively so since his illness."

"I am at your service," I returned, and followed her from the room.

"Are you still as fond of the old quarry as you used to be, Miss Oldcastle ?" I said, as we caught a glimpse of it from the window of a long passage we were going through.

"I think I am. I go there most days. I have not been to-day, though. Would you like to go down ?"

"Very much," I said.

"Ah ! I forgot, though. You must not go : it is not a fit place for an invalid."

"I cannot call myself an invalid now."

"Your face, I am sorry to say, contradicts your words."

And she looked so kindly at me, that I almost broke out into thanks for the mere look.

"And indeed," she went on, "it is too damp down there, not to speak of the stairs."

By this time we had reached the little room in which I was received the first time I visited the Hall. There we found Judy.

"If you are not too tired already, I should like to show you my little study. It has, I think, a better view than any other room in the house."

"I shall be delighted, I replied.

"Come, Judy," said her aunt.

"You don't want me, I am sure, auntie."

"I do, Judy, really. You mustn't be cross to us because uncle has been cross to you. Uncle is not well, you know, and isn't a bit like himself ; and you know you should not have meddled with his machinery."

And Miss Oldcastle put her arm round Judy, and kissed her. Whereupon Judy jumped from her seat, threw her book down, and ran to one of the several doors that opened from the room. This disclosed a little staircase, almost like a ladder, only that it wound about, up which we climbed, and reached a charming little room, whose window looked down upon the Bishop's Basin, glimmering slaty through the tops of the trees between. It was panelled in small panels of dark oak, like the room below, but with more of carving. Consequently it was sombre, and its sombreness was unrelieved by any mirror. I gazed about me with a kind of awe. I would gladly have carried away the remembrance of every thing and its shadow. Just opposite the window was a small space of brightness formed by the backs of nicely-bound books. Seeing that these attracted my eye—

"Those are almost all gifts from my uncle," said Miss Oldcastle. "He is really very kind, and you will not think of him as you have seen him to-day?"

"Indeed I will not," I replied.

My eye fell upon a small pianoforte.

"Do sit down," said Miss Oldcastle.—"You have been very ill, and I could do nothing for you who have been so kind to me."

She spoke as if she had wanted to say this.

"I only wish I had a chance of doing anything for you," I said, as I took a chair in the window. "But if I had done all I ever could hope to do, you have repaid me long ago, I think."

"How? I do not know what you mean, Mr. Walton. I have never done you the least service."

"Tell me first, did you play the organ in church that afternoon when—after—before I was taken ill—I mean the same day you had—a friend with you in the pew in the morning?"

I daresay my voice was as irregular as my construction. I just ventured one glance. Her face was flushed. But she answered me at once.

"I did."

"Then I am in your debt more than you know or I can tell you."

"Why, if that is all, I have played the organ every Sunday since uncle was taken ill," she said, smiling.

"I know that now. And I am very glad I did not know it till I was better able to bear the disappointment. But it is only for what I heard that I mean now to acknowledge my obligation. Tell me, Miss Oldcastle,—what is the most precious gift one person can give another?"

She hesitated; and I, fearing to embarrass her, answered for her.

"It must be something imperishable,—something which in its own nature is. If, instead of a gem, or even of a flower, we could cast the gift of a lovely thought into the heart of a friend, that would be giving as the angels, I suppose, must give. But you did more and better for me than that. I had been troubled all the morning; and you made me know that my Redeemer liveth. I did not know you were playing, mind, though I felt a difference. You gave me more trust in God; and what other gift so great could one give? I think that last impression, just as I was taken ill, must have helped me through my illness? Often when I was most oppressed, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth' would rise up in the troubled air of my mind; and sung by a voice which, though I never heard you sing, I never questioned to be yours."

She turned her face towards me: those sea-blue eyes were full of tears.

"I was troubled myself," she said, with a faltering voice, "when I sang—I mean played—that. I am so glad it did somebody good! I fear it did not do me much.—I will sing it to you now, if you like."

And she rose to get the music. But that instant Judy, who, I then found, had left the room, bounded into it, with the exclamation,—

"Auntie, auntie! here's grannie!"

Miss Oldcastle turned pale. I confess I felt embarrassed, as if I had been caught in something underhand.

"Is she come in?" asked Miss Oldcastle, trying to speak with indifference.

"She is just at the door,—must be getting out of the fly now. What shall we do?"

"What do you mean, Judy?" said her aunt.

"Well you know, auntie, as well as I do, that grannie will look as black as a thunder-cloud to find Mr. Walton here; and if she doesn't speak as loud, it will only be because she can't. I don't care for myself, but you know on whose head the storm will fall. Do, dear Mr. Walton, come down the back-stair. Then she won't be a bit the wiser. I'll manage it all."

Here was a dilemma for me; either to bring suffering on that lovely creature, to save whom I would have borne any pain, or to creep out of the house as if I were and ought to be ashamed of myself. I believe that had I been in any other relation to my fellows, I would have resolved at once to lay myself open to the peculiarly unpleasant reproach of sneaking out of the house, rather than that she should innocently suffer for my being innocently there. But I was a clergyman; and I felt, more than I had ever felt before, that therefore I could not risk even the appearance of what was mean. Miss Oldcastle, however, did not leave it to me to settle the matter. All that I have just written had but flashed through my mind when she said:—

"Judy, for shame to propose such a thing to Mr. Walton! I am very sorry that he may chance to have an unpleasant meeting with mamma; but we can't help it. Come, Judy, we will show Mr. Walton out together."

"It wasn't for Mr. Walton's sake," returned Judy, pouting. "You are very troublesome, auntie dear. Mr. Walton, she is so hard to take care of! and she's worse since you came. I shall have to give her up some day. Do be generous, Mr. Walton, and take my side—that is, auntie's."

"I am afraid, Judy, I must thank your aunt for taking the part of my duty against my inclination. But this kindness, at least," I said to Miss Oldcastle, "I can never hope to return."

It was a stupid speech, but I could not be annoyed that I had made it.

"All obligations are not burdens to be got rid of, are they?" she replied, with a sweet smile on such a pale troubled face, that I was more moved for her, deliberately handing her over to the torture for the truth's sake, than I care definitely to confess.

Thereupon, Miss Oldcastle led the way down the stairs, I followed, and Judy brought up the rear. The affair was not so bad as it might have been, inasmuch as, meeting the mistress of the house in no penetralia of the same, I insisted on going out alone, and only met Mrs. Oldcastle in the hall. She held out no hand to greet me. I bowed, and said I was sorry to find Mr. Stoddart so far from well.

"I fear he is far from well," she returned; "certainly in my opinion too ill to receive visitors."

So saying, she bowed and passed on. I turned and walked out, not ill-pleased, as my readers will believe, with my visit.

From that day I recovered rapidly, and the next Sunday had the pleasure of preaching to my flock; Mr. Aikin, the gentleman already mentioned as taking my place, kindly reading prayers for me. I took for my subject one of our Lord's miracles of healing, I forget which now, and tried to show my people that all healing and all kinds of healing came as certainly and only from his hand as those instances in which He put forth his bodily hand and touched the diseased, and told them to be whole.

And as they left the church the organ played, "Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people, saith your God."

I tried hard to prevent my new feelings from so filling my mind as to make me fail of my duty towards my flock. I said to myself, "Let me be the more gentle, the more honourable, the more tender, towards these my brothers and sisters, forasmuch as they are her brothers and sisters too." I wanted to do my work the better that I loved her.

Thus week after week passed, with little that I can remember worthy of record. I seldom saw Miss Oldcastle, and during this period never alone. True, she played the organ still, for Mr. Stoddart continued too unwell to resume his ministry of sound, but I never made any attempt to see her as she came to or went from the organ-loft. I felt that I ought not, or at least that it was better not, lest an interview should trouble my mind, and so interfere with my work, which, if my calling meant anything real, was a consideration of vital import. But one thing I could not help noting—that she seemed, by some intuition, to know the music I liked best; and great help she often gave me by so uplifting my heart upon the billows of the organ harmony, that my thinking became free and harmonious, and I spoke, as far as my own feeling was concerned, like one upheld on the unseen wings of ministering cherubim. How it might be to those who heard me, or what the value of the utterance in itself might he, I cannot tell. I only speak of my own feelings, I say.

Does my reader wonder why I did not yet make any further attempt to gain favour in the lady's eyes? He will see, if he will think for a moment. First of all, I could not venture until she had seen more of me; and how to enjoy more of her society while her mother was so unfriendly, both from instinctive dislike to me, and because of the offence I had given her more than once, I did not know; for I feared that to call oftener might only occasion measures upon her part to prevent me from seeing her daughter at all; and I could not tell how far such measures might expedite the event I most dreaded, or add to the discomfort to which Miss Oldcastle was already so much exposed. Meantime I heard nothing of Captain Everard; and the comfort that flowed from such a negative source was yet of a very positive character. At the same time—will my reader understand me?—I was in some measure deterred from making further advances by the doubt whether her favour for Captain Everard might not be greater than Judy had represented it. I had always shrunk, I can hardly say with invincible dislike, for I had never tried to conquer it, from rivalry of every kind: it was, somehow, contrary to my nature. Besides, Miss Oldcastle was likely to be rich some day—apparently had money of her own even now; and was it a weakness? was it not a weakness?—I cannot tell—I writhed at the thought of being supposed to marry for money, and being made the object of such remarks as, "Ah! you see! That's the way with the clergy! They talk about poverty and faith, pretending to despise riches and to trust in God; but just put money in their way, and what chance will a poor girl have beside a rich one! It's all very well in the pulpit. It's their business to talk so. But does one of them believe it? or, at least, act upon it?" I think I may be a little excused for the sense of creeping cold that passed over me at the thought of such remarks as these, accompanied by compressed lips and down-drawn corners of the mouth, and reiterated nods of the head of knowingness. But I mention this only as a repressing influence, to which I certainly should not have been such a fool as to yield, had I seen the way otherwise clear. For a man by showing how to use money, or rather simply by using money aright, may do more good than by refusing to possess it, if it comes to him in an entirely honourable way, that is, in such a case as mine, merely as an accident of his history. But I was glad to feel pretty sure that if I should be so blessed as to marry Miss Oldcastle—which at the time whereof I now write, seemed far too gorgeous a castle in the clouds ever to descend to the earth for me to enter it—the poor of my own people would be those most likely to understand my position and feelings, and least likely to impute to me worldly motives, as paltry as they are vulgar, and altogether unworthy of a true man.

So the time went on. I called once or twice on Mr. Stoddart, and found him, as I thought, better. But he would not allow that he was. Dr. Duncan said he was better, and would be better still, if he would only believe it and exert himself. He continued in the same strangely irritable humour.

XX.

Winter came apace. When we look towards winter from the last borders of autumn, it seems as if we could not encounter it, and as if it never would go over. So does threatened trouble of any kind seem to us as we look forward upon its miry ways from the last borders of the pleasant greensward on which we have hitherto been walking. But not only do both run their course, but each has its own alleviations, its own pleasures; and very marvellously does the healthy mind fit itself to the new circumstances; while to those who will bravely take up their burden and bear it, asking no more questions than just, "Is this my burden?" a thousand ministrations of nature and life will come with gentle comfortings. Across a dark verdureless field will blow a wind through the heart of the winter which will wake in the patient mind not a memory merely, but a prophecy of the spring, with a glimmer of crocus, or snowdrop, or primrose; and across the waste of tired endeavour will a gentle hope, coming he knows not whence, breathe springlike upon the heart of the man around whom life looks waste and dreary. Well do I remember a friend of mine telling me once—he was then a labourer in the field of literature, who had not yet begun to earn his penny a day, though he worked hard—telling me how once, when a hope that had kept him active for months was suddenly quenched—a book refused on which he had spent a passion of labour—the weight of money that must be paid and could not be had, pressing him down like the coffin-lid that had lately covered the only friend to whom he could have gone confidently for aid—telling me, I say, how he stood at the corner of a London street, with the rain dripping black from the brim of his hat, the dreariest of atmospheres about him in the closing afternoon of the City, when the rich men were going home, and the poor men who worked for them were longing to follow; and how across this waste came energy and hope into his bosom, swelling thenceforth with courage to fight and yield no ear to suggested failure. And the story would not be complete—though it is for the fact of the arrival of unexpected and apparently unfounded hope that I tell it—if I did not add, that, in the morning, his wife gave him a letter which their common trouble of yesterday had made her forget, and which had lain with its black border all night in the darkness unopened, waiting to tell him how the vanished friend had not forgotten him on her death-bed, but had left him enough to take him out of all those difficulties, and give him strength and time to do far better work than the book which had failed of birth.—Some of my readers may doubt whether I am more than "a wandering voice," but whatever I am, or may be thought to be, my friend's story is true.

And all this has come out of the winter that I, in the retrospect of my history, am looking forward to. It came, with its fogs, and dripping boughs, and sodden paths, and rotting leaves, and rains, and sky of weary grey; but also with its fierce red suns, shining aslant upon sheets of manna-like hoarfrost, and delicate ice-films over prisoned waters, and those white falling chaoses of perfect forms called snow-storms—those confusions confounded of infinite symmetries.

And when the hard frost came, it brought a friend to my door. It was Mr. Stoddart.

He entered my room with something of the countenance Naaman must have borne, after his flesh had come again like unto the flesh of a little child. He did not look ashamed, but his pale face looked humble and distressed. Its somewhat self-satisfied placidity had vanished, and instead of the diffused geniality which was its usual expression, it now showed traces of feeling as well as plain signs of suffering. I gave him as warm a welcome as I could, and having seated him comfortably by the fire, and found that he would take no refreshment, began to chat about the day's news, for I had just been reading the newspaper. But he showed no interest beyond what the merest politeness required. I would try something else.

"The cold weather, which makes so many invalids creep into bed, seems to have brought you out into the air, Mr. Stoddart," I said.

"It has revived me, certainly."

"Indeed, one must believe that winter and cold are as beneficent, though not so genial, as summer and its warmth. Winter kills many a disease and many a noxious influence. And what is it to have the fresh green leaves of spring instead of the everlasting brown of some countries which have no winter!"

I talked thus, hoping to rouse him to conversation, and I was successful.

"I feel just as if I were coming out of a winter. Don't you think illness is a kind of human winter?"

"Certainly—more or less stormy. With some a winter of snow and hail and piercing winds; with others of black frosts and creeping fogs, with now and then a glimmer of the sun."

"The last is more like mine. I feel as if I had been in a wet hole in the earth."

"And many a man," I went on, "the foliage of whose character had been turning brown and seared and dry, rattling rather than rustling in the faint hot wind of even fortunes, has come out of the winter of a weary illness with the fresh delicate buds of a new life bursting from the sun-dried bark."

"I wish it would be so with me. I know you mean me. But I don't feel my green leaves coming."

"Facts are not always indicated by feelings."

"Indeed, I hope not; nor yet feelings indicated by facts."

"I do not quite understand you."

"Well, Mr. Walton, I will explain myself. I have come to tell you how sorry and ashamed I am that I behaved so badly to you every time you came to see me."

"Oh, nonsense!" I said. "It was your illness, not you."

"At least, my dear sir, the facts of my behaviour did not really represent my feelings towards you."

"I know that as well as you do. Don't say another word about it. You had the best excuse for being cross: I should have had none for being offended."

"It was only the outside of me."

"Yes, yes; I acknowledge it heartily."

"But that does not settle the matter between me and myself, Mr. Walton; although, by your goodness, it settles it between me and you. It is humiliating to think that illness should so completely 'overcrow' me, that I am no more myself—lose my hold, in fact, of what I call me—so that I am almost driven to doubt my personal identity."

"You are fond of theories, Mr. Stoddart—perhaps a little too much so."

"Perhaps."

"Will you listen to one of mine?"

"With pleasure."

"It seems to me sometimes—I know it is a partial representation—as if life were a conflict between the inner force of the spirit, which lies in its faith in the unseen—and the outer force of the world, which lies in the pressure of everything it has to show us. The material, operating upon our senses, is always asserting its existence; and if our inner life is not equally vigorous, we shall be moved, urged, what is called actuated, from without, whereas all our activity ought to be from within. But sickness not only overwhelms the mind, but, vitiating all the channels of the senses, causes them to represent things as they are not, of which misrepresentations the presence, persistency, and iteration seduce the man to act from false suggestions instead of from what he knows and believes."

"Well, I understand all that. But what use am I to make of your theory?"

"I am delighted, Mr. Stoddart, to hear you put the question. That is always the point.—The inward holy garrison, that of faith, which holds by the truth, by sacred facts, and not by appearances, must be strengthened and nourished and upheld, and so enabled to resist the onset of the powers without. A friend's remonstrance may appear an unkindness—a friend's jest an unfeelingness—a friend's visit an intrusion; nay, to come to higher things, during a mere headache it will appear as if there was no truth in the world, no reality but that of pain anywhere, and nothing to be desired but deliverance from it. But all such impressions caused from without—for, remember, the body and its innermost experiences are only outside of the man—have to be met by the inner confidence of the spirit, resting in God, and resisting every impulse to act according to that which appears to it instead of that which it believes. Hence, Faith is thus allegorically represented: but I had better give you Spenser's description of her.—Here is the 'Fairy Queen':—

> 'She was arrayed all in lily white,
> And in her right hand bore a cup of gold,
> With wine and water filled up to the height,
> In which a serpent did himself enfold,
> That horror made to all that did behold;
> But she no whit did change her constant mood.'

This serpent stands for the dire perplexity of things about us, at which yet Faith will not blench, acting according to what she believes, and not what shows itself to her by impression and appearance."

"I admit all that you say," returned Mr. Stoddart. "But still the practical conclusion—which I understand to be, that the inward garrison must be fortified—is considerably incomplete unless we buttress it with the final How. How is it to be fortified? For,

> 'I have as much of this in art as you,
> But yet my nature could not bear it so.'

(You see I read Shakspere as well as you, Mr. Walton). I daresay, from a certain inclination to take the opposite side, and a certain dislike to the dogmatism of the clergy—I speak generally—I may have appeared to you indifferent, but I assure you that I have laboured much to withdraw my mind from the influence of money, and ambition, and pleasure, and to turn it to the contemplation of spiritual things. Yet on the first attack of a depressing illness I cease to be a gentleman, I am rude to ladies who do their best and kindest to serve me, and I talk to the friend who comes to cheer and comfort me as if he were an idle vagrant who wanted to sell me a worthless book with the recommendation of the pretence that he wrote it himself. Now that I am in my right mind, I am ashamed of myself, ashamed that it should be possible for me to behave so, and humiliated yet besides that I have no ground of assurance that, should my illness return to-morrow, I should not behave in the same manner the day after. I want to be always in my right mind. When I am not, I know I am not, and yet yield to the appearance of being."

"I understand perfectly what you mean, for I fancy I know a little more of illness than you do. Shall I tell you where I think the fault of your self-training lies?"

"That is just what I want. The things which it pleased me to contemplate when I was well, gave me no pleasure when I was ill. Nothing seemed the same."

"If we were always in a right mood, there would be no room for the exercise of the will. We should go by our mood and inclination only. But that is by the bye.—Where you have been wrong is—that you have sought to influence your feelings only by thought and argument with yourself, and not also by contact with your fellows. Besides the ladies of whom you have spoken, I think you have hardly a friend in this neighbourhood but myself. One friend cannot afford you half experience enough to teach you the relations of life and of human needs. At best, under such circumstances, you can only have right theories: practice for realizing them in yourself is nowhere. It is no more possible for a man in the present day to retire from his fellows into the cave of his religion, and thereby leave the world of his own faults and follies behind, than it was possible for the eremites of old to get close to God in virtue of declining the duties which their very birth of human father and mother laid upon them. I do not deny that you and the eremite may both come nearer to God, in virtue of whatever is true in your desires and your worship; 'but if a man love not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?'—which surely means to imply at least that to love our neighbour is a great help towards loving God. How this love is to come about without intercourse, I do not see. And how without this love we are to bear up from within against the thousand irritations to which, especially in sickness, our unavoidable relations with humanity will expose us, I cannot tell either."

"But," returned Mr. Stoddart, "I had had a true regard for you, and some friendly communication with you. If human intercourse were what is required in my case, how should I fail just with respect to the only man with whom I had held such intercourse?"

"Because the relations in which you stood with me were those of the individual, not of the race. You like me, because I am fortunate enough to please you—to be a gentleman, I hope—to be a man of some education, and capable of understanding, or at least docile enough to try to understand, what you tell me of your plans and pursuits. But you do not feel any relation to me on the ground of my humanity—that God made me, and therefore I am your brother. It is not because we grow out of the same stem, but merely because my leaf is a little like your own, that you draw to me. Our Lord took on Him the nature of man: you will only regard your individual attractions. Disturb your liking, and your love vanishes."

"You are severe."

"I don't mean really vanishes, but disappears for the time. Yet you will confess you have to wait till, somehow, you know not how, it comes back again—of itself, as it were."

"Yes, I confess. To my sorrow, I find it so."

"Let me tell you the truth, Mr. Stoddart. You seem to me to have been hitherto only a dilettante or amateur in spiritual matters. Do not imagine I mean a hypocrite. Very far from it. The word amateur itself suggests a real interest, though it may be of a superficial nature. But in religion one must be all there. You seem to me to have taken much interest in unusual forms of theory, and in mystical speculations, to which in themselves I make no objection. But to be content with those, instead of knowing God himself, or to substitute a general amateur friendship towards the race for the love of your neighbour, is a mockery which will always manifest itself to an honest mind like yours in such failure and disappointment in your own character as you are now lamenting, if not indeed in some mode far more alarming, because gross and terrible."

"Am I to understand you, then, that intercourse with one's neighbours ought to take the place of meditation?"

"By no means: but ought to go side by side with it, if you would have at once a healthy mind to judge and the means of either verifying your speculations or discovering their falsehood."

"But where am I to find such friends besides yourself with whom to hold spiritual communion?"

"It is the communion of spiritual deeds, deeds of justice, of mercy, of humility—the kind word, the cup of cold water, the visitation in sickness, the lending of money—not spiritual conference or talk, that I mean: the latter will come of itself where it is natural. You would soon find that it is not only to those whose spiritual windows are of the same shape as your own that you are neighbour: There is one poor man in my congregation who knows more—practically, I mean, too—of spirituality of mind than any of us. Perhaps you could not teach him much, but he could teach you. At all events, our neighbours are just those round about us. And the most ignorant man in a little place like Marshmallows, one like you with leisure ought to know and understand, and have some good influence upon: he is your brother whom you are bound to care for and elevate—I do not mean socially, but really, in himself—if it be possible. You ought at least to get into some simple human relation with him, as you would with the youngest and most ignorant of your brothers and sisters born of the same father and mother; approaching him, not with pompous lecturing or fault-finding, still less with that abomination called condescension, but with the humble service of the elder to the younger, in whatever they may be helped by you without injury to them. Never was there a more injurious mistake than that it is the business of the clergy only to have the care of souls."

"But that would be endless. It would leave me no time for myself."

"Would that be no time for yourself spent in leading a noble, Christian life; in verifying the words of our Lord by doing them; in building your house on the rock of action instead of the sands of theory; in widening your own being by entering into the nature, thoughts, feelings, even fancies of those around you? In such intercourse you would find health radiating into your own bosom; healing sympathies springing up in the most barren acquaintance; channels opened for the in-rush of truth into your own mind; and opportunities afforded for the exercise of that self-discipline, the lack of which led to the failures which you now bemoan. Soon then would you have cause to wonder how much some of your speculations had fallen into the background, simply because the truth, showing itself grandly true, had so filled and occupied your mind that it left no room for anxiety about such questions as, while secured in the interest all reality gives, were yet dwarfed by the side of it. Nothing, I repeat, so much as humble ministration to your neighbours, will help you to that perfect love of God which casteth out fear; nothing but the love of God—that God revealed in Christ—will make you able to love your neighbour aright; and the Spirit of God, which alone gives might for any good, will by these loves, which are life, strengthen you at last to believe in the light even in the midst of darkness; to hold the resolution formed in health when sickness has altered the appearance of everything around you; and to feel tenderly towards your fellow, even when you yourself are plunged in dejection or racked with pain.—But," I said, "I fear I have transgressed the bounds of all propriety by enlarging upon this matter as I have done. I can only say I have spoken in proportion to my feeling of its weight and truth."

"I thank you heartily," returned Mr. Stoddart, rising. "And I promise you at least to think over what you have been saying.—I hope to be in my old place in the organ-loft next Sunday."

So he was. And Miss Oldcastle was in the pew with her mother. Nor did she go any more to Addicehead to church.

THE CRY OF THE WEARY.

BY AN EAST-END BLACKSMITH.

SPIRIT OF MERCY! bow thine head,
Thy pinions light stretch forth;
Descending from thy native skies,
Come, visit me on earth.

I have been mourning long for thee,
To see thee hither turn;
If thou wilt come, come near to me,
I can no longer mourn.

My weariness shall pass away,
Nor leave a fear behind;
In walking with the Lamb of God
Unbroken rest I find.

And pleasures true shall bloom for me,
Like blossoms fresh and gay;
For me shall living fountains gush
Along the peaceful way.

Come, then, sweet Spirit, hear and come;
Come, Jesus, come to me;
And when Thou bid'st me rise from earth,
Let me come safe to Thee. E. C.

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

VII.—PERSEVERANCE IN WELL-DOING.

ACTIVITY, as much as anything, and more than most things else, is that which distinguishes life from death. How still, as well as solemn, the chamber of the dead! Death has been called a long sleep, and sleep a short death; and they resemble each other much—sleep, with eyelids closed, the ears shut, the lips sealed, and a countenance calm, unimpassioned, without one trace of the griefs, and fears, and cares that lie buried in temporary oblivion, simulating death. Yet the heaving chest; though subdued, the audible and measured breathing; though faint, the living colour on the cheek; and the warm touch, so different from death's icy hand and marble brow, bespeak functions active amid repose; and show how life never rests, and wears in sleep but the mask of death. Things inanimate—as dead bodies, stones and metals, earth, air, and water—are passive. On the other hand, all animate are active creatures; as well the insect that flits in its play from flower to flower, as the angels that, speeding forth on God's high errands, fly from heaven to earth, or from world to world. So closely associated, and indeed inseparable, are the ideas of activity and life, that we at once conclude what is inactive to be inanimate—the bird that, dropping to the gun, lies motionless; the soldier who, with ball through head or heart, springs into the air, and falling on the ground, never more moves a limb; the dying man that, sinking back on his pillow, heaves one long sigh, and breathes and stirs no more. We pronounce these dead without a moment's hesitation. There may be the appearance of life but certainly not its presence, where there is no activity; as they rightly concluded who, sailing in Arctic seas, fell in with a ship, for long years imprisoned in the ice, and looked in its cabin on a strange, appalling, weird-like scene. Fifty years had come and gone since living voice or step had sounded there, yet all the crew were there. They lay in couches on the floor, each attired in the dress and presenting the form and flesh of life; while their captain sat by the cabin table, pen in hand, and the log spread out before him. The spectators of so strange a sight, with mingled feelings of doubt and terror, shouted; but no response came back. Nor crew nor captain stirred. All were dead, and had been corpses for half-a-century—the frosts that killed, preserving them. Life-like as he looked who bent over the table with a pen in his fingers and the paper before him, in which, the last survivor, he had recorded their sufferings, he also was dead; as they knew on seeing him sit unmoved by their shouts; his eyes retaining their glassy stare, and his form its fixed and frozen posture.

The activity that thus marks all other kinds of life is characteristic of the Christian's. Sometimes distinguished by heroic daring, and prodigal of noble deeds, at all times it is a life of doing; is so even when, feeble as an infant, the believer lies helpless on a Saviour's bosom, and living chiefly on the milk of promises, is able to do little else than express his wants in prayers and plaintive cries. And, as the spiritual, like the natural, life advances in course of time to maturity, this activity goes on to complete development. It so increases by increase of grace that, with a heart which beats more and more true to the love of God, with feet that walk, hands that work, and a tongue that speaks in his service, the Christian, once a babe, grows into a man in Christ; his model He who, in contrast to him that walketh about like a roaring lion seeking whom he may devour, went about continually doing good. For, while doing, or activity, characterises all life, "doing good," or "well-doing," is the peculiar character of the Christian's life. The "well-doing" of earth is what heaven shall greet with its own "Well done;"—"Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." And what an inspiring and powerful incentive does this, with many things else, present to persevere in grace; to "be careful to maintain good works," and again to quote the words of the apostle, "not to be weary in well doing?"

In regard to the duty of not being weary in well-doing, I remark that, although there is not much difference in sound, there is a great difference in sense, between being wearied in a work and wearied of it. Of this difference sick rooms often supply examples. The nurse who moves about there by day with professional coolness, when the house is still at night, nor sound breaks the silence, but the beating of the clock and the feverish breathing of her charge, drops asleep, weary of the tedium of watching. Not so the mother, trembling for a life that is trembling in the balance—all her cares, anxieties, and thoughts, save in the prayers she sends off to heaven, shut up within the narrow space of that chamber's walls. Her sunken eye, and pallid cheek, and feeble step bespeaking exhaustion, have awoke other's fears for her; but, strong in love that is deaf to remonstrance, she refuses to leave her post; and if, heavy with grief and care, her drooping eyelids close, it is because she is wearied with watching, not weary of it; on the contrary, racked with anxiety, she fights with sleep, and starts from its short, broken slumbers at the poor sufferer's faintest cry, or feeblest moan.

Amid other scenes—those of war, for example—the same distinction presents itself. Animated by no ambition, no love of country, no spirit of daring enterprise, this soldier gets tired of the long marches, the ill-requited hazards and hardships of the campaign. Seizing the first opportunity to leave, he returns home to enjoy inglorious ease, and hear birds rather than bullets whistle. Another, his companion both at school and in the ranks of war, returns also in course of time to their native village; but his sleeve is empty, and he wears grey hairs on his head as well as medals on his breast. Wearied, not of, but in, the war for liberty, he left his gallant comrades with reluctance, and eyes which filled with tears as he took a long, last look of the colours that, rent and riddled, waved above him in many a hard-contested field. In these men we see the well-marked difference between being wearied in a work and weary of it.

To take an example from sacred story, we see it in two persons there—the one a prominent, the other a pre-eminent character; the one a type, the other the great antitype; both, though unlike in these things, like in this—that they lie buried in the arms of sleep. Look at the prophet Jonah, and at Jesus! Weary not merely in, but of, a service which called him to endure hardships that he disliked and face dangers in Nineveh that he greatly dreaded, Jonah thought to put the sea between him and these; and not these only, but God also. For this purpose, he took ship and fled—a deserter from his post. Exhausted with anxiety of mind and toil of body, the fugitive falls asleep; nor, though the tempest roared, and the ship reeled and pitched and plunged amid the stormy billows, wakes till a rough hand shakes him, and a voice cries in his alarmed ear, "Arise, oh thou that sleepest, and call upon thy God!" From that sea turn to another—swept by as fierce a storm, lashed into as angry waves. Caught in the sudden tempest, a solitary boat is tearing its way there, on the lake of Galilee. The crew are pulling for their lives. In vain the struggle! Wave after wave breaks over them, filling their bark. They bale, but she is ready to founder. A few moments more, and, but that they carried Jesus, these, like other fishermen, had found a grave where they were wont to find their bread. And, ere the Master rises to rebuke the tempest, and bid the waves be still, how is he employed? He sleeps; sleeps stretched on a hard bench, beneath a boat-cloak, with the sea breaking over his prostrate form, amid the blaze of lightning, peals of thunder, and the loud uproar of angry elements—sleeps like an infant rocked in its cradle, or warmly nestled in a mother's breast. Nights passed in prayer, and days spent in preaching or in incessant labours of benevolence, have exhausted his frame, drying up all his strength; and there Jesus lies in calm, deep sleep, a wonderful example—the most wonderful the world has seen—of one wearied, not of, but in, his Father's business.

In regard to this well-doing in which Christ's followers desire and try to live, it is quite different from the "well-to-do" and "well-doing" of the world, as it uses and understands these expressions. They present examples of that abuse of language which, with other sins of his day, Isaiah so strongly condemned. In that remarkable chapter where he denounces Covetousness, saying, "Woe unto them that join house to house, and add field to field"—denounces Intemperance, saying, "Woe unto them that rise up early in the morning that they may follow strong drink; that continue until night till wine inflame them; that are mighty to drink wine, and men of strength to mingle strong drink," the prophet thunders out his woe against another great, if not greater evil. Addressing men who play with conscience and poison the fountains of truth, who bedizen the cheek of vice, and throw the robe of an angel over the form of a fiend, "Woe," says Isaiah, "unto them that call evil good, and good evil; that put darkness for light, and light for darkness; that put bitter for sweet, and sweet for bitter." Every age, present or remote, has sought in this way to gloze over sin. For example, sceptics and infidels —as if all who believe in God's word were enslaved— claim to be "Free Thinkers;" again, the vile seducer is only described as "loose" who, under the mask of affection, steals in her virtue woman's most precious jewel, and tramples on her bleeding heart; again, they are merely said to live "fast" who wreck their fortunes, ruin their hapless children, impair their constitution, precipitate their death, drown their senses and damn their souls with drink; again, "unfortunate" is the mild term applied to her who, like a night wolf, prowls the streets for prey, and whose den, in the judgment of Solomon, and the bitter experience of her victims, is "the way to hell;" again, the duellists, who went out to settle a petty quarrel with loaded pistols, and shoot each other dead, were said to engage in "an affair of honour;" and, but some few years ago, "the domestic institution" was the soft and gentle term applied to that wide-spread, gigantic, infamous, infernal slavery, from the stain, the burning shame, and bitter curse of which America has only escaped by years of war, at the cost of millions of money and rivers of human blood. Here is a misapplication of terms nearly as gross. "Calling evil good, putting light for darkness and bitter for sweet," those who grow rich, no matter how—who, turning a deaf ear to every holy and humane appeal, to the claims of widows, the cries of orphans, the miseries of a world that perishes in ignorance and sin, heap up wealth, are said to be "well-to-do" in the world; at market and on change, are spoken of as "doing well." A "well doing" and "well-to-do" this, that shall meet no "Well done" from the Judge of all, at the last day and on the great white throne. Blessed award, it is reserved for such as have modelled their lives on His who, beginning life in a borrowed cradle and closing it in a borrowed grave, spent its years in hard toil and yet harder poverty—envying the foxes their holes and the birds of the air their nests!

A busy, useful, holy life, and none other, is a life of well-doing; is a noble life, though passed in a cottage; is a happy one, though its path be rough and thorny. In a world where there is much to do, it allots little time for self-enjoyments, and no time for sinful ones. Filled up with the duties of home and business, with the paramount interests of eternity and of our souls, with good deeds done to others, and the claims they have on our help, its days, instead of walking on leaden feet, seem to fly on eagles' wings —the busiest life appearing all too idle, and the longest proving all too short for the work we have to do. Like a toil-worn labourer, weary in though not of his work, the Christian may sometimes wish it were concluded, and long for sun-set that he might leave the field to go home—his the desire of the Psalmist, Oh, that I had the wings of a dove, that I might fly away and be at rest! Yet toiling and enduring, bearing others' burdens along with his own, living not for himself, regarding every day as lost which is not marked by some good got or done, and regarding himself as the steward of God's bounty—not a lord but a labourer in the vineyard, that man, though he may be weary in, will not be weary of well-doing. Such a life was Paul's—he declared himself ready gladly to spend and to be spent for Christ. Such a life was Dorcas'—she employed her fingers making clothes for the poor, and, unlike many who die leaving none to miss them, had a crowd of widows to weep by her bier. Such a life was Job's, who, while humbling himself in the dust before God, stood erect before the world, in these noble terms to describe and justify his character, "When the ear heard me then it blessed me, and when the eye saw me it gave witness to me, because I delivered the poor that cried, the fatherless, and him that had none to help him; the blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me: and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy. I put on righteousness and it clothed me; my judgment was as a robe and diadem. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame; I was a father to the poor." And, obscuring all others, as does the sun the stars, by its superior lustre, such a life was His who, our pattern and propitiation both, calls us by his example, as by his word, to well-doing—saying, as he points to the crown glittering on the top of a cross, If any man will be my disciple, let him deny himself daily, take up his cross, and follow me.

Christ's followers, though weary of, are to persevere in their work, watch, and warfare — persevere to the end; like Gideon and his three hundred men, though "faint, yet pursuing." If, for the sake of illustration, we select the last of these three grand branches of Christian duty, the warfare, namely, where could we find a better pattern than his case supplies? Whether the overwhelming numbers of the enemy, or the extraordinary means of their defeat is considered, the victory which he and his band achieved, and followed up with unsparing slaughter, is one of the most remarkable on record. God's foes and his, the Midianites and Amalekites, we are told, "lay along in the Valley of Jezreel, like grasshoppers for multitude—their camels without number, as the sand on the sea-side for multitude." Inspired of God, Gideon steps from the threshing-floor to summon his countrymen to arms; and, peasants leaving the plough in the furrow, shepherds their flocks on the hill, fishermen their boats by the shore, the bridegroom the marriage festival, and orphans their father's bier, they crowd to his standard. Two and thirty thousand men muster to the bloody fight; and on vantage ground, in some mountain gorge, what might not such an army accomplish with every man resolved to do or to die, to conquer or to perish? But, when the chaff is blown away, the thirty-two are reduced to ten thousand; and these again to no more than three hundred men. "If thou art afraid," said the Lord to Gideon—nor great wonder he should be with such odds against him — "go with thy servant down to the host and hear what they say."

With noiseless foot, wrapped in the cloud of night, he steals on the camp, and, listening, hears two soldiers talking—one tells how he dreamt that a barley cake came tumbling into the host, and, strange result, overturned a tent; a dream his comrade interprets, saying, "This is nothing else than the sword of Gideon, for into his hand God hath delivered Midian and all the host. Hailing the happy omen, Gideon stealthily withdraws, and, breasting the hill with light heart, rushes in among his little band to cry, "Arise! the Lord hath delivered the host of Midian into your hand!" They spring to their feet; and each man with a sword by his thigh, a trumpet in one hand and in the other a pitcher with a burning lamp within, they follow their leader—his only order this, As I do, so shall ye do! It is the middle watch; and the mighty host, whose camp they silently encircle, lies buried in slumber. Each man holds his breath; silent and motionless he listens, and, bending forward, peers through the gloom for the expected signal. Suddenly Gideon's trumpet, blown loud and clear, rings through the silence, and a lamp —for he has broken his pitcher—flashes on the darkness of night. Lost in astonishment, the sentinels stop on their round; but ere they have time to raise the alarm, hundreds of lights are flashing, hundreds of trumpets sounding: and on all sides the air is rent with shouts and this wild battle cry, "The sword of the Lord and Gideon!" Springing to their feet and rushing from their tents, the whole host is panic-struck; and, mistaking friends for foes in the darkness and confusion, men grapple with their neighbours, and draw their swords to bury them in each other's bosoms. The uproar grows wilder and wilder; the carnage rages fiercer and fiercer; Gideon and his men, the while, standing by to see the salvation of God. The host destroys itself. God wins the victory; and they who struck no blow reap the fruit—Gideon's only part being to put the broken, bleeding fugitives to the sword, and hang on their rear, "faint, yet pursuing."

The part we have to act in the Christian warfare is similar to this; and similar to this should be the way we do it. Gideon's followers were first reduced from two-and-thirty to ten thousand, and again reduced to three hundred; these being made spectators rather than actors in the bloody drama, that they might not say, Mine own hand hath saved me! Such is the story of the Cross. There, like Gideon and his men on the midnight plains of Jezreel, we stood by to see the salvation of our God—Satan, the enemy of our souls, bruised under the conqueror's heel. Jesus, not we, won that great victory. We struck no blow, we had no hand in it whatever; yet like those who hung on the rear of Midian, slaughtering their flying foes, we have a part to act—our part this, to complete, if I may say so, the work which Christ began; to destroy every vestige of life in the serpent whose head he crushed; to expel sin wholly from our hearts and our habits, as Gideon expelled its enemies out of the land of Israel.

He who is converted, believes, and is thereby savingly united to Christ, has still, to use the words of Nehemiah, "a great work to do." We enter then on a harder task than Gideon's. His enemies, paralysed with terror, flying like a flock of sheep that barking dogs pursue, fell without an attempt at resistance. Not so does Satan yield. He makes desperate efforts to rally his scattered forces, and recover the ground he has lost. By no means easily expelled, he lurks in our habits and hides in the recesses of our hearts. Now a cunning serpent and now a roaring lion, at one time with devilish craft he proposes terms of peace, and at another, seeking not to deceive, but to cast us into despair, he comes forth, boastful as Goliath, to defy the armies of the living God. And even when he flies, as the apostle assures us he will do if we resist him, he flies like the ancient Parthians—fighting all the while, and with the fiery darts he shoots, putting the believer's peace in jeopardy, and making his armour ring. Having self to conquer, with a carnal heart to crucify, evil passions to subdue, and habits to break off which age and indulgence have fostered into a second nature, our part of the work, instead of being finished, may be said to begin at the period of conversion. Nor is any sin,—though flesh and blood plead for it, saying: It is but a little one,—to be spared. "Cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood!" In this holy war there is to be no truce proclaimed, nor quarter given. Whoso nameth the name of the Lord is to depart from all iniquity; to cast out all sin. No easy work! I know a weed which, more than any other that infests the ground, gardeners and husbandmen find it troublesome to extirpate. Shooting its long, knotted fibres under the surface, spreading in all soils, whether rich or poor, with unexampled rapidity, it survives being crushed beneath the heel, or cut into morsels with the spade; and, tenacious of life, springs again if the smallest portion of its root has been left in the ground. Such is sin. It is very hard to destroy: yet must be wholly rooted out of the life and out of the heart, since, if we do not kill sin, sin will kill us.

Now, God's people ought never to forget that this perseverance in well-doing, whatever department of the Christian life they be engaged in, they cannot maintain without drawing constantly on the grace of God. The wick which is left to burn without a due supply of oil soon burns dim; and, going out, leaves the house to darkness. Constant cropping exhausts the most fertile soil, nor do reapers long gather harvests from its bosom unless it be fed with manures, or allowed to rest. And who does not know that the amount of work to be obtained out of either men or horses, depends on the quality and quantity of their food. Indeed, Wellington used to say that victories were won not so much by him or others who led the troops to battle, as by the Commissariat—those who were charged with finding provisions for the army; and history relates how the fate of one great battle was determined by one good meal—victory remaining with those who had broken their fast before they went into action.

Called to resist the devil, to overcome the world, and, what is more difficult than either, or perhaps than both, to crucify the flesh; called to work out our salvation with fear and trembling, and, what is yet more difficult, to "stand still and see the salvation of God ;" called in life's active duties to do his will, and, what often proves more difficult, under sore bereavements and heavy trials to bear it—our only hope, and all-sufficient help is in the Spirit of God. Unless constantly supplied with grace the brightest light will burn dim ; all spiritual vigour will decay ; and, like soil the husbandman scourges with constant cropping nor nourishes with manure, the soul will soon have to cry, "My leanness, my leanness !" So there is no saving so bad as that which grudges time for seeking those divine supplies which we obtain in the use of prayer, of the Bible, and of those other channels through which they are wont to flow. There are bad savings. Humble life affords examples of them in those who, leaving venerable parents to poverty or public alms, save money to buy gaudy dresses ; and the higher walks of life, also, in such as, refusing the claims of charity and religion, hoard up riches for children to waste on vanity or their vices ; but of all savings the worst is time saved for the business or pleasures of life off that which should be given to communion with God, the Bible, and prayer, in the morning or at the close of the day. How can he escape wounds who rushes into battle without taking time to put his armour on ? To win the fight, a man must gird on his weapons ; to draw sweet music from an instrument, he must tune its strings ; nor can a labourer endure the tear and wear of work, if he neglects his food,—unless he supplies the waste of bone and muscle with nutritious meals. The soul, not less than the body, wants its necessary food.

A most important truth ! To overlook it—but that the covenant of grace is well-ordered in all things and sure—would involve us in a fate worse than his who some winters ago owed his death to neglecting the means necessary for the support of life. The fatal morning broke dimly on hills all white with snow, and a sky along which the tempest hurled thick blinding drift. Alarmed for his flock, the shepherd dressed in haste ; and, deaf to the entreaties of a prudent wife who implored him to eat and strengthen nature for the coming struggle, he pulled his bonnet on his brow, and went out into the storm. It was bravely but rashly done. He never came back. Denied her necessary support, nature speedily sank under his violent exertions ; and he perished—the sleep he sought on the snow bank where they found his stiffened corpse, deepening into the torpor of death, the sleep that knows no waking. And if not their death—for they that are in Christ shall not finally perish—to what do saints often owe their falls and failings, but to their neglect of prayer, and of God's word, and of other divinely appointed means of grace ? He who would work without ceasing, must pray without ceasing. He who would do great things for God, must seek great things from Him. It is well, though faint, like Gideon, to be pursuing—getting on to heaven, though with faltering steps and many falls ; but it is better not to fall, to be pursuing and not fainting, constantly going on in the strength of the Lord.

Still, it is no great wonder that God's people are sometimes ready to faint. The servant is no better than his master, and in Gethsemane Jesus himself sank under the weight of his mysterious burden. Even his strength seemed unequal to the task, as thrice under an agony that rent his bosom with groans and bedewed the grass with blood, he implored his Father, saying, Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me ! The Saviour almost fainted. The greatest saints have done so. Though no fragile reed bending to the wind, but rather like a lighthouse tower, that shining through the deepest gloom and rising from the solid rock, holds itself erect amid tempests which snap the stoutest masts, and, sending ships staggering through the waves, strew the shore with wrecks, Elijah fainted. Despairing of success, he abandoned his post ; threw up the helm ; took his strong hand from the plough ; and, wearied and worn out with what appeared a hopeless task, cast himself at God's feet to cry, O Lord, it is enough, take away my life ! We can enter into his feelings. How often does it seem impossible that we shall ever walk without stumbling, ever love God with all our hearts, ever closely follow Christ's holy footsteps, ever be ready and ripe for heaven ? Yet in such well-doing, let not God's people weary. In the pursuit of such noble, exalted objects, why should they faint ? The sweat standing on his brow, and the blood of the heathen dripping from his sword, Gideon, as he pressed on the flying foe, sought bread at the gate of Succoth. His request was refused ; and, the more honour to him and his followers, though refused and faint, they resumed the pursuit. But did any ever ask strength of God for well-doing, for his work, or watch, or warfare, and find the gates of prayer, like those of Succoth, shut in his face ? No. HE GIVETH POWER TO THE FAINT, AND TO THEM THAT HAVE NO MIGHT HE INCREASETH STRENGTH. EVEN THE YOUTHS SHALL FAINT AND BE WEARY, AMD THE YOUNG MEN SHALL UTTERLY FAIL ; BUT THEY THAT WAIT UPON THE LORD SHALL RENEW THEIR STRENGTH ; THEY SHALL MOUNT UP WITH WINGS AS EAGLES ; THEY SHALL RUN AND NOT BE WEARY ; THEY SHALL WALK AND NOT FAINT.

THE HYMNS OF THE REFORMATION.

AT the opening of the sixteenth century the whole religious life of Europe was crushed under the weight of the ecclesiastical institutions of Rome. Gloomy representations of the true faith, or baleful parodies of an extinct idolatry, filled Christendom. The childlike voices which had lisped "Abba Father," and the joyful music which had once filled the earth, were silent ; so silent that the echoes of the song sung when the Babe was born in Bethlehem were only to be heard among the persecuted brethren of Bohemia, and the Waldenses in the Piedmontese valleys. Christ's church was represented to the multitudes under the similitude of a great ship, as in the celebrated painting at Magdeburg, wherein was no layman, not even an emperor or elector. In the prow, overshadowed by the Holy Ghost, were the pope, the cardinals, and the bishops; these, with the monks and priests, were all sailing easily heavenward. All round the ship were laymen struggling in the water. Some were drowning, others were drawing themselves up to the ship by means of ropes, which the monks, moved with pity, threw out to them. As ecclesiastics only were in the ship, so laymen only were in the water, never a cardinal, bishop, priest, or monk. This was the idea of salvation which pervaded Christendom. In the deep gloom all earnest spirits turned to her who was pierced with many sorrows, the mournful "Mother of Consolations," who with a mother's heart for all, and a mother's claim upon the Judge of all, might graciously pity and save. Men and women with "religious vocations" buried themselves in convents, practising austerities which, like the ancient sacrifices, failed to make the comers thereunto perfect, measuring their growth in holiness by the ossification of their human feelings, and becoming pitiful mockeries or tragic representations of humanity, with features stiffened already into something of the rigidity of death. This was the ideal to the perfecting of which the piety of the convents tended, the ideal for which men and women forsook noble work and the tender ministries of daily life. It was from such a living death, or from a life betokened only by strong cryings and tears, that the last of the mediæval hymns were wailed forth. But the convents were the homes likewise of the complacent piety of routine, of an indolence that was as often vicious as frivolous, of unholy levity, and that Mephistophelian spirit, to which truth and virtue in man, purity in woman, and devotedness in God's service, were but empty jests. Luther, worn by fast and vigil, seeking by maceration and prayers to attain unto holiness, illustrates one aspect of monastic life. Another is typified by the friar from under whose cowl come forth the words, Panis es et panis mane bis, the sacrilegious parody of the solemn words of the consecration of the host. Yet there was no alternative between the "religious" life and the outer world ever represented as in grievous case. The ecclesiastical system was felt to be the one ark which could float upon the troubled waters, priestly intercession the one refuge from the woe eternal, masses the sole escape from purgatorial fires, and though the thoughtful among the people might be stirred in spirit against the secular splendours and extravagant sensuousness of priests and prelates, in their hands alone were the keys of the kingdom of heaven.

Not fitfully as a lamp flickering in the night wind, but as the sun rising in his strength, God's recovered truth burst upon Germany. To souls groping for the wall as blind, to men reaching forth "lame hands of faith" in the feeble attempt to grasp the Christ, to spirits worn by fast and vigil, to tremblers who had offered for the sin of their souls the precious sacrifices of heart and life, and had offered them in vain; to the crowds which thronged the roads from the Elbe to the Tiber in search of a pardon which they failed to find; to multitudes in the death-like trance of indifference, to a whole nation sitting in the region and shadow of death, the light sprang up. Never in human history did noon succeed daybreak so rapidly. The times have began to wax old, and we of this generation on whose palates "the sincere milk of the word" has possibly begun to pall, and who occupy our time with much theological speculation and controversies on abstruse points, can scarcely comprehend the joy which set all Germany a singing. It was the grandest jubilee that the world had ever seen. The words "the just shall live by faith," involving "there is therefore no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus," literally proclaimed liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them which were bound. The Comforter once more descended as with the sound of a rushing mighty wind, and filled men's hearts with the good tidings of the free grace and good will of the Father, and all that had been sought so toilsomely and vainly was presented to men's acceptance without money and without price. It was from hearts which had known suffering for sin that the new song welled forth, and the very stones would have cried out if the lips which sung the first hymns of the Reformation had been silent. So the mouth of Germany was filled with laughter, and the land was all the more jubilant in the new liberty, for that it had so long crouched and trembled slavelike under the lash of Rome. It was child-like in its joy, and some of the hymns of that day-break carol like the lark at heaven's gate, with that utterance of "Abba Father" to which the earth so long had been a stranger.

This musical outburst of an emancipated people was far too joyous and spontaneous to consent to be clad in no other garments than the antique and stately trappings of versions of David's Psalms, though Scotland and Switzerland for three succeeding centuries have found them sufficient for their soberer praises. Though Luther did translate some Psalms, and the great national hymn of German Protestantism is professedly a translation, these lyrics are so instinct with Luther's own spirit of joyful trust in God and defiance of the devil, as to be almost original; and he and the hymn-writers of his day soared so completely into the glad sunlit atmosphere of the New Testament, that their writings contain comparatively few allusions to the elder covenant. It was not for them to sing of the veiled Messiah of Moses and the prophets, when the Christ of Paul and John, dying, risen, reigning, was revealed to their gladdened hearts.

It is not within the province of this paper to trace the development of the German hymnology during the three succeeding centuries, but only to indicate its growth down to the period, nearly two centuries later, which marks the rise of a popular hymnology in England. German hymns, by means of many competent translators and imitators from Wesley downwards, have been so brought within our reach, that probably most of the readers of this magazine are familiar with the more marked of their characteristics, and are able to compare them with those of the mediæval and Ambrosian hymns, of which many are now to be found in our hymn-books. In contemplating the outburst of song which was contemporary with the Reformation, it is impossible not to be reminded of that outburst in the fourth century, concerning which Jerome writes, "One cannot go out into the fields without finding the plougher at his hallelujahs, and the mower at his hymns." In the sixteenth century the Cardinal Thomas-à-Jesu writes, "The interests of Luther are furthered in an extraordinary degree by the singing of his hymns by people of every class, not only in schools and churches, but in dwellings and shops, in markets, streets, and fields." Nor is this the sole parallel. The hymns of Luther and his contemporaries have much of the simplicity of the Ambrosian period; the subjects and the position of the writers were alike various, and hymns which thrilled Germany as with a trumpet blast, poured forth once more from the lips of men whose hands were hard with earthly toil. Like the Ambrosian hymns, they told of strife and victory, and were used as battle-songs, or sent forth as sure messengers to stir cities and districts into an attitude of defence.

We are reminded of the famous days of hymn-singing in Milan Cathedral by some of the incidents in connection with the early German hymnology. At Heidelberg they won the battle for the truth when, from fear of the Emperor, the Elector Frederic delayed the suppression of the Mass. Standing at the high altar, surrounded by all the venerable symbols of the gorgeous Romish ritual, the priest was beginning the service, when high above the unknown tongue in which he spoke, a single voice in the vernacular led off the first line of Speratus's famous hymn, "Es ist das Heil uns kommen her," in which the vast congregation joined with such a burst of harmony as to convey to the Elector the strongest possible intimation of the will of his people, and the communion was immediately introduced in both kinds. In 1529, a Romish priest preached at Lubeck against the reformed faith, and just as he concluded two boys struck up Luther's hymn, "O God, from heaven now behold," and the whole assembly joined with one voice. This act was repeated as often as any one inveighed against the Evangelical doctrine.

There are scarcely any points of resemblance between the Latin mediæval hymns and the early German. Even the numerous translations from the Latin made by Luther and the other Reformers, are so instinct with their own spirit, and baptised with the new fire, as to be almost original. The lingering cadences, the ingenious rhymes, and the difficult metres which had employed the leisure of the monkish versifiers, all vanished, not to reappear until the decay of German song. The feeble voices which in the unwholesome atmosphere of the cloister had only dared to express a trembling hope in Christ, were exchanged for the manly, and indeed sometimes rude, tones of poets who breathed the free air of ordinary life, and had attained the full assurance of faith. It would be as easy to compare the blast of clarion and trumpet with the strains of a lover's lute, as the hymns of Adam of St. Victor and Luther. What had these hardy Reformers to do with fear, now that the spirit of bondage was destroyed, and they stood as co-heirs with Christ in the liberty wherewith He had made them free? Yet the German Church bound itself by loving links to the old Latin hymn-writers, not rejecting, as has been unjustly stated, all that had waxed old. Before Luther's great poetic innovation, various of the Latin hymns were popularised, and in some old hymn-books there are hymns with the lines alternately in German and Latin, as in that popular hymn which still may be found printed thus :—

In dulci jubilo
Nun singet und seyd fro: &c.

There was no break or pause in Germany, as with us, between the mediæval and Reformation hymnology. The good Abbot Mauburn, the last of the mediæval hymnologists, had not long departed before Luther electrified Germany with his "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." Hymns were in use among the Bohemian Brethren, and had been floating about in parts of Germany for many years before, but they were rather akin to creeds and catechisms in their dogmatic and detailed statements of orthodoxy, than to songs of praise, and only a few of them have been retained in the German hymn-books, and these rather from reverence than admiration. Venerable from their antiquity and from their associations with the martyr history of the Hussites, and abounding in statements of Christian doctrine, there is a chilling aloofness about them, and an absence of kinship with human hearts, which caused them speedily to fall into disuse at the Reformation.

It was on the wings of hymns, which embodied and popularised the new doctrines, that the Reformation flew through Germany. The Latin sacred poetry was speedily lost in the German Christian lyric, and a national hymnology of a novel and marked type rose up under Luther's auspices. The early Reformation hymns were popular religious ballads set to well-known melodies, and were remarkable mainly for their intensity and forcible concentration of the new-old truth. In those stirring days of conscious freedom and exuberant joy, when action was before speech, and life before thought, the hymns came forth with a bluntness and decision sometimes not a little startling, and with a disregard of metrical niceties not a little jarring to ears accustomed to the smooth cadences of the mediæval poets, but they did their work in building up the German Church, and rule and ornament followed soon enough. It was the people to whom the new doctrines were to be made intelligible, and the rugged, idiomatic High German, with all its capacities for the passionate and vehement, was Luther's vehicle of instruction. His hymns flew like wildfire, sometimes winning over whole towns to the reformed faith, and the roads of Germany, which had so lately swarmed with men and women on their way to buy indulgences, now echoed to the joyful stanzas of the Reformers.

Luther's translation of the 46th Psalm, "A sure stronghold our God is He," thrilled the whole German soul with its confident and defiant trumpet blast, and has been termed "the Marseillaise of the Reformation."*

Other writers writing for the people clustered round Luther, singing of the common sin and mercy, and stirring men's hearts as they have seldom been stirred before or since. Germany loves to recall the names of Speratus; Justus Jonas, the beloved friend of Luther; Decius, who had groaned under the bondage of the cloister, and sang of liberty as well as light; Eber, so loved by little children albeit that he was a shrunken wasted controversialist; Nicholas Herman, the good precentor of quiet Joachimsthal, whose hymns resounded through the pleasant Rhineland, and whose funeral hymn was faltered by a vast assemblage of mourners over his own bier; Hans Sachs, whose "cobbler's stall" in quaint carved Nuremberg was the resort of all who loved to hear of the new faith better from the poet than the controversialist, and who was second only to Luther in speeding on the Reformation; and Nicolai, one of whose stirring hymns peals through Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The hymns of all these are still living and in use after a lapse of three centuries, and the eulogies of Wieland and Goethe * have stamped those of Sachs at least as current coin in German literature.

A season followed when the German hymn, no longer the expression of the new life, showed a tendency to sink into the breathings of a contemplative and somewhat mystical piety; yet the favourite hymn by Paul Flemyng, "In aller meinen Thaten," and Rinkart's "New Year Chorale," still of universal use in the Fatherland, are echoes of the early joyous strains. The glory of the hymnology of the 17th century culminated in Paul Gerhardt, who was at once the Watts, the Wesley, and the Newton of Germany. Like Hans Sachs at an earlier period, Burns in Scotland, and Béranger in France, he was the minstrel of the people, and, like these national poets, is inaccessible in any translation. Round him are clustered Angelus, Herrmann, Rist, Dachs, and John Frank. The stormy period of the Thirty Years' War with which these names are more or less connected, when all that the Reformation had won seemed about to be swept away, was most prolific in sacred song, and the hymns came once more from the battle-field, the hiding-place, and the dungeon. Its hymns have characteristics of their own. They are mainly in a minor key—sighs from hearts almost broken, aspirations after rest from men who were weary of strife, cries for home and help from the exiled and helpless—groanings of men who were all wanderers, for the rest which remaineth. Christ on the cross, or Christ weary, buffeted, deserted, were frequent themes; but hope was hardly strong enough to sing of Christ on the throne triumphant, risen, reigning. The personal element, the individual experience, were increasingly developed; the fresh vivid realisation of Gospel truth had passed away, and the shadows of the mysticism wherewith the German hymnology was afterwards tinctured were creeping slowly on.

The hymns of Germany are her "Liturgy" and "Confession," the depositories of the expression of her faith in Christ, the voice of her Christian life. They were assimilated with the religious life of the people, as well as incorporated with their worship, and have remained through all subsequent time the nucleus of Christian vitality, the living testimony against error, and the rallying point to all who love the truth.

* "The Poetic Mission of Hans Sachs."—Goethe.

Truly there is yet a vigorous life about them, a true nationality of Christianity, and as long as they are sung in homes, and make the very church roofs ring, there is hope for Germany. The progress of free-thinking in the time of Frederic the Great, and the rule of rationalism in the schools and pulpits, met with a formidable obstacle in the hymns; and an attempt was made to tone down the rich warm evangelism of the Gesangbuch to the neutrality of neology. The miserable diluting process to which it was subjected, after receiving a name most expressive to the German ear * signally failed, and the sound doctrine and fervid devotion of the Reformation hymns remain to this day to testify against and counteract the fossilised or arid teaching of the pulpit. Some of the alterations introduced even by Klopstock are utterly needless and hypercritical. The change in the line in Schiller's favourite hymn, "All the world rests," which provoked the mirth of Frederic and his philosophers, making it "Now half the world doth rest" is a specimen of the more harmless style of prosaic and grotesque emendations. The German hymnology came later to have a powerful influence on our own, through the medium of John Wesley. About twenty-four of the most popular of the Methodist hymns are traceable to the German, either as imitations or free translations.

During late years attention has generally been called to a fact, formerly much overlooked, that Scandinavia possesses a rich Protestant hymnology, in antiquity only inferior to that of Germany. Ambrose's hymns were sung in Milan cathedral four centuries before the name of Christ penetrated into Sweden, and His faith waged its stubborn conflict with the fierce Scandinavian mythology. Seven centuries later, the reformed faith was fighting superstition on the same ground, and the hero of the struggle was Gustavus Adolphus. The Swedish Reformation, like the German, introduced the necessity for singing, and though this need was for a time supplied by translations from the Lutheran hymns, native hymn-writers shortly arose, whose hymns, until the late revival of religion, were the mainstay of orthodox doctrine. It is in Denmark, however, that sacred poetry has taken as high a place as the same species of literature in Germany. It is the legitimate successor of the magnificent ballad poetry of Denmark, and in the most dreary time of intellectual torpor was the one stirring and redeeming influence. Denmark is richer in hymns than any country except Germany; indeed so numerous were they even at the early period of 1569, that Thomïsson, himself a hymn-writer, wrote a brief history of Danish hymnology, from the Reformation period down to that year. The early poets, however, seem to have been as poor in poetic spirit as they were rich in piety, and it was not till Bishop Kingo † published his first collection of hymns in 1670, that sacred poetry took that magnificent place in Danish literature which it now occupies. Many of Kingo's hymns, even when translated, carry the reader completely away by their ardour and lyric power, and in later days Brorson and Grundtvig have produced hymns of superlative merit. It has been truly remarked by a recent writer that "Danish ecclesiastical history is altogether incomplete without the history of Danish sacred song." In fact the Danish hymns are the very best guide to the internal development of the Danish Church. This very rich hymnology claims nearer kinship with the Latin than the German; the latter, with the exception of Luther's hymns, being lyric and subjective, the Danish epic and objective. It still has a very strong hold on the affections of the people, and contains the germ and promise of a new and warmer religious life.

It is not a little singular that the two great branches of that Reformed Church which was moulded by the spirit of Luther should so early have created a sacred poetry which ranks with the highest achievements of secular literature, while there was no outburst of sacred song in the churches of Scotland, Switzerland, and France, which were moulded by the spirit of Calvin. The metrical versions of the Psalms as used in those countries which were reformed from Geneva have gathered around them the most sacred memories and associations, but it is doubtful whether an emancipation which failed to express itself in an outpouring of new song, was as hearty and joyful as the jubilee of Germany. The Reformation in England was nearly two centuries old before it bore fruit in anything like a national hymnology. The church in England required the stern teaching of persecution and a baptism of blood to make her realise the pricelessness of the liberty wherewith Christ had made her free, and even then she sang of it with a slow heart and stammering speech.

THE OLD TESTAMENT SABBATH IN THEORY AND IN PRACTICE.

BY J. H. RIGG, D.D., AUTHOR OF "MODERN ANGLICAN THEOLOGY."

THE analysis given in our former paper (p. 369) will have served to show that, among those who regard the first day of the week as of right to be religiously observed, there are, fundamentally and really, but two classes. The first consists of those who view the day as being precisely and merely the weekly festival of Christians, instituted by apostolic or quasi-apostolic authority, as to the observance of which there is no Divine law, but only ecclesiastical law and prescription, and which men must be left to regard according to the quality and measure of Christian principle and feeling which they possess. The second class consists of those who believe that the first day of the week, in the Christian dispensation, takes the place virtually of the Jewish seventh-day Sabbath; that it is, by Divine law, a day of rest, in order that it may be a day of bodily and spiritual refreshment and of devout worship; that the rest of the sacred day is needful for man as man—for his physical well-being, his intellectual health and energy, his family union and happiness, and his moral culture—and therefore ought by human law to be enforced, on the basis of its prescription for man's benefit by the Divine law; that the rest of the Sabbath is also requisite, in order to a right and worthy use and enjoyment of the spiritual duties and privileges proper to the day, so that its meaning and blessing, as a day of worship, can only be truly brought out when it is a day of rest:—and thus, that the Divine commandment to sanctify the Sabbath as a day of rest justifies itself on the ground of our human relations and necessities, proves itself to be the guardian of human rights; and, at the same time, in its care for what belongs to our humanity, merely as such, secures also the needful opportunity, while it exhibits the proper motives, for the highest, that is the truly religious and Christian, enjoyment of the day. Thus rest and worship, humanity and religion, man's rights and God's rights, are indissolubly joined together; and provision is made for guarding and honouring all these at once in the observance of that law of the Decalogue which stands as the link between the first and the second tables, which is equally associated with the commandment that binds man to the worship

Round his spirit flock the foes,
Place their shafts and bend their bows,
Aiming at the Saviour solely,
While the world forsakes Him wholly.

David once, with heart afflicted,
Crossed the Kedron's narrow strand,
Clouds of gloom and grief about him
When an exile from his land.
But, oh Jesus! blacker now
Bends the cloud above thy brow,
Hasting to death's dreary portals
For the shame and sin of mortals.

See how, anguish-struck, He falleth
Prostrate, and with struggling breath
Three times on his God he calleth,
Praying that the bitter death
And the cup of doom may go,
Till, replacing inward woe,
Angel comforts round Him gather—
"Not my will, but thine, O Father!"

See how, in that hour of darkness,
Battling with the evil power,
Agonies untold assail Him,
On his soul their arrows shower;
All the garden-flowers are wet
With the drops of bloody sweat,
From his anguished frame distilling—
World's redemption thus fulfilling!

But, O flowers, so sadly watered
By this pure and precious dew,
In some blessed hour your blossoms
'Neath the olive-shadows grew!
Paradise's gardens bear
Naught that can with you compare,
For the blood thus sprinkled o'er ye
Makes my soul the heir of glory.

When as flowers themselves I wither,
When I droop and fade like grass,
When the life-streams through my pulses
Dull and ever duller pass,
When at last they cease to roll,
Then, to cheer my sinking soul,
Grace of Jesus, be thou given—
Source of Triumph! Pledge of Heaven!

THOMAS KINGO, Bishop of Funen, 1670.

of the One God and with that which forbids that man's blood shall be shed by man. In order to establish the virtual identity of the Sabbath of the Old Testament and the Lord's Day of the Christian Dispensation, and to elucidate the meaning and law of the Day of Rest, as common to all the dispensations of revealed truth, it will be necessary in the first instance to exhibit the character of the Sabbath as disclosed in the Scriptures of the Old Testament.

1. First, then, I assume, as not needing to be proved elaborately here, that the Sabbath was a patriarchal institution, and that the observance of the Sabbath as a sacred day was a part of that primeval or patriarchal morality of which I wrote something in this magazine twelve months ago,* which the Scriptures from the first do not reveal, but presuppose, and of which the Ten Commandments may be said to condense or epitomise the preceptive part. To those who believe the book of Exodus to be an honest and real book, written in good faith by a good man, nothing surely can be plainer than that the sixteenth chapter describes the Sabbath as an ancient and authoritative but well-nigh forgotten institution, which the God of Israel required the people in the wilderness to keep sacred from the beginning of their journeyings, even before they came to Mount Sinai and received the law. I invite any open-minded inquirer to read that chapter for himself, and judge whether it be not as I have stated. Only let it be understood that the Sabbath was a primeval institute, the memory of which had been handed down to the children of Israel from the time of their great progenitors, but the observance of which had been almost obliterated under the cruel bondage of Egypt, and the whole passage becomes clear and consistent. Otherwise, nothing can be more obscure and perplexing. I know that Paley takes another view, and others whose names are weighty. Nevertheless, I must appeal to the candid historical student, and to the natural expositor, from the biased judgment even of a Paley. Meantime a host of greater names in exposition than that of Paley might be cited on the other side. Notably, the great Grotius, one of the most sagacious of expositors, and at the same time one whose chief fault lies in inclining, wherever possible, to low and rationalistic expositions, espouses the view which has just been given.

It would be foolish, indeed, to attempt to fix precisely and definitely in what manner the Sabbath was observed in patriarchal times. It is certain that the patriarchs had no Bible; if they had any written records whatever, they must have been exceedingly scanty. Neither had they any body of prayers or psalms, so far as we know; although, indeed, it would seem not improbable that some brief and pregnant forms of petition and ascription may have been in use. Such forms appear to have been in use from the earliest times among the Aryan races. Why may not such have been in such use among the chosen race of Shem? The offering of sacrifice, the rehearsal of traditions, simple invocations of the Deity, brief thanksgivings, may have constituted the religious element in the celebration of the day. Family union and intercourse, simple festivities, the tranquil enjoyment of nature and life, the shade and the mitigated sunshine, the fountain and the field, the moonlight splendour and the starry glory of the heavens; all may have been elements in the rest and refreshment of the Patriarchal Sabbath. In those pastoral times, when busy and urgent toil was unknown, and yet each day of necessity brought some indispensable labour, if it were but in the tendance of the flocks, we cannot doubt that the Sabbath was a day of rest, a day of lighter labour than other days, and yet that it was a day of some necessary works of pastoral duty. We may believe it to have been an easy, joyous festival, not without devout celebrations, prayer and praise, vow and sacrifice.

THE SABBATH OF THE LAW.

2. If, then, the consecration of one day of seven to rest and religion was an integral part of patriarchal morality, the appearance of the law of the Sabbath in the Mosaic Decalogue is explained. On any other supposition it is difficult to account for its appearance there. For as the Sabbath makes its entry upon the arena of Israelitish observance and law, it has by no means the appearance of a stranger suddenly introduced, of a claimant for the highest honours that had never before been heard of. There is no elaborate explanation of the Institute; it is not announced as a new observance. It appears in the sixteenth chapter as an ancient statute which had fallen into neglect. In the twentieth chapter the language implies that the Sabbath is already an established institute; and that its ground and reason are as ancient as the creation of the heavens and earth.

Its very place in the Jewish Decalogue, as we have already intimated, is by no means an obscure intimation that its authority is altogether superior to that of the merely Jewish ordinances. The ceremonial law was merely Jewish; the details of legislation again, whereby the equitable principles of Jewish jurisprudence were carried into specific enactment, were merely Jewish. But all these are very broadly distinguished from that Decalogue in which the fourth commandment has a place. The ten "Words" announce principles; they are not of the nature of national statutes; they do not prescribe penalties. And accordingly, as a body of Divine principles, as a summary of human morality, of duty towards God and man, they occupy a position of glory and supremacy amidst the ordinances of Israel altogether unique. As Sinai, the holy mountain, was fenced off from the camp of the congregation by bounds which none might pass and live, so are the ten Words of Jehovah fenced off from the enactments of the Mosaic law. These ten Words, and these ten only, were spoken by the Most High himself. These, and these only, were written by the finger of God on two tables of stone. These two tables were placed in the holy ark called "the Ark of the Covenant," which itself was placed within the second veil, in the midst of the Holy of Holies, and underneath the cherubim of glory, in the innermost heart of the most holy and most secret shrine of the Divine Presence and Glory. Surely all this bespeaks an essential distinction and superiority in the Decalogue as compared with the merely national and the necessarily temporary laws and observances of the Mosaic economy.

Moreover, this distinction between the Decalogue and the other parts of the Jewish economy is one which we find to be insisted upon most emphatically by the great apostle of Gentile enfranchisement and of Christian liberty himself, and insisted upon especially and precisely in those very epistles in which he most strongly contends for the abrogation of the Jewish economy as such. I cannot but regard this consideration as one of the weightiest character. The two epistles in which St. Paul most energetically and outspokenly contends against the imposition of the Jewish law as binding on the conscience of Christian believers, are those to the Romans and the Galatians. The spirit of a great part of both epistles may be expressed in the words which are found in one of them as addressed to Gentile believers: "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage." (Gal. v. 1.) And yet we read in the Romans, "Owe no man any thing, but to love one another: for he that loveth another hath fulfilled the law. For this, Thou shalt not commit adultery, Thou shalt not kill, Thou shalt not steal, Thou shalt not bear false witness, Thou shalt not covet; and if there be any other commandment, it is briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. Love worketh no ill to his neighbour: therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." (Rom xiii. 8—10.) And in the Galatians we read the same in brief: "For all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this: Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself." (Gal. v. 14.) So that if in one sense the law is abrogated, in another sense the authority of "the law" remains. If the ceremonial law is done away, the moral law is still supreme. The apostle, it is true, cites only the commandments of the second table. But no one would contend that the second table alone remains in force; that the first table has been broken and abrogated, whilst the second abides in unimpaired authority. Our Lord, indeed, in one sentence conjoins both tables, and attests the perpetual obligation of both. In love to God and love to our neighbour He sums up the substance of both tables (Mark xii. 30, 31); and, in immediate connection with his own expositions of the spirit and principles of the Moral Law, He uttered the emphatic sentence, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil." (Math. v. 17.)

If, then, the fourth commandment be an integral part of the Moral Law; if the fourth commandment may not be torn away from the fellowship of the other nine, and made the one exception, whilst all the others are admitted to belong to essential morality, and to be of lasting obligation; I see not what more is to be said. The position, in fact, taken up by some writers on this subject, is to the effect that the fourth commandment is such an exception. The very statement, indeed, might have seemed its own refutation. It is not easy to imagine a more apparently incredible paradox than that one commandment of a merely national scope and temporary obligation should have been associated, in a summary of moral duty, with nine others of perpetual obligation; that it should have been placed in the very central niche of all the commandments, as on one side directly touching the honour and worship of God, and on the other the rights and well-being of man; that equally with all the other commandments it should have been spoken by the voice of the Most High and written by the Divine Finger on one of the tables of stone; and yet that this one "Word" alone of all the ten should be merely ceremonial and temporary, the rest being all of a moral nature and of permanent obligation. Surely it must be felt as if no arguments could establish such a paradox as this.

3. It is necessary, however, whilst maintaining this position, to bear in mind that even the Ten Commandments have a certain Jewish colouring, necessarily implied in the fact that they were, as spoken from Sinai, addressed immediately to the apprehension of a particular nation, and could not, therefore, but be adapted to their modes of thought and habits of life. In each one of them there is a principle of universal scope and obligation; in several of them that principle is embodied in language which, while suitable to the Israelites, would be unsuitable to many other nations. Now the Jewish colouring was intended to wash out. The Judaistic element, in the language and conception of the commandments, of necessity must be temporary. Here is one element of agreement with those from whom we otherwise differ. For want of observing this, no doubt some have erred in expounding the commandments. But let it be observed that this does not apply only to the fourth commandment. If the law had been first given to a race of mariners, the tenth commandment would have been different in its terms from what it is. It was plainly intended for no other than a pastoral or agricultural people. The fifth commandment also contains a clause,—"that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee"—which manifestly could belong only, in its express and literal purport, to the people of Israel. This clause, accordingly, does not strictly belong to the unchangeable law, although it is found as a part of the form in which it appears. But would any one, on this account, contend that the law of honouring our parents is in itself no essential part of patriarchal morality, of the moral law, of human duty for all the race of man? Indeed, the clause itself which, as it stands in its letter, must be admitted to be merely national in its scope and of only temporary force, yet, in its spirit, as implying that the blessings of Providence attend on filial obedience, may be justly regarded as expressing an abiding principle of the Divine rule.

Nor is this all. It must further be admitted on all sides that, as human language is necessarily imperfect and coloured by the conditions of life in the midst of which its usages have grown up and to which it is meant immediately to apply, so also the necessity of expressing all laws in the concrete if they are to be apprehended by a nation in a simple and primitive stage of development, must often cause the letter of the law to be a very imperfect representation of its spirit. The Hebrew language has nothing to do with abstract terms. Its precepts are not given in the principle on which they depend, but as prescribing or forbidding certain defined acts. Now a principle, the spirit of a precept, is too subtle to be restricted absolutely within any enumeration or definition of acts. Some of the things prescribed to be done, even although done outwardly, may yet, as acts of obedience, be essentially defective, because lacking the spirit from which they ought to have proceeded; while other actions, although in strictness of letter forbidden under penalty, might yet not merit the penalty annexed, because, in special cases, they may not be prompted by the evil motive which, in ordinary cases, constitutes essentially their guilt. The former principle is recognised in the prophetic maxim which our Lord on more than one occasion adopted and applied to the observances of a Pharisaic legalism, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice." The latter principle may be illustrated in the case of the commandment prohibiting murder.

"Thou shalt not kill" is the word of the law. (Exod. xx. 13; Deut. v. 17.) And yet in various places of the Pentateuch God gives distinct commands to "kill" both men and women, under prescribed circumstances. In fact, it may be perfectly right to kill others, either in execution of the law on capital crimes, or in defence of one's country, or in defence of one's wife or children, or even in self-defence. Or a man may accidentally kill another, and yet not be guilty of the crime of murder. In all such cases the letter of the law is violated, and yet the law not broken. The concrete law, in truth, is directed against the sin of revenge. The spirit of it prohibits hatred, as both our Lord and St. John teach us. (Matt. v. 21, 22; 1 John iii. 15.) This sixth commandment in effect forbids all designs of selfish ill-will against the well-being of another. The cruel enemy who persecutes his victim at law, and follows him from point to point, till he has beggared his family and brought down his grey hairs with sorrow to a premature grave, is as guilty of violating the sixth commandment as the assassin who waylays his enemy in the dark bypath. All this is felt as soon as it is stated. But to have expressed the law in the abstract instead of the concrete—to have stated the principle instead of forbidding the most obvious and common violation of it, a sort of crime to which in rude and primitive times mankind are most easily tempted—would have been to render the law impalpable to the coarse commonalty, to have made it also circuitous in statement and cumbrous in form. The wisdom of the Most High gave the commandment in the form best adapted to positive law, most striking and compendious, most suited to the condition of the people for whom the Decalogue was in the first place intended, and in which it could most simply and easily be applied. The exceptions were left to be understood, and the essential spirit of the law to be felt, by means of that intuitive moral apprehension which is a better interpreter in such matters than any verbal definitions and refinements could have been to a rude people in the first hour of its separate national existence.

Bearing this in mind, we shall not fail to see where lies the fallacy of the reasoning that the fourth commandment must either be altogether abandoned, or that the strictest letter of it must in all cases be observed; otherwise, it is contended, its nature as a law, its authority as a statute, is violated. Surely this is carrying things much too far, farther than any English lawyer or statesman would carry them in regard to the interpretation even of British statute-law. The spirit of an English statute, when that is clear and undoubted, governs the interpretation of the letter; and exceptions are continually made and allowed, when to insist upon the letter would be unquestionably to violate the spirit and intent of the act. If it were not so, it would be an evil thing indeed. Even the men whose profession it is to frame deeds and statutes at law, find themselves unable to invest their full and exact meaning in words so as to make a complete and absolute fit. When legal science has done its utmost to find language adequate to express every nicety and sinuosity of thought, every condition or contingency of fact or of event, it finds itself after all at fault; and something has finally to be left to be supplied by the instincts and intelligence of the administrator.

But then the Ten Commandments are not "statutes" in the strict legal sense; the ten "Words" are rather the concrete expression of principles of law and morality. The statutes founded upon them, so far as any distinct legal enactments were founded upon them, are contained in the after, the lower, the minute and detailed legislation of the Mosaic Code. Let any one consider, for example, the tenth commandment, which forbids coveting the property of others, and ask himself whether that could be in any sense a national statute. It is a principle of morals. No distinct enactment or law was ever founded upon it.

We have then to regard the fourth commandment, like the rest, as embodying a principle of morality, adapted in its expression to the actual condition of the people of Israel. We have to ascertain what is the principle which it embodies, what the true spirit of the commandment. Having got at this, we must allow the spirit to govern and re-expound the letter; never pressing the letter in such a manner as to violate the spirit; even relaxing the letter, if in any case a strict adherence to it will frustrate the very purpose for which the law was given, and which lies upon the face of the commandment. This is the manner in which, by Divine direction, the fourth commandment was, from the beginning, understood and acted upon. This is the manner in which our Lord himself has taught us to understand and apply it. And if we thus understand and apply it, we shall find that it is as applicable to Christian times as to Israelitish, and even more necessary; and that all our difficulties are capable of solution.

4. The principle of the Sabbath law is so plain that he who runs may read it. The day is emphatically and solemnly claimed as sacred to God, and as commemorative of the Creator's glory and the serene providential supremacy of the Most High. As such, it is a day to be remembered and kept holy. This is a moral injunction, essentially and exclusively such. To have attempted to enforce it upon all the people by any prescription of definite services to be everywhere performed, or of specific modes of Sabbath hallowing, would have been unlike the wisdom of the Most High. But that wisdom does prescribe and require that which, in the case of the Jewish nation, with certain definite exceptions, could most easily and happily be carried into effect. The commandment enjoins rest from labour, a commandment not only easy but pleasant to keep. In securing this rest, the opportunity for all that is included in the blessings of Sabbath observance was secured. Without this, as a preliminary, nothing could have been secured. The Divine wisdom enjoins and secures the necessary minimum of observance which the people, from the first, could comply with. By means of the doubled religious honour paid to the Sabbath in connection with the sacrificial worship of the Tabernacle; and by means of a progressive revelation of Divine truth and glory through the prophetic order, not without the concurrent operation of the Divine Spirit on the elect among the people; provision was made, after the Divine manner, for the development out of this earliest ground of hallowed rest of all that belonged to the rising honours of the day of God throughout the ages of prophecy, and throughout the Christian dispensation.

5. It is customary to think of the Jewish observance of the Sabbath as hard and rigorous, full of sharp scruples and of religious forms and observances. Of the Pharisaic observance of the Sabbath in our Lord's time this is true. But then it must be remembered that our Lord altogether reproved and disallowed the Sabbatic superstitions and excessive punctilios of the Pharisees. And "from the beginning it was not so," but far otherwise. The original observance of the Sabbath by the Jews had comparatively little of the religious element in it. This grew, as it was intended to grow, with the development of revelation; but it never was meant to take the form of servile literalness and hard externalism which the Pharisees inculcated.

The Sabbath was intended to be "a rest and a refreshing," not a bondage; a rest and refreshment to the whole man, his body, his heart, his intellect, his spirit. This primary intent of the Sabbath is to be kept in view throughout. This idea includes in itself the meaning of worship. Man's highest part is his spirit. Man's spirit cannot be refreshed, exalted, sublimed, without worship. Without worship, man's heart cannot be at rest. Without faith and worship, man's intellect cannot be satisfied. And in proportion as man rises in the scale of advancement, as he becomes more completely developed, as he grows into a more thoughtful moral being, with higher aspirations, and in fuller sympathy with the "powers of the world to come," must worship become more and more the necessity, the solace, the strength, the law, of his inmost being.

6. The three elements of Sabbath blessing are, bodily and mental rest, family union and fellowship, and religious meditation and worship, including the highest moral culture and spiritual satisfaction. These elements must vary in their degree and character, their mutual proportions, their respective developments, according to differences in nations and individuals, and according to the different stages of national and religious culture and development; but all three are essential. The first, however, is chiefly important as a means to the others, and must therefore give way, if necessary, for the sake of securing the higher ends to which it is intended to be subordinate. Indeed without family union and happiness, and without religious repose and elevation, there hardly can be any real mental rest or refreshment; whilst, apart from mental recreation, family happiness, and spiritual sensibility, the rest of the body is little more than mere animal rest, an object not in itself unimportant, but not to be put in competition with the other objects contemplated in the comprehensive beneficence of the Sabbath law.

It is manifest that the Sabbath rest is a priceless boon equally to the youth, the active man of business, and the aged matron, but that it must bear a different aspect to each of them. So again to the Jew of the Pentateuch, and to the Jew of the Maccabean age, the different elements of the day's blessing must have been differently proportioned and compounded; while, supposing the Sabbath law still to be virtually in force, to be in spirit still binding, it must be evident that the elements of the Sabbath refreshment, and the aspects of Sabbath observance, must have been very different in the unlettered middle ages, when there was neither a Bible for the people nor skill to read it, from what they are, or ought to be, in England at the present day; while the celebration in England at this day, again, could not but differ, at the least, as widely from the Jewish observance, especially before the times of the captivity, as from that of the middle ages.

7. In the childhood of the Jewish nation the Sabbath was emphatically a Sabbath for children, and its style of observance cannot have been very unlike what is now commonly found among the young children of Christian families in England. At that time the nation possessed no sacred records besides the earliest books of Scripture, little besides the Pentateuch, and these writings could not, of course, be in general circulation. The people at large, therefore, were without any sacred literature; and had, in place of such a literature, nothing but a collection of impressive traditions. Neither had they any body of psalms, or any national liturgy. In simple truth the people at large were destitute of any public religious services. The services of the Tabernacle could only be attended by a few. The people were forbidden to make to themselves high places for worship, for the obvious reason that these would have ensured the perpetuation and the multiplication of local superstitions and idolatries. The worship of the Israelitish nation, therefore, apart from the three annual festivals, and especially as related to the observance of the Sabbath, can only have been private and personal or family worship. From repeated references in the book of Deuteronomy (xii. 18; xiv. 27; xvi. 11; xviii. 6), it seems evident that the domestic priesthood or chaplaincy of the families of Israel was maintained by the Levites, so often spoken of in connection with all the inmates of the house as members of the family.* These, no doubt, in their itinerant ministrations, instructed the family in the history and holy traditions of their race, in the law, and their moral duties, and to some extent in sacred minstrelsy or psalmody. They thus occupied in the families distributively the place, as to matters of religion, which, in patriarchal times, had been filled by the head of the family.

At the beginning of the Sabbath, when the sunset marked the close of the foregoing day, a pleasant stillness reigned throughout all the land of Israel. At every family homestead in that land of homesteads were gathered together for the evening feast of the opening Sabbath all the members of the family, grandsire and granddame, sons and daughters, and daughters-in-law, children, and children's children, to the third or even fourth generation. With them, also, although distinguished from them by the place which they occupied, were manservants and maidservants, and possibly "the stranger" who had claimed the benefit of his countryman's hospitality. Seated in honour by the side of the aged head of the household was often to be found "the Levite within the gates" of the homestead. The feast was frugal, but yet rich in the pleasant provisions of pastoral plenty; usually cold, but all the more suitable to the climate and the tastes of the people. On rare occasions, however, a kid which had been made ready before the sunset hour might grace and complete the provisions laid out on some special Sabbath. There were cates and fruits, and milk and honey; especially the olive, the grape, the fig, and the date, appeared in plenty at the feast. It was to all a season of rest and rejoicing; a season of good cheer. After the feast, we may believe that the Levite rehearsed national traditions, recited sacred histories, chanted to his harp sacred songs, not without the accompaniment of maidens and young men, and inculcated the precepts of the Divine Law.

On the morrow, there would be seen the family, in all its branches, enjoying the day according to the fashion of their race and the suggestions of the climate. They might be seen early abroad, still keeping, however, within easy hail from home, to lead the oxen or asses to the watering, or to breathe the sweet air of the cool, fresh morning; presently they would partake of a forenoon meal answerable in character to that of the previous evening; they may have been led again in prayer or sacred song; and taught again, the younger branches especially, out of "the law of the Lord." We may imagine them in the warm noon reclining under the thick screen of the drooping fig-tree, or the shadow of some great rock, or in the shelter of some cool and hidden valley; the old renewing their youth whilst they caressed the little ones, or gravely conversing with their mature children, the patriarch with his sons, the aged matron with her daughters and daughters-in-law, all resting from labour, relaxing from care, while family affection expands in the warm and blessed leisure, and the whole household is knit together into close and kind union; and a sense of the blessings of the national covenant, of the goodliness of the land of promise, of the graciousness and glory of the God of Israel, settles into the heart of all. Such may be taken to have been the character of an Israelitish Sabbath in the earliest times—the times antecedent to David.

Samuel may be regarded as having founded the schools of the prophets. From several hints it would appear that these schools, probably composed chiefly of Levites, as Samuel himself was a Levite, did much to keep alive the knowledge of religion in the land; and that on Sabbath days it was customary for devout sons and daughters of Israel to repair to the prophet and his school for religious instruction (2 Kings iv. 23). It may be believed that, in this way, some knowledge of God was kept alive not only in Judah but in Israel, even during the worst times of idolatrous apostasy; and that in these schools there grew up that more developed and truly sublime theology which is common to all the later prophets of the chosen nation, and which is seen in such high perfection in the prophecies of Isaiah.

At the time of David, not only was there a larger body of sacred history than before, but a noble and pathetic service of prayer and song for the house of the Lord was established, the strains of which would not only fill Mount Zion with thanksgiving and the voice of melody, with pleading prayer and lofty praise, but would be echoed and re-echoed throughout the land of Israel. The worship of the Tabernacle, restored so splendidly by David, and the gorgeous worship of the Temple of Solomon, would not only add impressiveness to the great feasts, but must have lifted all that belonged to religious truth and worship into a much higher position before the nation, and have reacted mightily upon the religious faith and devotion of all the tribes. The Sabbaths of the land would catch a glow from the glory of Mount Zion; and would gain greatly in fulness of religious instruction and influence, and in spirituality of character and meaning.

How largely the religious element in Sabbath observance had developed between the time of Joshua and that of Isaiah will be manifest from a reference to what that prophet says in regard to the Sabbath in the fifty-eighth chapter of his prophecy. The Sabbath of Isaiah was very much more than a mere day of rest; it was a "delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable," a day in which he "honoured God, not doing his own ways, nor finding his own pleasure, nor speaking his own words;" a day in which he "delighted himself in the Lord" (verses 13, 14).

We may surely say that, even in Christian days and on the part of the most Christian people, no observance of the "holy day" could exceed in spirituality and perfection that which is described in these words of the evangelical prophet. This, indeed, is one of the many evidences of the truly divine inspiration of the prophet. But still we must remember that these words are part of a practical sermon preached by him to his contemporaries, and therefore that they must have been adapted to their capacity. Those to whom the prophet spoke these words must have had that in their consciences and feelings which was capable of responding to the prophet's words.

8. After the Captivity the establishment of synagogues throughout the land greatly affected the mode of Sabbath observance, which became proportionately more religious, and approximated so far nearer to the Christian method of Sabbath observance. The temptation of the Jews henceforth was rather to formalism and sanctimoniousness than to irreligion. Pharisaism arose and grew to that height of ostentatious and godless religiousness which our Lord so terribly exposed in his personal ministry. Of necessity Pharisaism, in its spirit of exaggerated legalism, centred its very special attention on the law of Sabbath. As every legal scruple and observance became the ground of a specific merit, and furnished an item in the account of self-righteousness, to multiply scruples became a great point in the development of Pharisaism. Among the Pharisees the punctilios of Sabbath observance did really equal what by Dr. Hessey is unauthentically ascribed to the Puritans of New England.* To trim the nails on the Sabbath was a grave offence. All exercise of the physician's art was forbidden on that day. To rub in the hands an ear of corn was corn-grinding, even though a man might be hungered in passing through the fields. Such were the scruples of the Pharisees. But to assume, as people perversely insist upon doing, that their interpretation of the law was true and right, is so unreasonable as to tempt one to imagine that men insist upon it in order to discredit the real and ancient Sabbath law.

9. What the law prohibited was servile work, real labour, work that was connected with the proper tasks of other days. Such needful waiting in the house as was essential to the enjoyment of the Sabbath feast is not forbidden by the law; nor any other act which, not involving toil, is necessary to make the day one of ease and happiness. Nay, from the other prescriptions of the law, it is manifest that even bodily toil, if needful in order to the due celebration of the day, must be admitted as lawful. The end must not be sacrificed for the sake of the means, which are themselves only valuable with a view to that end. Hence, as our Lord unanswerably urged against the Pharisees, the priests in the temple did even servile work, were compelled to do it in order to the sacrifices, did twice the work of other days, and did this in virtue of the direct requirement of the law of the temple service. The priests in the temple "profaned the Sabbath," broke the Sabbath law, and were yet "blameless." So the very Pharisees themselves always led their ox and their ass to the watering on the Sabbath. They took care that their punctilios should not injure themselves in their own material interests. On the Sabbath they would, at whatever cost of labour, extricate their cattle if they had fallen into a pit. All which was work.

10. On such grounds as these our Lord lays down the rule that "it is lawful to do good" on the Sabbath day; and throws a piercing ray of light on the whole subject, when he utters the apophthegm, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath."

Was this, as is so strangely alleged even by divines, to repeal the law of the Sabbath? Nay, rather, it was most impressively to confirm it. "The Sabbath was made for man;" was intended to be a blessing to the race; and our Lord's own practice was the best comment on his testimony. It is monstrous to pretend that He who "was made under the law," and who came to "fulfil the law," and to "fulfil all righteousness" (Math. iii. 15), even legal righteousness, violated the law of the Sabbath. He observed it most strictly. He vindicated it in its true sense, as it had been from the beginning, and in its benignant purpose. At the same time He added to it a lustre of blessing by his deeds of mercy, and a spiritual glory by his Sabbath teachings, such as it had never known before.

His miracles in no sense violated the rest of the Sabbath, while they did most impressively enhance its sanctity. He did no servile work in performing them; they involved no fatigue, no exertion to Himself or to others, save only the free and happy exertion of his own benevolent will. To anoint the eyes of the blind is not to do work, any more than to perform a common ablution. To receive healing by the word of the Saviour was not work on the part of the healed. For a healed cripple to take up his mat and carry it away folded on his arm was not work. These miracles were not work: they involved no toil or fatigue; they were not done for wages; they were not what Isaiah denounces as "doing one's own work." But they were refreshment. So far from being opposed to rest, they were in harmony with it in its deepest and richest sense. They sent healing and refreshment home to the secret springs of body and soul; they filled the spirit with a well-spring of gladness. They brightened the Sabbath with heavenly glory; they made it indeed a rest and a refreshing. They beatified the Sabbath day both to the Healer and the healed.

Throughout, both by his doctrine and his example, the Son of Man illustrated and enforced his own principle. He showed in what sense the Sabbath was made for man, to benefit him in body and soul; He showed also how those defeated the true end of the Sabbath-day who made it into a mere idol of superstition; as if there were virtue and merit in imposing disabilities and difficulties in connection with the Sabbath, as a tribute to its authority and awfulness; as if the Sabbath, and its superstitious veneration, were in and of itself an end to which all the joys and charities of life must be sacrificed; as if "man were made for the Sabbath."

11. Now all that Christians have to do in order rightly to keep the Lord's Day Sabbath is truly to carry out our Lord's maxim, and to follow his spirit and example. The true principle of Sabbath observance is to be applied to the circumstances of Christians at the present day. In most respects those circumstances are altogether in contrast to those of the people of Israel at any period, but above all in the earliest period of their history, at the time when the Sabbath-law was originally given. They were pastoral or agricultural; a large part of our people are commercial or manufacturing. They lived in homesteads scattered over the whole country; and, except in the case of Jerusalem towards the end of Jewish history, there was not what would now be regarded as a considerable town in all the land. Theirs therefore was a quiet, self-centred family life, and this life was equably diffused throughout the land. They, on Sabbaths, would naturally give a preponderating development to the element of rest. Our habits and conditions of life will not admit of our doing the same. Ours is "an age of great cities," throughout which all relations are ramified and reciprocated. Ours is an age of Missionary activity, in perfect contrast to theirs. For ages they had not even synagogues; we have our synagogues everywhere, and these of necessity gather their adherents from many different localities. Their families all clustered and gravitated round about the family centre. Among us the members of families must often from Sunday to Sunday be scattered abroad far and wide; and to secure that family union which is so essential a part of the meaning and blessing of the Sabbath day, it may be necessary for the members to perform much more than a Sabbath day's journey. Our civilisation, in its internal and domestic aspects, as well as in all other respects, is, for the most part, an entire contrast to that of the Jews. In rural districts, indeed, it approaches in some measure to the same character; and hence in purely country districts the type of Sabbath observance among ourselves is found to approximate more nearly to that of the Jewish people than it does or could do in large towns. But even in the country there cannot in our land and climate be the same manner of easy unlaborious Sabbath life as among the Jews. People cannot live altogether al fresco; nor be feasted altogether on cold viands; nor, under the warmth of a happy sun, dispense altogether with fires. If these things, and such things as these, are borne in mind, we shall find it perfectly possible to adhere to the spirit and principle of the Sabbath law, to secure its blessing, and yet to adapt our Sabbath to the conditions of our own national life; we shall be able effectively and happily to apply our Lord's two-fold principle: "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath."

THE NOBLEMAN'S SON.

How fares the man who loves the world's caress,
When the dread shade draws near,
And sends thro' all his golden palaces
The shudder of his fear?

With what blank looks, empty of all delight,
He views his gleaming halls!
How cruelly the sunbeams, calmly bright,
Beam on the pictured walls!

Whence is there help? His eyes' desire is laid
In the rich-curtain'd room,
Sunk far too deep for skill of man to aid,
Even at the point of doom.

There is one hope; and while the kindling shame,
For all his prayerless days,
Shakes his weak knees and burns his face like flame,
He bows his head and prays.

And lo! the prayer is answer'd: angel hands,
Commission'd wrath to deal,
When He that sent withdraws his dread commands,
Are swift as light to heal.

And shall the voice of mercy plead in vain
In the world's gaudy glare?
Can the touch'd heart, grown doubly hard again,
Forget the answer'd prayer?

Nay: may the Hebrew noble's faith be thine,
That, faint at first, became,
Thro' inward motion of a breath divine,
A full and steadfast flame.

O joy of joys that broke with morning light
Across his waken'd soul,
When, ere they spake, his servant's smiles were bright
With this, "Thy son is whole!"

What wondering looks were look'd, what gleams of joy
Fell on their lighten'd ways,
As, gather'd round about the ransom'd boy,
They pour'd the hymn of praise!

Brief is the record, but how full of bliss!
What more ennobling word
Can truth write on a mortal's tomb than this?—
"He trusted in the Lord." J. H. Clark.

A LECTURE FROM A WINDOW.

A narrow lane or alley runs off one of the back thoroughfares near Prince's Street, Manchester. It looks dark and gloomy, even in broad daylight, for the houses on both sides are too high to permit the sun even at mid-day to peep in.

I wish to call attention to the two corner houses. The ground-floor of the one on the right-hand side contains only two rooms. These were occupied at the time when my narrative begins by Peter Leonards, a widower of fifty, and his daughters Emmy and Kate, two strong healthy-looking girls of twenty-two and twenty respectively. Peter was a workman in one of the mills, where Kate was also employed from dawn till dusk. Emmy stayed at home to keep the house, to cook the meals, and to mend the clothes. She was a clever seamstress, and, having a good deal of leisure time, she sewed for the neighbourhood. In this way she earned enough to pay for her own clothing, and to purchase many a bit of finery, of which she was very fond. Girls who are fond of finery and a deal of trimming, are, as a rule, also fond of pleasure and company; for, without these, what would be the use of hanging all that flourish of lace and ribbon, frill and fringe, about one's body? There would be no opportunity for displaying it. Not that Emmy was a flaunting girl: very far from it; but she was fond of a laugh, and a song, and a dance, and her father used to say, "Why should she not enjoy herself in her young years, if she can afford to do so?"

Her sister Kate was at the mill all day. She, too, was a cheerful girl, but of a calmer, quieter temper. She was rather indifferent to the question of dress. Emmy, indeed, constantly teased her about her old-fashioned bonnet, and gave her the nick-names of "Queen Bess," and "Old Bessy," but Kate took all quite good-humouredly; and there being no opposition or retaliation on her part, the fire of Emmy's teasing often died away from want of fuel. Kate was a kind-hearted, good-natured creature, but with a slight inclination towards melancholy. Her father and sister, at least, set it down to that, but perhaps seriousness was the better word. She felt life to be a real thing and not a play, as her sister and most people around her seemed to think it was. She had no objection to fun and sport, and she often wished that people had more leisure to enjoy themselves. But she could not make out how persons could so entirely forget that there were many poor creatures who never enjoyed themselves, and that there was a great deal of misery in this world of ours. Nor did Emmy deny there was; but then, she thought, it was no use being sad, as that certainly would not alter the case. She reasoned with herself that Cripple Dan, for instance, who never saw the sun in the sky nor a flower in the field, except when wheeled out of the town on a bright summer day once a year or so, was neither the better nor the worse, whether other people who could move their limbs as they liked danced or not. There was some truth in this reasoning, and Kate had nothing to say against it. Still she felt there was untruth in it also, but what that was she could not well make out.

Poor Cripple Dan lived in the opposite corner house. Its ground floor also contained two rooms, but the front room, which opened into the street, was occupied as a shop, so that only the back room was left to the family to dwell in. This apartment received its light from a window that opened into the narrow lane. The light, however, was scanty and dim, with scarcely any variation all the year round. The family consisted of Dan, a lad of eighteen, his step-mother Mrs. Baker, and a baby. Dan's mother died when he was scarcely one year old. His father, who was a tailor, continued a widower for several years, and poor little Danny was placed under the care of a sister, who was only eight years older than himself. This girl, poor thing, handled her little brother very much as though he had been her doll, dropped him sometimes, and occasionally even, for a couple of hours, she would stow him into a corner, that she might have a romp with the children in the street. Little wonder that he came from her hands a crippled sickly boy. She ran away at the age of sixteen, and had never been heard of since. Mr. Baker, calculating that it would be at once cheaper and more social to take a wife than to engage a housekeeper, married a strong robust woman from the country, with whom he lived in peace for several years. At his death she was left with a baby, a boy of eight months, and had also Dan to take care of. Being a somewhat shrewd woman, she turned her front room into a toy and small-wares shop, and made her back room serve the purpose of dwelling, bed, and work-place, All the day it resounded with the stroke of her little hammer, for she earned part of her livelihood by cutting images of pasteboard, which, stuck over with papers of the most brilliant colours, made her shop famous among the juvenile population of the district.

Though rather a rough and boisterous sort of woman, Mrs. Baker was yet, at bottom, an honest, kind-hearted soul. What she lacked in delicacy of expression, she made up in tenderness of feeling and firmness of principle. Dan was a burden to her, and no help. Not only was he a cripple and unable to walk one step, but he was also weak, sickly, and needing attention and nursing. Every morning, after having dressed himself in bed, he was carried, like a little child, by his step-mother to the window, where she put him on a wooden stool at the table, which stood at right angles to the sill. There poor Dan sat till she carried him back to his bed in the evening. She gave him his meals regularly, when she had any to herself; for it sometimes happened that the landlord, and the toy-merchant, and the stationer, took away all her earnings, and it was a rule with her, as strict as the laws of the Medes and Persians, never to eat her breakfast until it was paid for. Still, for Dan's sake, she would sometimes pawn some of her stock-in-trade, and provide him with a herring to pick, which would at the same time keep him occupied for an hour or so, since the poor fellow had nothing to do all the day long.

Indeed it was a great puzzle how to keep Dan busy. It far surpassed Mrs. Baker's sagacity. As he bowed over the table, his head resting upon his hands, and his pale face buried under a thick confused mass of black hair, it was a pitiful sight to witness his emaciated form, which seemed more like that of a boy of twelve than a lad of eighteen. For hours and hours Dan might thus be seen, turned towards the window, and looking into the narrow, lonely lane, his expression never altering, except perhaps when a bird happened to alight on the sill of the opposite window, or a yelping cur pursued a chicken along the streets. And if there was not much variety for the eyes of the unfortunate young man, neither did his ears enjoy any greater change of impression. His mother either broke the silence of the parlour by the strokes of her hammer, or the baby would fill up the quiet space by his cries, which would again be responded to by sundry rather clamorous annotations from the mother, all of which however usually ended in the "little blackguard" being taken out of his cot, kissed passionately, and placed upon the table before Dan, whose task it became to play with it, and keep it silent and cheerful. This, however, was a pastime which was all enjoyment to the cripple, for the baby, as soon as he could grasp, used to seize Dan's hair with both his hands, and pull his head to and fro with such force that mother was at length compelled to come to the rescue. Sometimes, too, a customer would enter the shop, and Dan would sharpen his ears to catch scraps of the conversation. His mother, having resumed her seat, Dan would then ask who it was that had been in. But he gradually dropped this sort of interrogatory, as the answer he invariably received was, "Somebody you don't know." Now, Mrs. Baker was not destitute of the talent of talkativeness. On the contrary, the baby had to exert its powers to the utmost, and Dan had often to second it by his loud cries, before she could be prevailed upon to dismiss a neighbour with whom she was gossipping in the shop. But her room was the worst place imaginable for a comfortable talk, since she had to keep her hammer at rest if she wanted to wag her tongue. Nor was Dan a very fit subject to converse with. His range of thought was very narrow, scarcely extending beyond that of a child of twelve. He knew hardly anything of the world outside the house, for he very seldom saw it, and he had not been able to make its acquaintance through the medium of books. He could neither read nor write, and his step-mother knew so little of these arts that she was quite indifferent to them.

Still, Dan knew that there was such a thing as reading. In his mother's shop-window there were little books suspended—"The Life of Jack Sheppard," "The Story of Jack the Giant-Killer," for instance, and a parcel of them was kept in store under his bed. His mother would sometimes give him one, and then he might have been seen for hours looking at the coarse woodcuts. But what would most of all excite his curiosity was what the letter-press meant, and how people could make it tell them a story. He knew most of the stories by heart, for his father used to tell them to him on Sundays. But since his father's death he had heard nothing of them, and he would often think, "I wish I could make those letters speak to me. Oh, if I could read, how it would shorten the long dreary hours for me." And those hours were ten times longer and more dreary to him than they were when his father was alive, for in those days he used to sit at the window of the front room, and look into the bright broad street, where the children were playing, and people passing, and horses and carts rolling along, and where sometimes men came with organs, playing lively tunes. But all those luxuries were now gone, and his place was fixed at the back window, where he could only see that dull, dark, lonely lane. And, instead of the songs of the children and the organ tunes, there was nothing but the never-ceasing monotonous clicks of his mother's hammer, and the cries of the fidgetty baby.

Now, while poor Dan was thus spending his days in sad loneliness, apparently destined to wither away unknown and forgotten by everybody except his step-mother, he little thought that there was another person who thought of him and felt for him deeply. Kate, from the earliest time she could recollect, had known that there was a poor creature called Crippled Dan living over there in the corner house. She also recollected having sometimes seen and talked to him when, as a child, she played in the street on those bright summer days when he usually sat at the open window of the front room. But she had gone to the mill in her twelfth year, and she had lost sight of him for years, and would have forgotten him altogether, had it not become a custom among the women and girls in the neighbourhood never to buy anything at Mrs. Baker's without asking how Dan was;—a manifestation of neighbourly kindness, in regard to which Kate would have been the very last to fail. As, however, she never saw Dan now, Mrs. Baker never asking her friends to step into her back room, he was to her, as to all other people in the neighbourhood, a sort of imaginary being, whom she could not help thinking of as a child of twelve. So one may conceive in some measure her amazement when, one Sunday afternoon she unexpectedly happened to find herself face to face with him, and saw a young person, whose emaciated and pale face was like that of an old man, while his body was like that of a boy of twelve. It must be kept in mind that Peter Leonards' house being of the same length and construction as Mrs. Baker's, the window of his back room was just opposite to hers, the narrow lane separating them so little that two persons could easily shake hands across. The Sunday referred to was the first bright mild day of spring. Dan had his window open all the day, to inhale as much of the fresh balmy air as the close place supplied, and to enjoy the merry noise of the children in the street round the corner, for which purpose he was leaning nearly half his length over the sill, and looking fixedly towards the entrance of the lane. Suddenly the opposite window was thrown upward, and Dan's delight and wonder when he found himself in the immediate presence of a nice, cheerful-looking girl may be imagined. Kate shrieked, and started back a little, as she thought she saw a ghost in human form. And no wonder, indeed, for the wind had blown his dark long hair all round his head and face, so that it looked very much like a skull under a crape veil.

"Don't be afraid of me; I am Dan," said the cripple, in a kind voice. "And you are Emmy, aren't you?"

"No; my name is Kate," was the gentle reply.

"Oh yes, I see, you have still that little brown spot under your left eye. And Emmy had three warts on her right hand."

"Oh, they're all gone," said Kate, with a laugh.

"How tall you are," said Dan; "you were such a little girl, when I saw you last. What have you round your neck? That's very nice."

He pointed to her necklace, composed of red beads, and a little gold brooch. It was a very common thing, but looked quite marvellous in Dan's eyes.

"Would you like to see it?" said she, loosing it from her neck, and handing it to him. He examined it with great curiosity, and as he counted all the beads, it took a long time.

"Have you made it yourself?" asked he.

"Oh, no; I cannot make such things. I bought it at the jeweller's."

"What did you pay for it?"

"I really forget," answered she, cheerfully, re-adjusting the necklace. "How many beads have you counted?"

"Eight times ten, and four."

"Why that's four-and-eighty."

"Yes, it may be. Don't know. How much can you count?"

"KATE MADE HER APPEARANCE, A SMILE ON HER FACE, AND THE BOOK IN HER HAND."

"How much?" repeated Kate, with a laugh; "why I think I could count on and on till my death. There is no end of it."

"No end of it!" repeated Dan, in a pensive voice. "No end!"

He appeared sunk in deep thought.

"Can you read!" he asked.

"A little," answered Kate, slowly. She felt ashamed of herself, poor thing; for since she went to the mill she had not even looked into a book; and what she had learnt before that time was very insignificant indeed."

"Have you got a book? Read something to me. I never heard anybody read."

"I have no book."

"Stop, I have one," said Dan, taking a copy of "Jack the Giant-Killer" from his table.

"No, not now," answered Kate, kindly. "I will do it next Sunday; I am engaged just now. Do you feel well, Dan?"

"Not very well. I am queer every day; but I am better now, since the weather is so fine."

"What do you do all the day?"

"Nothing; I sit at the window."

"Where is your mother?"

"She is away at a friend's just now, with the baby."

"So you're alone in the house?"

"Yes, since breakfast."

"Then have you got no dinner?"

"Yes, mother left me a piece of a pie."

"Would you like a hot egg?"

Of course this offer was not declined, and in a few minutes Kate reappeared with the luxury, and a cup of tea in addition.

From that day Kate could not help thinking a good deal about poor Dan, and feeling for him. She remembered having once been compelled to stay at home for a week, to recover from an injury received at the mill, and she recollected how dull and dreary those days were, and how slowly the hours used to creep on. And she wished she could read better, for she might then read a page to Dan from her window. She thought she would try to teach herself first, and when she had made herself familiar with a book, she might go and read it to him. But she had no book, and she did not know how to get a good one.

That same afternoon, while crossing Portland Square, she noticed a crowd listening to an open-air preacher—a venerable-looking man, apparently between fifty and sixty. She involuntarily stopped.

"And now, my friends," the preacher said, holding a little book in his left hand, which he repeatedly slapped with his right, "this is the book which is able to make you wise unto salvation. It is the Word of God. It is written by the Holy Spirit. It speaks to you of the only Saviour of poor lost sinners, who died for you on the cross, who loved you even better than your own father or mother, husband or wife, will ever be able to love you. Read this book. It is your only trustworthy guide to eternity. Read it every day, for it is to a poor sinner's soul what his daily bread is to his body. Read it this evening before you go to bed, for perhaps you will have to give an account to God even before the morrow dawns, since nobody knows the hour of his death, &c."

The preacher continued for a few sentences in the same strain, after which he closed with a short prayer. The doxology was sung; the crowd dispersed, and the preacher strode off in the direction of Piccadilly.

"Pray, sir," said Kate, who, having mastered her bashfulness, succeeded in overtaking him, "could you help me to such a book as yours?"

He said he could not do it at the moment, but he requested her to call at his shop the next day. It was a long way from the mill, and Kate had to give up her dinner that she might be at the appointed place in time. But she thought she must make this sacrifice, as she was bent upon having the good book. Of course it must be a Bible, for, though she had never read it, she had often seen it and heard about it.

She found herself at a stationer's of the name of William Lever. She recognised the preacher in Mr. Lever.

"Do you want a Bible, or only a New Testament?" he asked.

Kate was put out. Were there two books?

"Pray, sir, which is the better of the two?" she inquired.

Mr. Lever smiled.

"Have you never read the Bible?" asked he, in a kind tone.

"No sir," she replied.

"Can you read?" he asked.

"A little, not much," she answered, blushing.

"Well, then, I think you had better buy a New Testament first, and when you have read it through, you may take the whole Bible."

He gave her a fourpenny New Testament, in large type.

"Do you know about Jesus?" asked he, while she produced the coppers from her pocket.

She cast down her eyes, and gave no answer.

"Have you never heard of Him?"

"I have, sir."

"Then who is He?"

"The Lord in heaven, sir."

"Just so. Do you know what He did for you?"

No answer.

Mr. Lever shook his head. He could not understand this.

"Then tell me what makes you want to read this book," he asked, in a gentle voice. He expected her answer would be: "Because I feel anxious about the condition of my soul, and desire to know the way of salvation." He supposed that his sermon of yesterday had roused her out of the sleep of carelessness.

"Because you said, sir, it was a good book, and that we ought to read it. I was just looking out for a good book, sir, as I want to read a little to a sick neighbour who cannot read at all."

"What is his name?"

"Cripple Dan, sir."

Mr. Lever took down the name and address.

"Please, miss," said he, kindly, opening the first page of St. Matthew, "would you mind reading a few lines to me?"

It was not without some difficulty that Kate was prevailed upon to pass this examination. But Mr. Lever pressed her so kindly, and, besides, was so winning in his manner, that she could not help looking upon him as a father. So she addressed herself to her arduous task.

"The—bo-boo-book of the gen-gener-general—"

"No."

"Generating."

"No."

"Generation."

"Aye, that's it. Go on."

She went on in the same way, till she got to the names of the genealogy, when she got quite confused.

"That'll do," said Mr. Lever kindly, tapping her on her shoulder. "Those names are so strange, aren't they? But you'll learn them soon, if you continue reading every day."

"Do you think so, sir?" asked Kate, greatly encouraged

"No doubt you will. But it appears to me, that when reading to your sick crippled neighbour, you had better not begin with this page. I know a page which tells a few stories of sick and crippled people who were cured by Jesus. I will show it you."

Mr. Lever showed her the fifth chapter of St. Luke, and Kate gratefully put a fold at the page.

That same evening Emmy found Kate busily engaged in decyphering the fifth of St. Luke.

"What in all the world is that? Are you mad, Kate?"

"No, I'm not," answered she with a smile, yet not without a blush.

"Are you going to turn schoolmistress?"

"Yes, something like it. Isn't it a shame, Emmy, that neither of us can read!"

"Well, it is bad enough; but we are too old now to sit down and spell a book. Come along, Kate, to Mrs. Braithwaite's."

"No, not now."

"Jane will be there, and Polly, and Margaret, and her brothers."

"No, not this evening."

"And William promised also to come, and to bring his accordion."

"Did he? Perhaps I will go at nine."

"Eh!" said Emmy, clapping her hands triumphantly, "I knew Willie was needed. I have caught you now."

"Nonsense. I don't care for William," replied Kate, crimsoning all over, "except that he plays so nicely."

"Of course, only that!" said Emmy, casting a glance into the little glass suspended on the wall, and adjusting her bonnet. "Do come by all means. I'll wait till you fetch me."

Kate continued her study. The chapter was by far too long to be got through in one evening. She saw it contained thirty-nine verses. She divided it into three parts, each consisting of thirteen verses, and prescribed to herself the task of reading a part each evening. It took her about an hour to work her way through the first thirteen. She greatly enjoyed it, however. It was so nice, after having tumbled across a score of characters and words which at first had no meaning at all, to find that by gradually going over the same ground a meaning came out, and an intelligible sentence, as it were, shaped itself to her out of the waste of words. It was as if in those letters some invisible spirit were dwelling whom she could make speak to her by a persevering look at the letters. She was so absorbed in her wonderful pursuit that it was with reluctance she shut the book when the clock struck nine. She hurried to Mrs. Braithwaite's, joined in a dance, and heard William play, but this was not nearly so pleasant to her as reading about the fishermen, who washed their nets and caught such a great multitude of fishes that their net broke.

Meanwhile Dan had told his mother about his meeting with Kate, and that she had promised to read to him next Sunday. Mrs. Baker was very much pleased. She liked Kate, because she was a kind, affable girl, who never entered her shop without a dainty for the baby, and sometimes, indeed, would even take it out for a walk. Still, Mrs. Baker had never invited Kate to step into her back room, for, to tell the truth, she was ashamed of the poor and disorderly aspect it presented. Dan, too, knew his mother's mind on this point, and so he did not ask her to invite Kate into the room of an evening. He saw that he must patiently wait till next Sunday. How poor Dan counted the days! The hours seemed to creep on twice as slowly as before.

At length the long-wished-for day arrived, and, happily, it was again bright and warm. Dan opened his window immediately after breakfast. Kate's was closed, and it remained so till the church bells had ceased to ring, and the noise of the people going to church had subsided in the street. Then she made her appearance, a smile on her face and the book in her hand.

"How early you come! that's very kind!" exclaimed Dan, in a tone of joyful surprise.

"I saw your mother go out with the baby," said she, "and so I knew you were alone."

"You have on a different dress from the one you had on last Sunday. It is not nearly so nice. There were such large bright flowers on the other one."

Kate laughed. She could not tell him that her former dress was her sister's, which she had borrowed because hers was being mended.

"Are you fond of flowers?" asked she.

"Oh, yes! I had a rose last summer, but it is gone. What book have you there?"

"It is a Bible. Do you know it?"

"I have heard of it. People read it in church, don't they? Are there any pictures in it?"

"No, but beautiful stories. I will now read one to you."

Kate read the first thirteen verses of the fifth chapter of St. Luke with a clear voice. She read it without the slightest stammering, though slowly, as a man walks on slippery ground. But this was all the better for Dan, who but for that would not have been able to follow her. He was all ear, and asked her to read it again, and even a third time.

"That's very wonderful," he said, looking up to Kate. "Is it a true story?"

"Of course it is."

"Has it really happened? Really, Kate?"

"Yes, as really as I am speaking to you now. It is printed, you see."

"But how could Jesus do it?"

"Why, He is the Lord in heaven. Don't you see?"

"But He didn't do it in heaven. There was a lake; or are there lakes in heaven, too, and fisher-people and ships?"

Kate laughed.

"Of course not," she said. "It was on earth, in some far-away country, many, many years ago."

Dan was pensive.

"Then was the Lord on earth in those days, and not in heaven?" asked he.

"I think so," answered Kate. "He was a man, you know."

Dan fell again into deep thought.

"Doesn't the Lord make the sun rise every morning?" asked he.

"Yes, He does."

"Then who made the sun rise when He was on earth?"

Kate was silent. This was a question which had never suggested itself to her mind. But soon a thought occurred to her, which in her opinion explained everything.

"Why, I think it is in heaven as it is in our mill. Our master is often away for a week or so, but the mill doesn't stand still for that; he gives his orders before leaving, and business goes on just as if he were present."

Dan seemed satisfied with this bit of theology.

"What a kind Lord He must have been," said he, after a pause. "I suppose leprosy is a sore thing?"

"I believe it is. People die from it."

"It must be so, for the poor man fell on his face and besought the Lord, and he was cured at once. How wonderful! Do you think He could also have restored my legs and made me healthy?"

"Certainly. He can do all things."

"Oh, I wish He were here!" said Dan; his face brightening up at the thought.

"He would be sure to help you at once," said Kate. A tear glistened in her eye on noticing the enthusiasm which such a slight ray of hope called up in the poor fellow's heart.

"Can't you read any more to me about Jesus?" asked he, in a supplicating voice.

"I cannot now; but I will next Sunday."

Dan drew a deep sigh.

"I wish I could read," said he. "Could you not teach me?"

"Well, I think I could," answered Kate, after a few moments' reflection. "I will think of it, and let you know."

At this moment Mrs. Baker entered the room with the baby in her arms. She thanked Kate for the kindness she had shown to Dan. Kate then asked permission to take the baby out to the fields after dinner, which request was of course gratefully granted.

It was about sunset when Kate returned with the baby, and a large nosegay for Dan. He clapped his hands with wonder and delight. Mrs. Baker put it into a jug of water, and Dan kept it close beside him, and buried his face every two or three minutes in the fragrant flowers.

But, how teach Dan to read? This was the question which Kate pondered over all the day. It could not well be done from the window, as there was no opportunity for that except on Sundays, and with fair weather, and it would be a very long and tedious process. No doubt, the best way would be to teach him in his room in the evening. But she never was in Mrs. Baker's room, and—she should not like to be alone with Dan, supposing his mother went out.

Still, she resolved to propose the thing to Mrs. Baker. That evening, however, just as she was engaged in studying the second thirteen verses of the chapter, a knock was heard at the door. It was Mr. Lever. He was agreeably surprised to find her poring over her open New Testament. He told her that he had been calling at Mrs. Baker's, for the purpose of speaking to Dan; but that she had dismissed him rather abruptly, saying that her son could not see anybody.

"I see you are reading your Bible," said he; "are you making any progress?"

"Oh yes, sir, getting on very nicely. It is so beautiful. But there are a great many things which I do not understand, and Dan put questions to me which I really could not answer."

"Call upon me every Saturday evening at eight," said Mr. Lever, "and I will try to explain all that you don't understand."

"Emmy," said Kate the next morning to her sister, "could you not try to teach Dan to read?"

"Me teach Dan to read!" answered she, bursting into laughter. "I cannot read myself, you silly girl."

"You can. You know the letters of the alphabet at least, and you could teach him them. You are at home all day, and you could easily find an hour to speak to him from the window."

"Ridiculous! We should soon have a mob crowding the lane. Why don't you go to him yourself in the evening?"

"Why, because you know Mrs. Baker never allows people into her back room."

"Well, if she doesn't care for Dan's being able to read, why should we?"

"Because Dan does. Poor fellow! he sits all the day alone at that dull window. If he could read, it would so cheer up his dreary hours."

"Poor fellow!" repeated Emmy. "And he never comes out to take a draught of fresh air, I'm sure."

"I often thought of that, too. The weather is so fine, and I pity the poor fellow who never sees sun nor moon. His father used to wheel him out once or twice in a summer; but since he died, I am afraid he will be buried alive behind his window all the year round."

"Tell you what. Ask William to wheel him out next Sunday. He will do anything if you ask him."

Kate blushed. Emmy spoke more of the truth than even she knew herself; for William had just a few days before asked her to marry him, and though she had not yet made a promise, he knew that she looked on him with affection. William was a respectable young man. He was porter in a large establishment, and remarkably well-educated, taking into consideration the class he belonged to. He could sing beautifully, and could accompany his singing on the accordion.

Who can picture the joy of Dan when one evening his mother told him that Kate's sweetheart, William (for that William should marry Kate one day had been long since settled in Mrs. Baker's shop), had offered to wheel him out to the fields next Sunday afternoon! Tears actually sprang into his eyes, and he could not sleep that night from thinking of it. Kate of course gave him his lecture in the forenoon, and could now tell him many things which Mr. Lever had explained to her the night before. This time she read of the man who was taken with palsy, and was let down with his couch through the roof before Jesus, who not only cured him, but said, "Thy sins are forgiven thee." Dan could not be satisfied with hearing this story, though it was read to him again and again. He drank it in as a thirsty soul drinks in a fresh draught of water. He thought that the paralysed man was just such a one as himself, unable to walk, and poor and miserable.

"And what does it mean, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee'?"

"That man had sinned against God," answered Kate, remembering what Mr. Lever had said to her about it. "He had often done wrong, and spoken evil words, and thought evil thoughts; and he was afraid that God would punish him for it after his death. But Jesus forgave him all those sins, so that the poor man knew he was not to be punished, and that God would take him up into heaven after his death."

"How glorious!" said Dan. "I believe that I have often sinned, too. Have you, Kate?"

"I believe I have," said Kate, gravely. "We are all sinners, you know."

Dan fell into deep thought, as he often did. "Thy sins are forgiven thee," he repeated, as though speaking to himself. "Those words speak of great love and kindness."

"But you don't often sin, I'm sure," said Kate. "How could you? You always stay at home."

"I got angry, and knocked baby this morning," answered he, "because it pulled my hair. And I was cross to mother, because she put me to bed earlier than she ought to have done last night. And when mother called me a rascal, I said 'Confound it!'"

"Oh! that was very bad," said Kate, scarcely able to repress a laugh.

"Yes, it was. I am sure Jesus would have rebuked me had He witnessed it. Oh! I wish He would say to me also, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee.'"

At three o'clock William, with a little invalid's carriage, made his appearance at the door. He stepped into the shop, and Mrs. Baker took Dan into her arms to carry him out. She had great difficulty, however, in getting him through the rather narrow door-way; and William, noticing her struggle, hastened to her assistance, and thus they managed to get Dan into the little carriage. Kate was one of the party, and while William pulled the carriage she walked at his side, talking alternately with him and with Dan. It was a charming day; and when, having got out of the town, the cripple saw the trees and shrubs clad with the fresh verdure of spring, and the cattle browsing in the sunshine on the flowery grass carpet; and when he heard the birds warble in the young foliage, and when he inhaled the fresh, balmy, invigorating air, pouring fresh life into his veins—he sat in his carriage lost in wonder and with folded hands, unable to utter a word, except, 'Oh! How wonderful!"

Upon returning to Mrs. Baker's house, William took Dan by the arms, Kate lifted his feet, and thus they carried him into the shop. Mrs. Baker stepped out of her back room, and was evidently not a little put about. There was no help for it, however. She felt she must this time open the door of her sanctuary, and allow the strangers to carry their burden to its proper place. She made the best of things that she could. She forced her face into a kind smile, and thanked them for the trouble they had taken. When they had put down Dan on his stool near the window, she of course could not forbear kindly inviting them to sit down and rest a little, after their walk and charitable Sunday labour. They gladly accepted her invitation, and she made tea. They had a nice chat, Mrs. Baker being in no lack of subjects. Dan could scarcely believe his eyes when he saw this nice tea-party in his mother's back room. Such a Sunday as this, he thought, had never before dawned upon Manchester.

"I am surprised that you can manage so well in this room," said Kate, in a confidential tone to Mrs. Baker.

"Oh, pray don't look about," said Mrs. Baker, a smile and a frown combating each other on her face. "I must do everything myself, you know, having no help whatever."

And certainly there was plenty of evidence that this was no place where many hands found work to do. It served at once as a dwelling-room for three individuals, as a bed-room, and a kitchen, and a store-room for shop articles, and a workshop besides; and all within a space of a very few feet. No wonder that it did not look clean and orderly. Pots and pans, and parcels and tools, were heaped up in strange confusion in the corners and alongside the walls. The few articles of furniture visible were in great need of repair. Kate now fully understood why Mrs. Baker did not like to have anybody enter here. She fancied she herself would have been quite as exclusive had the case been her own. She knew that Mrs. Baker was not a dirty, slovenly woman, but she also knew that it was quite impossible for even a strong robust woman to overtake so much.

There was one article which was too conspicuous not to attract Kate's attention whenever she turned her eyes in its direction. It was the counterpane that covered the bed. It was very much torn, and Mrs. Baker, who noticed that Kate could not help seeing it, thought it incumbent on her to give an explanation of its state. It was such a fine strong counterpane, but unhappily baby had contrived to discover a little hole, and putting its little fingers into it had torn it so in her absence, and she could not find one moment to take needle and thread in her hand, though she had plenty in her shop.

"Tell you what, ma'am," said Kate, "you cannot possibly attend to that; you have too much on hand. But I will come some evening and help you, and so will Emmy, I have no doubt, for she is a capital seamstress, you know."

While this conversation was going on between the women, William had a chat with Dan.

"Well," he then said, turning to Kate, "if you come here to-morrow evening with your needle, I will come with a book to teach Dan reading."

Dan clapped his hands, Mrs. Baker smiled, and the next evening the two friends were seen sitting at their work. And William had his accordion with him, and when Dan had successfully gone through his first lesson, he was rewarded with a tune.

From that time the window-lectures ceased. It was amazing to witness Dan's progress in reading. No wonder, for he had the whole day to himself, and he did nothing else from dawn till dusk. In the course of two months he could read as fluently as William himself, and far better than Kate, notwithstanding that she exercised herself every evening, except when she was at Mrs. Baker's mending the clothes, and tidying the room, and doing a great many little things which nobody told her to do save her own kind heart.

Twelve months passed away, and another spring called nature up from her winter sleep. No sooner did the south wind breathe life and joy into town and country, than Dan opened his window as usual. One Sunday morning he found Kate's window opened, and heard a conversation between the two sisters. It was conducted in a very animated spirit, especially on the part of Emmy. She was quite in a rage. Her anger regarded a friend who had grossly insulted her on the previous evening.

"And you know," said she to Kate, "I made that bonnet with blue ribbons for her, and charged nothing, as I knew she could not well afford it. Well, she had it on last night, and with that same bonnet on her head she called me a bad name."

"Shame!" said Kate. "Why, send her your bill."

"Yes, I will," cried Emmy.

"Don't!" cried a voice from the opposite window.

"Oh, that's Dan!" whispered the girls. Emmy could not help smiling. It was so odd.

"Why not?" asked Emmy, putting her head out at the window.

"Because it is in the book, Recompense to no man evil for evil," said Dan; "and didn't the Lord say, If you forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your heavenly Father forgive your trespasses? Look here it is," said he, producing his Bible, and pointing with his finger to the text.

Emmy was silent. She left the room.

"How could you give such an advice to Emmy?" said Dan to Kate. "Don't you know that Jesus bids us love our enemies?"

Kate looked ashamed. "Why," said she, "Mary Hennell treated her very badly."

"Kate," said Dan, in a kind but grave tone, "I am afraid you have not yet begun to do what the book tells us. Has not the Lord in heaven freely forgiven us all our sins?"

"He has," whispered Kate.

"Then, how could you speak to your sister in that way? If God were to send you his bill, what would you do?"

Kate felt her eyes getting moist.

"William," said she that evening to her friend, "I believe Dan is a-head of us all."

"And no mistake," said William. "Many that are last shall be first,' and so it is with him."

Another twelve months elapsed, and a young married couple were seen standing in the cemetery near a freshly-dug grave. It was Dan's, and the couple were William and Kate.

"Do you know what his last words were?" said Kate.

"I do not."

"'Come, blessed Jesus.'"

They walked away in silence.

"Kate," said William, when they had entered their own room, "I think I will take a pencil, and write on the wall above the fire-place, 'As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.'"

ANDREW WHITGIFT.

DIVINE PROVIDENCE.

WHAT do we mean by Divine Providence? Is it foresight, or is it government? Is it an interruption of order, or is it included in the order which it may be supposed to interrupt? Where does it begin, and where does it end? What does it include, and what does it exclude? Is it special as well as general, or does the general providence contain and imply the special? Is it for individuals as well as for nations, and for heathens as well as for Christians? Is it for all sorts and conditions of men, heathen and Christian, or only for great and good men? Does it operate on us irresistibly, or are we free to go our own way if we please? Are there any outward signs or tokens by which we can infallibly discover its leadings? and if not, what is our best way for ascertaining them?

Some of these questions may not closely affect us, but they are being asked continually by those who deserve a serious answer; and if we wish to help others to the peace we ourselves enjoy, we must present some stronger testimony than that of personal experience. Put in its plainest and broadest form, the one question underlying the whole matter is simply this—"What is God willing to be to us in our daily life?" and precisely in proportion to the importance of the subject is the desirableness of thinking clearly, as well as feeling strongly, with respect to it.

Now on almost all the questions already suggested the second verse of the twenty-third Psalm throws light: "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters." First, it teaches us that the Fountain of Divine Providence is not a blind fate, but a living and personal God, holding our world and all in it in his own right hand, the Lord and King of men. "He maketh me to lie down, He leadeth me." If the New Testament tells us of a personal Saviour, the Old Testament tells us of a personal God. This was indeed the essential strength of the ancient Hebrew faith: and though some narrowed it into the intolerance and exclusiveness of denying to the rest of mankind the care, or even the notice, of Jehovah, they intensified it as few Christians do now. It was the promise of God to Abram: "I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great." It was the conviction that possessed Hagar's soul when the angel found her in the wilderness: "Thou God seest me." It was the substance of Jacob's vow after the vision at Bethel: "If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat and raiment to put on, so that I come again to my father's house in peace, then shall the Lord be my God." It was the Divine message to Israel in Egypt by the hand of Moses. "I have surely visited you, and seen that which is done to you in Egypt, and I have said I will bring you up out of the affliction of Egypt." The Psalms are more or less the repetition, under every form of expression and every variety of experience, of the psalmist's personal and abiding consciousness of a God above him and around him, ruling the world for his sake, covering his head in the day of battle, listening to his prayers, putting his tears into His bottle, keeping him as the apple of an eye. In the mystical language of the Canticles it is expressed by the idea of a mutual and personal possession: "My beloved is mine, and I am his." Yet neither David nor Solomon can surpass the impassioned tenderness of the language in which Jeremiah describes the origin, and explains the proof of it: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love; therefore with lovingkindness have I drawn thee." And here let us remember that we must not try, we must not even wish, to separate from this great truth of a living, personal, Divine Ruler, the equally great, equally indisputable truth of a living, personal, Divine and sovereign will. If man could not be man without a will, how could God be God? Why are some of us so afraid of the sovereignty of God? Surely much of such fear must spring from ignorance of his nature; much of it, also, from doubts of his goodness. Separate, indeed, will from character; and then the more irresistible the will, the more terrible may be its results. Nothing in all the world is so intelligible or so reasonable as devil worship, if the only God we know of is a vindictive and cruel tyrant, never to be appeased but by blood and pain. But our God is a Father. "And the Lord descended in the cloud, and stood with him there and proclaimed the name of the Lord . . . The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, longsuffering and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty." He is a Father, who is merciful and holy; merciful because He is holy, and holy because He is merciful; whose sovereignty is but the exercise of his mercy; for all his ways are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant and his testimonies; yet never indulgent to sin in anyone, never passing by those who wilfully persevere in it, whoever they be,—hastening rather, out of very love to them, to deliver them out of it. The righteous Lord loveth righteousness, his countenance doth behold the thing that is just.

Yes: if we look at Divine Providence in the light of the Divine Sovereignty, and then contemplate the Divine Sovereignty (whether as a general, universal truth, or in its application to our individual case) in the light of the Divine character, instead of being startled by it, or never venturing to allude to it save with hushed breath, we shall come to look on it not only as one of the attributes of God, but even as displaying the glory of his Infinite Righteousness: we shall exclaim, with the apostle, "O the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" Divine Providence is the acting of Divine will; a will irresponsible save to the harmony of its own perfections, irresistible in the final result of its Eternal Purpose, though rather through the wise combination of various and even opposing forces, than by limiting the freedom and so destroying the responsibility of men; a will, on which the sheep of the Good Shepherd repose the assurance of their certain, because predestined, glory; a will which is the mainspring of all godly zeal for the salvation of others, since He "willeth all men to be saved, and to come to a knowledge of the truth;" a will, which now, whatever it may be, we must learn to trust, and to do, and to love, and to suffer; and about which our daily prayer must be, that it may be done on earth as it is done in Heaven.

And this brings us to the second point in the verse, the result of this Divine Providence: "Green pastures and still waters," or, as Mr. Perowne more exactly renders it, "pastures of grass and waters of refreshment."

The imagery of the verse sketches for us the pleasant picture of long waving grass in rich meadows, where the tired sheep can lie down, sheltered from the burning sun, and browsing as they lie. We seem also to see glimmering in the thick heat the still deep pool of cool water, not babbling noisily over rough stones, and baulking with its shallowness the eager thirst of the impatient flock, but accessible, abundant, satisfying. Taken out of its figure the verse assures us that there is always abundance, always refreshment, if we are walking in the ways of God. What a truth this is, if we could take it altogether for our own. It is true under all circumstances, if we meet them and bear them in the right spirit: it is true at all times and seasons, in all places and countries; for Joseph in prison, for Moses at Horeb, for Elijah by Cherith, for Paul at Rome, for John Bradford at the stake, for solitary Henry Martyn in the Gulf of Persia, for Richard Williams in Patagonia, offering up his beautiful life to God, for Robert Hall, in his Cambridge study, rolling in bitter pain. In David's way of putting it, "The Lord is my shepherd. I shall not want, for He leadeth me to the pastures that are green, and to the waters that are still." In St. Paul's way of putting it, "My God shall supply all your need, according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus."

But here some one will ask, "Is this always true? Ought it to be always true? Does any one on earth so find it? Are there no exceptions to the rule which prove it and maintain it? Has not the soul, like the earth, its appointed changes, and its needful alternations of heat and cold, of day and night, of summer and winter, of drought and rain? For indeed my experience is, that the pasture is not always green, the water is not always still for me: and tell me if this may not sometimes be God's own will about me, and not, of necessity, through my own sin?"

Now, in the first place, the verse does not so much express the uniform and unvarying present effect of Divine Providence, as its general purpose and tendency in the end. To borrow two illustrations, one from the imagery of the Psalm, the other from the actual dealings of God with Israel: when it comes to pass that the grass is all eaten and the pool, filled by the winter rains, drunk up, the sheep must change their place of pasture, and while on the road from the old halting place to the new, instead of rich herbage and cool springs, there may be a glaring and waterless plain. Israel in the wilderness had to pass Marah on their road to Elim: and they could not stay at Elim long, for they were on their march to Canaan. Under such circumstances, memory and hope are the springs of action; the sheep have still their shepherd leading them, the believer still is safe under the wing of his God. There are times (and when we look back at them, we see they were blessed times) when Christ himself is felt to be our only food and joy and stay and friend; when, in the weariness of our life's journey, and in the entire drying up of the wells of human gladness, we fall back on Him, the shepherd of our souls, that He himself alone and entirely may be our "pastures of grass and our waters of refreshment." We learn then, what afterwards we never quite forget, how to refer all things to Him and to take all things from Him: we understand then how the Psalmist could say, nay (though humbly and timidly), we venture to say it after him, "Whom have I in Heaven but Thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire in comparison of Thee." Another truth, however, claims to be heard here, and of an importance which it is impossible to over-estimate: even that the abundance and refreshment spoken of in this place are not only material but moral; in other words, they are not so much, perhaps not so frequently, in the nature of outward circumstances, as in repose and contentment of heart. For Divine Providence means the arrangement of all our life, not only of its bright side, but also of its dark. It may mean sickness as well as health; death as well as life; loss as well as gain; peril as well as safety; shipwreck by sea and accident by land; murrain to our flocks; cholera in our homes. There is no immunity for one man more than another from troubles of this kind, whatever his errand, whatever his character. St. Paul himself tells us that he "thrice suffered shipwreck," and peril of all kinds was the unvarying feature of his missionary journeys. It neither honours God, nor trusts Him, nor rightly interprets Him, to receive good at his hand and not to receive evil. To let God choose for us and to be satisfied with his choice, here is the secret of peace. "In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength." To be a sheep of the Good Shepherd, to be a child of the Eternal Father, to be a subject of the heavenly kingdom, to be an heir of the exceeding weight of glory, is to have the machinery of the Divine government for our protection, the resources of the Divine treasury for our provision; now the love of God for our possession, presently the vision of God for our reward. All that God is, all that God has, is for his people. The outward features of our life may not be all that we should choose them to be; there may be things we wish for that never come to us; there may be much we wish away that we cannot part from. The persons with whom we live, the circumstances by which we are surrounded, the duties we have to perform, the burdens we have to bear, may not only be other than what we should have selected for ourselves, but may even seem inconsistent with that formation and discipline of character which we honestly wish to promote. But it is faith that overcomes the world, not a sense of enjoyment. The end of life is not personal happiness; it is the image and glory of God. We need not envy others what God has given them and denied us, as if He were hard to us and kind to them. The same love that has in this instance given them what was safe for them, and denied us what was not safe for us, has, we may be quite sure, also denied to them in other instances blessings which they hunger for but may not have; and the enjoyment of which they behold and envy in ourselves. God is just in his ways with all men; but He is also wise and kind; and knowing us better than we know ourselves, fully understanding how greatly we are affected by the outward events and conditions of life, He has ordered them with a view to our entire and final, not only our immediate, happiness; and whenever we can be safely trusted with pastures that are green and waters that are still in the way of earthly blessing, the Good Shepherd leads us there.

Once more, to point somewhat higher, and to indicate yet another aspect of Providence, which to some may seem so far above them that they can never reach it: it is often God's way with those who love Him best, not as a chastisement for sin, but as a distinction and a privilege, to teach them the fellowship of Christ's sufferings, and so to make them more conformable to his death. Our Blessed Master, "though He were a son, yet learned obedience by the things which He suffered." How does St. Paul describe his own life—a life, after that of his Lord, perhaps the very noblest and hardest and most successful life ever yet lived on this earth? "In all things approving ourselves as the ministers of God, in much patience, in afflictions, in necessities, in distresses, in stripes, in imprisonments, in tumults, in labours, in watchings, in fastings." It is an utter, nay, a dishonest confusion of terms, to say that these things can be in themselves pleasant to the flesh, or otherwise (at the moment we feel them) than grievous and burdensome. Pain, hunger, isolation, misrepresentation, disappointment, mockery! To speak of such things, even when endured for Christ's sake, as green pastures and still waters, is to call evil good and good evil, is to put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter. There is no evading the meaning of Christ's words, "Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me." St. Paul bore in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, and those were marks of pain. But does it therefore follow that there was no strength to bear the pain, no blessed consciousness of a Divine Presence, going with him and giving him rest everywhere? When he fought with wild beasts at Ephesus, was not Jesus with him? When they stoned him at Lystra, was not his soul rejoicing in the thought that tribulation was the way to the kingdom? Oh! indeed; though the wilderness is not a green pasture, though sickness is not health, nor toil rest, nor loneliness a troop of friends, nor a prison cell the liberty and happiness of home, to live may be Christ, anywhere and anyhow. And thus we find the same apostle at one moment describing the sharpness of his outward sufferings, at the next moment the blessedness of his inward peace. "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed: always bearing about in the body the dying of the Lord Jesus, that the life also of Jesus might be made manifest in our body."

Thus, to recapitulate, we must not so misunderstand God's meaning in this promise as to suppose that the processes of his providence can always be as pleasant as the result; or that any set of outward circumstances, prosperous and desirable as they may be, can bring us either happiness or blessing apart from the spirit in which we interpret them, or the character in which they find us; or, once more, that the "green pastures and still waters" may not sometimes to the eye of sense be utterly devoid of all visible and earthly prosperity; when, for the advancement of Christ's kingdom as well as for his own ultimate glory, the believer, like an apostle before him, fills up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in his flesh, for His body's sake, which is the Church.

But there is yet another consideration which may even further help to explain to us why the pastures are not always green, the waters not always still.

"He maketh me to lie down—he leadeth me." The Divine government is a moral government; its method is not to compel, but to persuade. The Good Shepherd does not drive but lead, and the sheep follow Him, for they know his voice. The words "maketh them" may indeed sound like compulsion, yet they describe the purpose of His providence, rather than an enforced result of it; and no ingenuity can reconcile the idea of guiding with that of violence. In solemn truth, God's rule is the same in providence that it is in grace. By any and by all means He will draw us; force us, never. As has already been hinted, surely we may see this in the word "lead." No one is compelled to follow a guide. Scripture, again and again, in the Psalms, and in the Prophets, and in the Gospel, introduces the image of wandering and straying sheep; but nowhere is it assumed that the sheep by so straying lost their original relation to their shepherd, or that mere wandering can turn a sheep into a goat. The plain fact is, that Divine Providence is to us just what we suffer it to be. "Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life," was the pathetic complaint of the Saviour, about those whom he yearned to save, but who would not let Him save them. "He is of age, ask him; he shall speak for himself." This in the first instance was the reply of the blind man's parents to the Jews. May we not admit its abstract and essential justice, and apply the words to God, as he considers the actions of men? And if we at first shrink from this view, as on man's side too much aggravating his responsibility, on God's side too little recognising his sovereignty, let us apply two tests to it which, in their combined force, may persuade us of its truth. One is that of conscience, long ago used with irresistible force by Dean Alford in vindicating the human side of the doctrine of predestination; the other is that of experience, which, instead of speculating what men can do, proves it from their acts. As we look back at the past, and muse on the share we have ourselves taken in the attainment of our position, in the use of our opportunities, in the improvement of our talents, in the discharge of our duties, is there no feeling of regret, or of loss, or of shame? Have we always honestly consulted God? Have we always obeyed the voice of conscience? Have we never gone the way of our own heart, though our heart and our judgment were at variance? Do we not sometimes feel that we might have been more happy, more useful, than we are, but for wilful mistakes of our own? In some things, it is true, we are not the makers of our own history. Our birth, our parentage, our natural talent, our bodily shape and constitution, nay, to some extent, our character, are the irreversible and irredeemable lot which He who worketh things after the counsel of his own will ordained for us before the worlds were made. Providence, if we may so speak, gives us our start, and the start tells on the race. "Promotion cometh neither from the east nor from the west, nor yet from the south." But it is for us to run with patience the race that is set before us, "looking unto Jesus;" and while our sense of dependence convinces us of the existence of an over-ruling God, and our conscience betrays that we do not always obey Him, our instincts of energy, and self-reliance, and ambition, and enterprise, are indisputable evidences of direct responsibility; and if gratitude and humility compelled St. Paul to say, "By the grace of God I am what I am," the sense of his own use of that grace justified him in adding, "I laboured more abundantly than they all."

But there is still one other word in this verse, which contains a truth as important as any we have yet considered, and which makes all the difference possible, both in our conception of God and in our view of life. It is not us, but ME. "He maketh me to lie down—He leadeth me." The Psalmist is not describing the care of a shepherd over the entire flock, so much as his care for each individual sheep in it; and the verse recalls the time when he, who was afterwards called from following the ewes great with young "to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance," was but a humble youth, his sceptre a crook, his subjects goats and sheep and lambs, his dominions wild open fields between Bethlehem and the Kedron.

The doctrine of a Divine Providence, whatever we may understand by it, is peculiar to Revealed religion. The deities of the Pagan world (as mythology describes them) interfered with the affairs of men, only for vice or pride; and the philosophers, who found themselves able to accept gods at all, preferred to think of them as dwelling apart from men in a stately and perhaps contemptuous repose.

Barrow, in his famous sermon on the Gunpowder Plot, quotes a sentence of Cicero, to the effect that "the gods care for great things and neglect small," a statement to which we should be willing to give more attention if he had gone on to explain what great and small mean in the affairs of life, and how we are to know when to apply the words. No doctrine more than this exalts God or dignifies man; exalts God in setting forth at once his power and his goodness; dignifies man in giving to each redeemed human being his own inalienable position in the creation, and by placing the beggar and the king, the little infant and the man in his prime, the lonely widow and the powerful statesman, the decrepit pauper and the conqueror in a hundred battles, on the same level of entire equality before Him, with whom is no respect of persons. It is in no feeble, unhealthy, self-loving, self-exalting spirit that a human being, first looking into himself and then looking up towards Heaven, should ask with all reverence, but with all anxiety, "Does God care for me—will God help me?" We are all familiar with the suggestive remark that the microscope was discovered about the same time as the telescope; and that the mighty Creator of the innumerable worlds which gem the fields of space, was thus found willing to put forth the resources of his Omnipotence, and to exert the secrets of his wisdom on a drop of water, or a butterfly's wing. It is not that any one who believes in a God at all really disputes his power; there are no degrees of power with Omnipotence. The simple question is, what is the sphere of his power, what the method of its exercise? Nay further, any one who believes in God as a moral being, is prepared to admit the general benevolence of his character, and the wisdom of his universal government; but that is not enough for those whom God has so formed, so disposed, that each needs God for himself. Man is not satisfied to share only, with the beasts and the birds and the trees, a general supervision. Life is too vast, too solemn, to be spent alone. He would come close to God, and feel after Him till he finds Him.

The subject we are considering actually includes two questions, one of less, the other of greater moment; the one, the use of a word, the other, the meaning of a truth. To take the last first, a Christian does not need to be reminded that He, without whom not a sparrow falleth to the ground, hath numbered the very hairs of his head. We have not so learned Christ from the history of his earthly life; we have not so seen the Father manifested in his Son as to dare to do Him the crowning dishonour of doubting for a moment his full and tender sympathy for each one of his redeemed people, or of refusing to believe that He who made the worlds, watches over a little child. If there is no limitation of infinite power, there is no limitation of infinite love. God can, God will, God does, care for us. The secrets of nature, the marvels of creation, the mystery of redeeming love, the individual experience of millions upon millions of reflecting and intelligent men,—nay, almost every page of that Book, which is luminous with the doctrine of a Divine Providence, and which, if the doctrine be false, must itself be the cruellest delusion that ever mocked mankind,—each of these alone, all of these together, are a witness to the superintendence of God. In all things, and at all times, and for all needs, and under all difficulties, in things temporal and things spiritual, in the necessities of the body and of the soul, in the choice of a profession, in the arrangement of a home, in work and in rest, in study and in holiday, in marrying and in giving in marriage, in the bringing up of children, in the selection of servants, in perplexities of business, in the entanglements of society; however small our cares may be, however insignificant our condition, however inextricable our confusion, however dark our future, "He knoweth the way I take."

It is, however, one thing to be infallibly assured of the love and care and protection of God for each human being in all the affairs of life, and another thing to describe this Providence accurately, and to explain it consistently with the other operations of his will.

The word "special," as applied to Providence, is often somewhat loosely used by those who do not sufficiently reflect on the logical consequences of the language they are using, and who, in their intelligible anxiety to recognise and adore the Providential care and goodness which from time to time are mercifully conspicuous in their own case, feel constrained to describe it as a peculiar interposition for their sake, when it is but a pre-arranged element in a universal plan.

If we insist on a so-called "Special Providence" as an exception to, and an interruption of, the method of general Providence, and on no other ground than that of our own consciousness (more alive to it at some times than at others), it is difficult to evade the objection, that with the all-wise, all-seeing God, there must be neither settled purpose nor predestined order; then there is one kind of government over us to-day, called general, and another over us to-morrow, called special. And in admitting the possibility of eccentricity and change in the Divine counsels, we seem to impeach the wisdom, and complicate the operations of God. For some it is enough to believe that there is one uniform universal government over us all: always the same, always righteous and merciful, by night as well as by day, in quiet times as well as in troubled times, when we are not conscious of it as well as when we are: purposing our good, contriving our happiness, willing our sanctification. And though at some times more than at others, we are more impressed by its influence, more grateful for its blessings, or more awed by its judgments—it is the same government, on the same principles, of the same God, for the same end.

The word, however, is but of slight consequence, so long as we rightly grasp the doctrine beneath. The practical result of our belief in Divine Providence is the one thing to inquire about; and whatever our private theory may be, it need not give us uneasiness, if only it encourages us in prayer. For, as has well been said, man is a creature that prays; and whatever may be the speculative difficulties of prayer—however hard some of us may find it to reconcile the notion of prayer moving God with God's infinite and unerring wisdom—in spite of all the philosophers and the thinkers, men and women will go on praying as they have ever done: and what is more, will refuse to be convinced that their prayers are in vain. In plain truth, all the difficulties on the subject (and there are difficulties), simply and solely spring (as Bishop Butler has observed about revealed religion generally) from our imperfect knowledge of God. A man will say, "Do you really expect an answer to your prayer? For if you do, you are only in other words asking for a miracle." "Well, what if I am? Can you tell me, my friend, what a miracle is, what nature is, what God's order is, what interrupts and what does not interrupt it, what is contrary to it, and what is merely above it, or suspends it?" No doubt Divine Providence, if we accept the Old and New Testaments, has worked miracles in past times; and nowhere is it said in the Bible that they will never be seen again. And if we had to choose between the alternatives of denying the possibility of answers to prayer altogether, and of describing each answer as miraculous, the sounder and the more philosophical and the more consistent of the two, would be the latter. For it is quite begging the whole question to speak of miracles as something against nature; when possibly, as Archbishop Thomson has observed ("Dictionary of the Bible," vol. ii. p. 1046), "they are above it: not the few caprices of Providence breaking in upon ages of order, but glimpses of the Divine spiritual cosmos permitted to be seen amidst the laws of the natural world, of which they take precedence, just as in the physical world one law can supersede another." Yet there is no real need to adopt either theory, if we for a moment reflect on the infinite wisdom of God both in Providence and grace, and consider also on what conditions it is promised that our prayers shall prevail. "Known unto God are all his works, from the beginning of the world." In the language of Professor M'Cosh, "God has so arranged his Providence, that He provides an answer to prayer. When the question is asked, how does God answer prayer?—it is by a pre-ordained appointment—when God settled the constitution of the world, and set all its parts in order," and "the answer to prayer proceeds on the foreseen circumstance that the prayer will be offered; that if the man refuses to pray, he shall assuredly find it fixed that no answer is given." ("Method of the Divine Government," pp. 222, 224.)

Besides, God has only promised to answer the prayers which are acceptable to Himself. "If we ask anything according to his will, He heareth us." Many of our prayers are not answered, because they are incompatible with our real good. When, however, we pray in the mind of the Spirit (and if we please we always may), then we pray according to the will of God; then we ask and we receive, we seek and we find, we knock and it is opened to us. Dr. Barry has observed that the prayers of the patriarchs were principally for personal or domestic blessings; those of Hebrews under the monarchy for national blessings; those of New Testament saints for spiritual blessings. We Christians may surely unite all these varieties of prayer in our own case, some, of course, more at one time than another; yet the one thing we have to do is to pray everywhere, to pray always; above all, to "pray and not faint." Prayer, rightly understood, is but a child going into a parent's presence, or a loyal subject asking audience of his king; only the parent's heart is always bountiful, the king's sceptre is ever stretched out towards us to bid us welcome. If there be no Divine Providence, then, indeed, there can be no prayer; and not to pray at all implies either that we have no need of God, or no faith in Him; but just as we trust in the goodness and wisdom of our Maker will prayer be at once the relief, and the necessity, and the habit, and the strength of our life: and whenever doubts flash across us of God's power to help us—whenever our own will is in cruel and agonising conflict with his will, let us think of the Son of Man in the shadows of Gethsemane, who, within sight of his predestined cross, rested the prayer that it might even then pass away, on the majestic truth that "with God all things are possible;" who nevertheless submitted his own will to the Father's, and in the deepest sense of the words was heard in that He prayed; for in the garden He said, "Nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done;" and when his enemies seized Him, and Simon Peter tried to rescue Him, He answered, "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?"

Only two points remain, one of which contains a caution that may prevent disappointment, the other a truth that will suggest comfort.

Are there any signs, one will ask, by which we may discover the leading of Divine Providence, and which will save us, not only from perplexity and anxiety at the time, but also from actual mistake? The answer is, there have been such signs in the infancy of the Church of God; there are none now. When Israel came out of Egypt a pillar of cloud went before them by day and a pillar of fire was over their head by night. The Shechinah, with its mysterious gleam, flashed on high priests under the early monarchy the Divine Purposes. Under the Judges, seers or prophets had the power of giving information through supranatural means; and it was on an errand of this kind that Samuel first met Saul. But even in the time of the Herods these signs had passed away. The Lord steadily refused to give signs of his Messiahship other than his own miracles: and the reason He assigned for his refusal—"The kingdom of God cometh not with observation," "The kingdom of God is within you"—applies with equal force to the evident fact that the way of God's Providence cannot be known by outward marks or evidences; if it tarry, we must wait for it, though sooner or later it will be made manifest to the obedient and child-like heart. At some times, and under some circumstances, indeed, God's will seems to dart upon us; and we have nothing to do but follow it. But our difficulty is not at all where God works independently of us; it is where He works with us, and we with Him; where events are as much our own bringing about as his, and where in the use of means, at the best imperfect and unreliable, we seem to take all pains sometimes only to go wrong. What rules are there in such a case, beyond diligence, and patience, and obedience, and prayer? Surely none. Diligence in consulting friends (though indeed we cannot possibly do all they bid us), and in procuring information, and in weighing our case on all sides. Patience, for half our mistakes in life come from being in a hurry, and we are just as likely to go wrong if we rush on in advance of God's Providence, as if we lag idly behind it. Obedience, for to be willing to do God's will is the real crux of the matter: too often we consult Him, going with the multitude of our idols, and then we are taken captive in the toils of our own heart; and we deliberately pray ourselves into our mistake. Then prayer, honest, humble, simple, persevering prayer: and we can do no more. But God knoweth this as well as we do; and He who hath promised wisdom to them that ask it, until the time comes will give peace,—when the time comes will give direction. Anything is more possible than that God should not guide the meek in judgment. Nothing is more sure than that, when we have done our best, He will acknowledge and bless it. "I will guide thee with mine eye," as the mere glance of the eye or the expression of a feature in the face of one we love and understand is quite sufficient to indicate to us his wish and to express his mind. So will it ever be between God and his people. Divine Providence guides all who wish to be guided. Yes, Divine Providence must not be held responsible for the mistakes of those who love their own way.

But for those who do not recognise the existence of Divine Providence, whether they are heathens or Christians, strangers to us or friends and kinsfolk,—is there a Providence for them, though they shut their eyes to it? Is there a purpose of Divine love counselling and desiring their good, though they steadily resist it, and will not suffer it to bless them? Nay, for those of ourselves who are conscious of wishing to follow it and yield to it in our best moments, when we disobey it and go wrong, what will be the result to us? and will the sins, and failures, and mistakes, and infirmities of past years never be recovered, never be repaired? Divine Providence is for all men, and rules all men, and provides for all men, and blesses all men in proportion as they are willing to be blessed. If His love is perfected in us, then indeed we are safe and happy; if it is only on his side toward us, and not on ours towards Him, then, though his sun equally shines, his rain equally descends on us; in the higher purpose of his mercy He waits to be gracious; standing at the door of our heart and knocking, He remains outside till we let Him in. There are many ways, were they needed, of proving this Providence of universal love. We who love Him now can perhaps recall the time when we did not love Him, did not think of Him, did not even wish to please Him. Yet did He not watch over us then, biding his opportunity? Did our coldness quench the flame of his love, did our turning away make Him less mighty to save? "We love Him because He first loved us." Here is the account that every soul conscious of its acceptance gives to itself of its salvation. But what has been true of us is true of others, and may be true of others, or what a delusion missions must be! God gave his Son to redeem the world, because He loved the world; and those whom He loves He would save. Oh, let us thankfully, unhesitatingly, devoutly, recognise a Divine Providence watching over and waiting for all men, if by all means He may save some; and let this be the ground of our confidence, the strength of our hope, the backbone of our prayers, about those dear to us, who are as yet without God in the world.

As for ourselves, and all our past mistakes, and follies, and blunders, and disasters, "forgetting the things which are behind," we will "reach forth unto those things which are before." Let us beware of fretful, feeble anxiousness, which unnerves us for duty. Let us have a bright, manly, cheerful trust in God, which will encourage ourselves, and animate our neighbours. Perhaps we cannot always be quite right, but an honest purpose will save us from serious mistakes; and it is in human nature, when we have once decided and the result of our decision is yet in the distance, to wish we had decided differently. Be this as it may, God in the end can turn even our failures and mistakes to his glory and our own blessing; his wisdom can overrule our error, and his mercy will forgive our weakness. If, through our own fault, not his, our pastures have not been as green, our waters not as still as they might have been, yet surely as we look back and count up our past blessings, they will make our heart full and our eyes dim. Dark as the day may have been, "at eventide it shall be light." Sometimes our path in life seems like a lane full of windings, where the steep banks shut out the light and air, and all we can do is to trudge steadily on through the thick mire. But if we look high up in front of us we shall see, as Israel saw, the faint blue hills of the Land of Promise rising up against the sky. The path will come out at length in full view of the Celestial City; and at last, at last we shall be at home.

PREJUDICE; OR, THE BLACK POLYANTHUS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "STUDIES FOR STORIES."

Part II.

I do not remember that anything particular happened during the remainder of the day; we were called in to school almost immediately after our conversation in the garden, and, when it was over, Miss Palmer being present, the subject of the black polyanthus could not be alluded to.

It was not till the next afternoon, when Juliet, Margaret, and I, were in the coach-house, feeding our birds, that Miss L'Estrange came in, and inquired what we meant to do about Belle's polyanthus.

"Do, Miss L'Estrange," I answered, "what is there to do? If you can gum on every one of the leaves, and all the flowers, so that they can grow again, Belle will be very much obliged to you; but if you cannot, there is nothing to be done, that I can see."

"What a baby you are, little Sophia," said Miss L'Estrange, laughing; "you know as well as I do that you are talking nonsense. I think I shall make Belle quarrel with you! Don't nod your head at me as much as to say, 'Do if you can;' I shall certainly set my wits against yours, if you dare to make game of me, you morsel of a child. Gum them on indeed! Come and sit on my knee."

Miss L'Estrange was sitting on a box, and as I came dancing towards her, she snatched me up, and I felt like a shuttlecock in her hands; she was extremely tall, finely but largely proportioned, and the great fairness of her hair and complexion increased her apparent size. She set me on her knee, and folding one of my feet in her large white fingers, she said,—

"Who suspected you of making that footmark, you tiny thing? it would take three feet such as yours to fill it! Come now, tell me why you are so much afraid of an investigation; I saw what a fright you were in yesterday; what was the reason?"

Finding that I made no answer, she said,—

"Juliet and Margaret, just go, my dears, and find Belle and Miss Ashley, and tell them I wish they would come here." The two little girls ran away on their errand, and Miss L'Estrange continued: "Now, Fairy, if you know anything more than we know, of course you ought to tell it."

I assured her that I did not know anything.

"Then," she said, "why are you so anxious that no questions should be asked; don't you think it must be very disagreeable to be suspected?"

"Yes."

"Well, some one is suspected."

"I know."

"We want to decide whether she is suspected wrongfully."

"But perhaps asking questions will make you suspect still more."

"Not if she is innocent; let my curls alone, Fairy, and attend to what I am saying. If she is innocent, she ought to be much obliged to us for our investigations."

"But you know, Miss L'Estrange," said I, trying to convey my confused impressions to her, "you know that none of us like her, and it seems to me that but for that we never should have suspected her."

"You uncharitable little thing! you say we dislike her! well, that is quite true; but we have reasons for disliking her, have we not?"

"Oh, yes, we have; I quite forgot that," said I, not at all aware that we were arguing in a circle, and asserting the reasonableness of our prejudice against her from our belief in things which might themselves be unfounded prejudices.

"You seem to me," observed Miss L'Estrange, "to have a sort of notion that the person in question is innocent."

"No, I haven't exactly," I replied; "I don't think she is a nice girl, and perhaps she has done wrong, but I think we must be doing wrong too."

"Then it is for our sakes, not hers, that you wish us all to be cowards?" she asked.

I considered for awhile, and then replied to the effect that if the investigation came to any decided result, Madame must be told—the suspected person would tell her if she really was innocent; some one of us would tell if she was guilty; and it would be sure to make a great deal of unhappiness and quarrelling. But that if it turned out that the suspected person had been accused and suspected wrongfully, Madame would be much more seriously angry with Belle and with us for having made up such a disgraceful charge against her, than she would be with her if she had really spoilt the primrose; and, either way, Belle was still no better off, since her plant was spoilt for the season, and could not be replaced.

"What a cautious little thing you are," said Miss L'Estrange, when with much circumlocution I had contrived to convey my meaning to her.

"Belle doesn't care very much about her polyanthus," I observed, not wishing to appear lukewarm in my friend's cause.

"Care," repeated Miss L'Estrange, "I should like to know what Belle does care about for five minutes together; no, no, it is not through any fear that she should pine for her lost treasure that I want to have this question settled."

It was always considered a dangerous thing in the school to meddle or interfere with Belle, for though Miss L'Estrange always declared that she should never think of taking her part merely because she was her sister; and though she said she should never take Belle's part unless she was right, we did not reap much benefit from this decision, though it sounded fair, because she never thought her wrong. Notwithstanding this vehement partizanship, she always spoke of Belle with a kind of careless slighting manner, and therefore I was not at all surprised on this occasion to hear her assert that it was not for Belle's sake that she wished to have the matter settled.

"And why do you turn round so anxiously, you little thing?" she continued; "are you afraid that Miss Palmer's grey parrot should be listening, and should repeat our conversation to his mistress?"

As if the mention of his name had roused this respectable bird from a sage reverie, he immediately drew back the film from his eyes and screamed out "Paul," a word constantly in his mouth (or rather his beak), and which he meant for Poll; "Paul, Paul," said the parrot, "here's a state of things, ha! ha! ha!"

The parrot could only say two sentences, but one of them ended with this laugh, which was quite contagious; it was exactly like that of an old gentleman laughing through his nose. Our laughter on hearing it made all the canaries begin to sing, and they roused the linnets and the robins, so that by the time Juliet and Margaret returned with all our schoolfellows, excepting the four little ones and Miss Palmer, there was such a din that we could not hear ourselves speak, the parrot's shrill voice screaming above it all, "Here's a state of things, ha! ha! ha!" and then, "Hester, Hester, Paul wants his sop: Hes—ter!"

"Tiresome thing!" cried Miss Ward, stopping her ears; "somebody put an apron over his cage; he calls so loudly that his mistress will be coming to him, and that will never do."

The girls made haste to stop the noise by excluding as much light as they could from the various cages, and presently there was something like quiet, excepting that every now and then the parrot repeated, "Hester, Hes—ter!" with startling distinctness, or burst out laughing in the gravest part of our discourse.

Miss L'Estrange, with me on her lap, was seated on a pile of several boxes, with her back to the wall; the other girls grouped themselves in a semicircle before her, sitting on the floor; and a long discussion began, all about the black polyanthus—who could have done the deed, and why it was likely that Miss Palmer was the doer.

"I often feel afraid of those close silent people," said Miss Ward; "depend upon it that girl has a great deal more in her than we think, Fanny; when she flashes those deep grey eyes of hers upon me, I never feel as if I could meet them and look at her steadily."

"That is exactly my feeling," answered Miss Ashley.

"I am sure she must be very artful," said Belle.

"If she is, Belle," I ventured to remark, "she did not cut your primrose."

"Indeed!" said Miss Ward; "what do you mean, you oracular little creature?"

"I did not say she was artful," I replied; "I don't know whether she is or not; I only say that if she is artful, she is more than a match for us, and therefore she has not chosen to revenge herself in a way that we should all discover at once."

The elder girls all laughed heartily at this, as they generally did when I ventured to give my opinion.

"If she did not do it," said Margaret, "we wish to know who did."

"I think nothing of the footmark," observed Miss Ward, "for you know the younger ones are constantly jumping over each other's gardens, and we cannot be sure how many days it is since that footmark was made; but the polyanthus is cut and left on the mould—is it not natural to think she did it, when there was an obvious motive in her case, and none that we know of in the case of any one else?"

"Of course the motive you allude to is revenge," said Miss L'Estrange.

"To be sure. If she did it—which is still a question—but if she did, then nothing can be more easy than to see why. The second class had that morning shown her how mean they thought her behaviour in appropriating their plants; she had been excessively hurt and ashamed at it; it was a sore subject; and when Belle fell over those very plants, she might have thought she did not do it altogether by accident."

"Certainly," said Juliet, half sarcastically, "she might have thought that the second class had arranged that some one should demolish her plants, and had chosen Belle to do it; nothing so natural than that we should choose Belle, for she is twice the weight of any of us."

"Pooh!" said Miss Ward, "we are not joking now, Juliet. Well, she is scolded for leaving her plants on the walk, and then left alone to brood over her misfortune; opposite to her flourishes the favourite plant of the very girl who had tumbled over hers, and who has shown her plainly that she never ought to have possessed them; what more natural than that, in a moment of irritation, she should cut off its head? And if she did, then what more natural than all her subsequent conduct—her low spirits during the rainy weather, her disinclination to go into the garden, her lingering behind, that we might discover what had been done before she came up, her trying to account for the mischief and for the footmark, her confusion when she was shown that it fronted the wrong way——"

"Well, but go on to the end," said Miss L'Estrange. "I think her turning upon us with her 'No one said she did not,' was unnatural; I declare those words haunt me even now."

"Yes, that was unnatural," said Miss Ward frankly. "unless she is a very artful girl indeed; but I am inclined to agree with this little creature, that if she did it she is not artful; it was such a clumsy contrivance—it was striking such an open blow."

"No matter with whom you agree," said Miss Ashley, "we all know what you think, and what we all think. I never liked that girl, and I have reason to like her less and less every day."

"She did it," said Miss Morton: and she was generally so silent and cautious, that her words had twice the effect of other people's; and they all nodded assent.

"What does Sophia think?" said Miss L'Estrange, raising my head from her shoulder, and looking into my face.

"Oh," I replied, "I am sure now that it must be as you all say; I did not know before that it was so certain, but now I am quite convinced."

"Well then, the thing is, what shall we do?" asked Belle.

There was a pause, which the parrot filled with bursts of asthmatic laughter, and calls for Hester.

"Shall we tell Madame?" asked Juliet.

"No," said Belle stoutly; "it was my polyanthus, and it ought not to be told unless I choose."

"Very well," said her sister, "but something should be done."

"Yes, we can be cold to her, and never address her by her Christian name."

"And leave her to associate with the little ones, as we are doing now," said Miss Ashley; "why, she must be perfectly aware now that we are all in conclave together somewhere, and I dare say she suspects what we are talking about."

"I am very sorry for her," said Belle; "but she certainly ought to suffer for her behaviour. And yet only suppose, Mary, if she never did it after all!"

"If the sky were to fall," Miss L'Estrange replied, "then we should catch larks."

"Come now, Belle," said Juliet, "could it have been done without hands?"

"No, of course not."

"Did you do it yourself then? answer me that."

"No, of course not, you absurd creature."

"Did you, Sophia?"

"No."

And so she went all round.

"Did Nannette?"

"No, a thousand times no; nor Pauline, and the other two little ones were in before us."

"Did Madame do it, then?"

"Nonsense, Juliet."

"Well then, Massey might have got up in the night, for we should have seen her if she had done it in the day time; she might have come to Madame in the night, and asked for the key of the house door, saying that she felt it a duty to go and cut Belle's polyanthus."

"There, now, you have named everybody," said Miss Ward, "so be quiet, you ridiculous child."

"Every one but gardener," said Margaret, "and he never comes on wet days."

"And yet somebody did it," said Juliet; "so as we are all tired of the subject, let us drop it; only, by way of reflection, I must say, that this is a wicked world."

"So it is," said Belle.

"And if that canary of yours goes on much longer with his piercing, distracting shrill notes, he must be made an example of, for he is not fit to associate with reasonable creatures."

"Hush!" said Belle, "there is some one at the door."

Miss L'Estrange, as I have said before, was seated against the wall on a pile of empty boxes, having one for a footstool, and me on her lap; she had opened a blue parasol to shade us both from the sun, for just under the roof over her head was a wide low casement window, very dim through dust, and having on its ledge some empty blacking bottles, some dry bulbs, a red saucer full of nails, some bundles of list for the trees, the gardener's ink, a few stumpy pens, and a little cracked slate, with his accounts upon it.

On the floor, in a semicircle, sat our schoolfellows in various attitudes, the sunbeams passing over their heads, or just edging their bright hair with a golden border.

When Belle said "Hush!" I lifted my head from Miss L'Estrange's shoulder; the girls turned on their elbows to see who might be coming; the latch was lifted, and in walked Miss Palmer.

A bag of Indian corn under her arm, and a little pan of sopped bread in her hand, she advanced a step or two before she saw us, and when she did, it was with such a start that it shook some of the bread on to the floor.

She stood still, and those flashing grey eyes swept over us, and seemed to take back to her the inmost thoughts of our hearts; they noted everything in an instant, from the sunbeam on the floor which lay across her knees, to the rows of dried herbs hanging in bundles from the rafters, the green, and yellow, and wickerwork cages, the chalk pictures of little girls that we had drawn in profile on the whitewashed walls, the piles of empty flower-pots in the corners, the sudden silence that had fallen upon us, that it was on account of her entrance, and that the words which preceded it had concerned her.

As has before been said, she was exceedingly shy and reserved, but by her behaviour then I learned, as if by instinct (for I was by no means capable of explaining what I saw, or of setting it in language till long after), that her shyness and reserve had arisen from a desire to please, from over-estimation of those about her, and an extreme wish that we might love her; she did not at all fear when there was no hope that she might be loved, and when now, alas! she could neither admire nor esteem.

When the dark grey eyes had passed over the place they again returned to us: no one had stirred, nor spoken; still as a picture we sat before her, and some of us were conscious of a great change in her demeanour since the previous day. She turned without speaking, and advancing to her parrot's cage, took off the apron with which we had covered it, folded it up, fed her bird, and talked to him, as if she was truly unconscious of our presence. Then she quietly came up nearly close to where we were sitting, hung her seed-bag upon a nail, and without looking at us again walked to the door, and shutting it behind her, left us to our meditations.

"Well," exclaimed Miss Morton, when, as if released from a spell, we all changed our position—"Is that hardihood, or is it injured innocence?"

Miss L'Estrange made no answer, but as I reclined against her I perceived that she was agitated.

"I should be extremely sorry to do anything unjust," said Miss Ashley, in an uneasy tone.

Miss L'Estrange was playing with my coral necklace when her schoolfellow spoke, and giving it a nervous twitch the string gave way, and instantly she and I, and the girls below were pelted with a shower like little red hailstones; they shook them out of their laps, out of their hair, they chased them along the floor, and picked them out of seed-bags and out of flowerpots, but the half were not found; and in an animated search for the remainder the play-hour slipped away, and Miss Palmer and the polyanthus were forgotten.

And now followed two, or perhaps three weeks, which have left no vivid pictures of themselves on my memory, but such as they are I always look back on them with regret.

Children, though they may make rules and resolutions for themselves, do not often keep them consistently; and I believe that our determination to show Miss Palmer how much we were displeased with her would constantly have been forgotten, if she herself had not helped to keep it in our remembrance: when she forgot and talked in a friendly way unawares, some one of us, perhaps, remembered it, and answered with chilling coldness; and then, if we shortly forgot it, any unwonted familiarity seemed to bring it to her mind, and make her instantly shrink back.

Day by day the space between us widened; she would walk for hours together by herself in the shrubbery; and in our own room, while we talked, she would take a book: we were always affectionate and friendly to each other, she was always shut out; we played together, she amused herself; we had always done very well without her, now she was trying hard to do without us.

Madame, besides her little girls, had two sons, Prosper and Emile by name, two troublesome little monkeys, of the respective ages of ten and twelve. It should have been mentioned before, that though she had long kept this school, she had not long been a widow. Her husband, during his lifetime, had superintended the religious training of the pupils; but now this care devolved on the minister of the parish, who once a week had us, class by class, in the vestry, and instructed us, together with two or three farmer's daughters, of about our own ages.

For some reason that I now forget, Prosper and Emile, about this time, came home from school for a few days, and gave considerably more trouble in the house than all the pupils put together. They dug a hole fifteen feet deep in which to bury a dead guinea-pig; they made a dam across the little river, and it overflowed and washed away some newly planted cabbages; they peeped in at the school-room windows, and made us laugh and lose our good marks; they teased our birds, they broke our battledores, they ran over our gardens; they conducted themselves, in short, according to their nature, which they could not help, so let us say no more about it.

In the interval between two sorts of mischief, as Prosper one sunny afternoon lay on his back upon the grass, singing, and tossing up his cap, he bethought himself of Nannette's rabbit, and inquired why he had not seen it among the other pets: Speck's mournful history was soon told: and the young Frenchman, sitting up, shrugged his shoulders and elevated his eyebrows, remarking that if Speck had been lost on those premises, on those premises he must be still.

"Why so?" asked Miss Ashley.

"Isn't there a wall along the side of the yard," said Prosper, "and doesn't a fence join it, and doesn't the water run all along this side of the garden, and the cherry orchard, and the hop plantation?"

"Well?" said Miss Ashley.

"Well; I should hope I know where the fence ends—it ends against the back of the boat-house, which is half out of the water and half in, so Speck must be somewhere in the garden or the plantation, for he cannot swim."

"But he can burrow," said Juliet; "and if not, the hops are growing so tall that you will never find him."

"We shall see," said Prosper; and calling his brother with a loud whoop, they both ran off to the hop-garden together.

"Excellent creatures, both of them," said Miss L'Estrange, "but some people are decidedly most agreeable at a distance."

As she said this, her eyes rested on Miss Palmer, who was standing near; not, I am sure, intentionally, for a gradual sadness and quietness had crept over this poor girl lately, which we all pitied; she, however, on meeting the glance of Miss L'Estrange, coloured, and drew back, evidently taking the remark to herself, for she turned away, and bent her steps to the solitary walk in the shrubbery.

She had just reached it, when, obeying a happy impulse, I ran after her, and catching her just as the shadow of the first laurel was cast upon her, "Miss Palmer," I exclaimed, "what are you going away for?"

She neither stopped nor turned, but walked resolutely into the very thickest of the shadow, till at length I ran before her, stood in the grass-path, and faced her.

She was pale, and perhaps the gloom cast upon her from the trees overhead helped to overcloud her face; but there was an energy in its expression that I did not understand. I saw she had been struggling with herself, for those wonderful eyes of hers flashed and changed their expression every instant; and though I had so bravely intruded upon her solitude, I now felt half afraid of her; she appeared all at once, and by reason of some peculiar insight that I had acquired into her character, to have become much older, far wiser, and incomparably superior to myself.

I thought so at the time, but since then I have thought that the change must rather have been in herself; either the absence of her usual colour, or something which she had just read in the little New Testament that she held tightly in both hands, had given to her features a strange look of awe, which increased as her excitement subsided, and which I cannot describe, though I have seen it characterised as,—

> "That look
> Which some have on their faces, who die young."

Though I had abruptly stopped her, she was too pre-occupied to speak at first, till, being determined she should not think that my friend and champion had intentionally distressed her, I laid both my hands on hers, which were clasped over the little book, and made an attempt to push her gently backwards towards the entrance of the shrubbery. I attempted, but did not succeed, and she looked down gravely into my face, and said, "What do you wish, Miss West? What do you mean?"

"Oh, Miss Palmer," I exclaimed, "you know—you know as well as I do, that Miss L'Estrange did not say that about people who are most agreeable at a distance, meaning or thinking anything about you."

"It does not signify what she meant," she replied, after a pause, "so much as what you mean."

As I continued to lean against her, holding her hands tightly (for I wished to elicit from her some admission that she felt I was right before I let her go) she looked into my eyes, and seemed to be quietly considering my features, and reading all my thoughts, as if learning me by heart. I did not shrink from her scrutiny, and we continued to look at each other till the expression of her eyes softened, and she smiled with that peculiar sweetness seldom seen but in those whose cast of countenance is grave and cold.

"I should be sorry if you thought we wished you to go away," I said, answering her last remark.

"Oh, then, you do care about me?" she answered, quickly.

"Care about you," I repeated; "oh, yes, of course."

I had forgotten at the moment that it was on my champion's account that I had followed her, and that only during the past few minutes I had cared about her for herself.

"I believe, since you assure me of it, that Miss L'Estrange did not allude to me," she then said, (I thought her language had also grown older), and as I released her hands, she put them about my waist and drew me nearer. I saw she wished me to kiss her, and I obeyed the wish, with a sort of consciousness that this was an important kiss to her, but no consciousness at all that during all my future life it was to be of importance to my peace that I should have given it. (To be continued.)

ON THE ROCK.

O! IT was lang, lang syne, mother,
When we lived by the sea,
Ye winna' mind it now, mother,
But it's like yestreen to me,
When I was gatherin' shells, mother,
Sae mony and sae fair,
I aye went on and on, mother,
And aye—a wee bit mair.

And a' the sea cam' in, mother,
Roun' by the creek o' Fyle,
And I was left far out, mother,
Alane on a sandy isle.
O! I was wae and eerie, mother,
I gied the wildest cry;
But naething cam' my way, mother,
But a sea-gull swoopin' by.

I saw the waves come washin', mother,
And ripplin' to my feet,
And roun' behind my back, mother,
I saw the waters meet,
Aye lappin' up the sands, mother,
An' I cried, "O maun I die!"
But naething but a gull, mother,
Took ony heed o' me.

There was a wee bit rock, mother,
I stood upon it then,
An' the sea cam' rollin' up, mother,
An' then I cried again:
I stared a dyin' stare, mother,
On the waters round and round,
But seven waves mair, I thought, mother,
The eighth—and I'll be drown'd.

And I was countin' them, mother,
And O! I never kenn'd
Wha brought me hame to you, mother,
But sure it was a friend;
O! I greeted then for joy, mother,
Wi' my head upon your breast;
I thought I'd never leave ye mair;
O mother, that was Rest!

But, mother, I am goin' now;
I've been a bairn sin' then,
Wanderin' and wanderin' on, mother,
Seekin' for shells again:
But I forgot the shells, mother,
When a' the waves cam' in;
I thought that I maun perish, mother,
In those dark waves o' sin.

But my feet are on the Rock, mother,
No' a wee bit rock like yon,
But on the Rock of Ages, mother,
An' the waves come rollin' on.
The waves have risen and fa'en, mother,
Mony a time sin' then;
I've fear'd to see them sometimes, mother,
But they've aye fa'en back again.

I'm waitin' on the Rock, mother,
And one dear voice I hear—
He will lay me in the boat, mother,
And take His place quite near.
For He is going wi' me, mother:
"I'll be with you," He said;
He calls to me frae the boat, mother,
"It is I—be not afraid."

When I cam' hame to you, mother,
I kenn'd o' naething between;
My feet were on the rock, mother—
My feet were on the green.
My feet are on the Rock, mother—
It may be, afore I ken,
I'll stand on yon sunny shore, mother,
And be at hame again.

Ay, in a brighter Hame, mother;
No sea,—no waves o' sin;
A Hame wi' nane goin' out, mother,
But mony comin' in.
If tears are there, I'll weep, mother,
Upon my Father's breast;
My heart is o'erflowin' now, mother—
O mother, this is Rest!

THE WALDENSES.

PART III.—THE PRESENT POSITION OF THE WALDENSIAN CHURCH.

THIS subject is twofold; for at the present hour, besides the position of the Waldensian Church within the valleys, she has a position beyond them. I propose, therefore, in this concluding paper, to notice, first, the present condition of the Waldensian Church in the valleys of Piedmont, and thereafter, her position with respect to God's work in Italy.

It may prove almost a misfortune for a man to have had a very famous ancestry, and the same is true of a nation or a church. The Waldenses have had a past so glorious and wonderful, that probably there are persons who, visiting their valleys, have come away disappointed, just because they went there with extravagant anticipations. We lately heard Dr. Revel, the President of the Waldensian College in Florence, tell, with a smile, how in ancient times the Papists fabricated the most childish stories about his forefathers; how, even in Turin, the ignorant multitude were made to believe that the "heretics" up among the mountains were a race of monsters, with hideous mouths and a single eye which glared in the centre of their foreheads. While we smile at this vision of demons, we must beware of picturing the modern Waldenses to ourselves as something akin to angels. We must not expect to find among the Waldenses, or anywhere else, universal piety, quenchless zeal, spotless purity; and we tell it to the honour of the pastors there, that more than once we have heard them lament that these graces are not more manifest among their people. It is true also, and the Waldenses have no wish to hide it, that their Church during her long and eventful history has passed through not only external but internal vicissitudes. Her light has not always burned with a pure and steady lustre, and the times when it shone brightest were not those of comparative quiet, but when the blasts of persecution blew the fiercest. There was a period towards the end of the last century, and in the earlier portion of the present, when the zeal of the Waldensian Church seemed to cool, and her faith itself to waver: the rationalism of Germany and Switzerland had been imbibed by at least some of the younger pastors, who in these days had to cross the Alps to study theology. In God's mercy that influence was not of long duration. Even at the worst their ancient standards remained sound and scriptural bulwarks of truth, and ere long evangelical professors in Geneva and Lausanne were raised up, and their influence manifested itself in a return to the old faith. A quickening commenced throughout the whole Church in the valleys, and some earnest Christians from England were greatly honoured about forty years ago in strengthening her reviving energies. Since that date, we rejoice to assure our readers that the Waldensian Church has continued steadily to progress, and each new year to develop new fruits in evidence of her internal vitality; so that the stranger who visits the valleys to-day with the simple desire to see the Waldenses as they are, will come away as we did with feelings of deepened affection and respect.

The writer had the privilege, along with deputies from four different Churches in England and Scotland, to be present at the meeting of the Waldensian Synod of 1865. The whole proceedings of that simple but solemn assembly, made up of seventy-two pastors and laymen, indicated a Church whose machinery, organisation, and discipline are in sound working order. I have since received from Italy the official report of that Synod, and one has but to glance over the subjects of each successive day's deliberations, to find abundant evidence that, in her care to inquire into the inner life of the different congregations, and in her sense of duty towards God's work throughout the world, this ancient Church of the Alps is still, as of old, a living one. The Waldensian Church is Presbyterian in form of government, and each pastor has a body of ruling elders, called anciens, associated with him in the care of his flock. The Synod or chief court of the Church meets annually for the transaction of the Church's business under the presidency of a moderator, whose term of office is one year. Five members, the moderator being one, are chosen at the Synod to form the Table, or executive body, which by the constitution of the Church manages all her affairs during the year, internal and external alike. In a former article I referred to the time-honoured writings which are of authority among the Waldenses, especially the "Noble Lesson," dating from the 12th century. Among her more recent standards, copies of which we procured in the valleys, are the Confession of Faith, compiled in 1655; the Catechism, which has recently been adopted in place of Osterwald's; and the Liturgy; (for, Presbyterian as the Waldensian Church is, her public services are more or less regulated by a book of Common Prayer)—all these are eminently clear in statement and scriptural in substance.

It would be easy to give statistics regarding the actual condition of the Church as it exists at this hour in the valleys; but I believe it will be as instructive, and probably more interesting, to my reader, if I attempt to sketch the state of things as we found them in one of the upper parishes. The fifteen parishes are classed into upper and lower, according as their situation lies nearer or farther from the higher Alps. In the lower parishes—for instance La Tour—one finds a considerable admixture of an extraneous and modern element among the people; and, being desirous to see the native Waldenses in, as far as possible, their primitive state, we were led to visit the parish of Massel in the upper extremity of the Val San Martino, where we spent part of three days, one being a Sunday. As the event proved, we were most wisely directed to Massel. Never can we forget our sojourn in that wild and solitary nook of the Alps, nor the abounding kindness received under the roof of its devoted young pastor, Philip Cardon, and his genial wife. Living faith, intelligence, and refinement are beautiful in combination anywhere. We found all three in that simple dwelling amid the wilds of Massel, and there, the combination seemed to have a peculiar charm.

The upper portions of the valley of St. Martin are not only beautiful but grand—almost sublime. We had left the vine and mulberry far beneath, and even the walnut and chesnut began here to give place to the shaggy pines which showed themselves high up on the mountain's side, dark-green among the snows. The shadows of evening were around us as we approached the hamlet of poor little wooden cabins called Massel, 5000 feet above the sea-level; and as our path at certain points was but a ledge on the side of almost perpendicular cliffs, it was a matter of some anxiety to traverse it; two of our party, of whom one was a lady, being obliged to employ mules, and a single false step here might have hurled both beast and rider into the foaming Germanasca far below. When Massel came in sight, though the sun had quite left the valley itself, it still tinged with crimson the snowy peaks above the village: and never did a loving welcome and repose seem more grateful than that night. Next day was the Sabbath, and no words can describe the striking character of the scene as we went forth in the early morning from M. Cardon's house, which stands high up on the mountain side. The whole valley seemed pervaded with a sabbatic stillness, which the murmur of the stream below seemed but to make the more profound. The air was deliciously fresh and pure, the foliage in its tender green of early spring; and on either side, the mighty mountains opened up into solemn ravines, at whose extremities sharp peaks of glittering snow and naked rock rose into the blue sky, from which the morning sun was pouring down a flood of light on the whole scene.

> "It seemed as Nature's self would raise > A temple to her Maker's praise."

And what a welcome contrast this Sabbath morning among the Alps, to the dust, and din, and roar of carriages on a continental Sunday in Naples or in Paris!

The church, or temple—a plain unadorned building—stands on the opposite side of the valley, amid a few unlettered grave-stones, where "the rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep." From many directions around we saw the people gathering to service in little groups, and on entering the church at ten o'clock we found it filled. The congregation must have numbered 500 at least. The men enter by one door, the women by another, and sit on different sides of the building, according to the ancient, but, as we thought, unreasonable custom of the Waldenses in their worship. The whole aspect of the congregation was grave and thoughtful, the attire of both sexes very homely but clean, the women, younger as well as older, wearing a kind of cap. Bonnets we saw none. The men generally shave the upper lip, and many are by no means dark in complexion. In fact, one looking round the audience might almost have believed he saw a congregation in the Scottish Highlands, or North Wales. The wall opposite the pulpit bore, tastefully painted in colours on the plaster, the ancient and most appropriate device and motto of the Waldensian Church—a candle burning in a candlestick, and around it seven stars, with this motto underneath, "Lux lucet in tenebris"—"The light shineth in the darkness."

When we entered, a ruddy flaxen-haired boy was reading aloud a portion of Scripture from a large Bible placed on a table below the pulpit, following it by Osterwald's commentary on the passage. We learned that this youth was that day a substitute for the regent or schoolmaster of the parish, whose office it is, in all Waldensian churches, to read the Word of God during the assembling of the congregation. When the pastor ascended the pulpit, he commenced the service by reading the Ten Commandments, which he followed by offering the Confession of Sin contained in the Liturgy. During the reading of the Law and at all the prayers the people stood, while during singing they kept their seats. The book board of the pulpits is to one side, not in front; consequently, perhaps, one never hears a read sermon in a Waldensian temple. The congregation sing very slowly, and the tunes seemed chiefly in a minor key; the effect produced reminding us strongly of the Gaelic psalmody in the Scotch Highlands. The morning service over, we were present at a very interesting meeting of the children, who were catechised and instructed in an admirable manner by their pastor.

In the evening we learned much from M. Cardon about the trials and the encouragements of a Waldensian pastor's life. It is the custom to appoint the younger clergy, in the first instance, to the higher parishes, such as his; and when they have borne the laborious fatigues which these entail for a certain number of years, they are then transferred to an easier sphere. The long distances to be travelled on foot, the well-nigh inaccessible paths, the weary winter of seven months, and the deep poverty of almost the whole people, all combine to make a mountain parish in the valleys a trying field of labour. On our way to the Balsille next morning, our friend pointed out to us a spot where, in the former winter, he had well-nigh lost his life, when on a call of duty, by slipping his foot on the treacherous ice of the narrow foot-path. In an instant he was carried over a steep ledge of rock which overhung the torrent below; and had he not providentially been rescued by two of his flock who accompanied him, he had never reached home alive. We could realise his danger all the better when, on returning to his house, he showed us the framework of iron beset with spikes more than an inch long, which, on his winter journeys, he fastens to the sole of his boots, as we do skates, not however to help, but retard his progress. This young minister has had the satisfaction of seeing an end put to some forms of Sabbath desecration which existed formerly in his parish, such as merry-makings on the evenings of the Lord's Day, to which he boldly went, accompanied by the elder of the district, unbidden and unexpected, administering then and there a solemn and well-timed rebuke; and his faithfulness has been blessed and successful. Further, he has had the satisfaction of seeing a growing desire among his flock, within a recent period, for meetings of a different and much better kind—gatherings in private houses for social prayer. If the Waldensian pastor's work be severe, his worldly recompense is very small. Some few of the pastors are not wholly dependent on their scanty incomes, but most of them are so; and Christians in this land of ours who can spend 20*l.* on a single occasion of sumptuous hospitality, should know that this sum is exactly one-third of the whole income (including house and garden) which these Alpine pastors have for themselves and family. They are "passing rich on sixty pounds a year." It may not be wrong to spend 20*l.* on a dinner-party; but surely those who do so, should have something to spare for the Waldensian missions in Italy!

And this reminds me to say a word or two concerning the poverty of the Waldenses as a people. God has recently called them to go forth on a great work in their own land, as we shall see: they are willing to give the agents and the labour in that work, but their poverty absolutely precludes them from supporting these agents; this is what we are asked to help them to do. One has but to see the little patches of land from which a family derives its whole subsistence, to learn how poor the generality of them must be. We do not say this to excuse the want of tidiness and cleanliness too apparent in their dwellings; but it quite explains the scanty furniture, and unhealthy colour in many of the children, which it pains one to observe. In the mountain districts we generally found the cottage windows unglazed; but the square sheets of paper which supply the place of glass, and which seemed invariably written leaves of children's "copy-books," give curious evidence that if the Waldenses are poor, they prize and obtain education for their little ones. Wishing to see a truly primitive Waldensian home, the pastor of Massel introduced us to one—a sample of others around—which was nestled at the foot of the historic rock called Balsille, at the head of the Vallée St. Martin. We had to enter this rude wooden cabin by an outside stair—or ladder, rather—at the head of which a low door ushered us into a dark and narrow passage, emerging from which, we found ourselves in a room low-roofed, and dimly lighted by one small window. Here, and in a small closet beyond, the family have their summer quarters; but in winter, from want of fuel, which they cannot afford time to cut, the whole household migrate (and it is the same with half the families in this mountain parish) where?—to the byre or cow-house below; and there, while the snow for six or seven weary months lies several feet deep around, these poor people live and sleep beside their cattle for the sake of the warmth which the brutes give forth. To verify this, we entered the cow-house at the foot of the stair outside, and saw the rude bedsteads arranged somewhat as berths are in a ship. The sight was sad enough. Yet these people were God-fearing and intelligent; and in their welcome to their young pastor, as he entered their poor mountain cabin, and his kindly words to them, we were reminded of the intercourse between Felix Neff or Oberlin and their flocks. I should not forget to mention one circumstance peculiarly significant. Amid all the meanness of the abode, we observed in a corner of the little room upstairs, a few shelves, and on these shelves no less than thirty books—larger or smaller—for we had the curiosity to count them; and what was our surprise to find among them, translated by a French Evangelical Society, one or two tracts by Mr. Ryle, and at least one of C. H. Spurgeon's sermons! Here, in a poor hut in a wild gorge of Northern Italy, to find these English worthies was indeed a pleasant surprise. But we were among the Waldenses; and it is as true of them now as of old, "Lux lucet in tenebris"—"The light shineth in the darkness."

In Naples, with 500,000 inhabitants, not one person in ten can read; but Naples is a Popish city, and Popery never was partial to educating the masses. In the Waldensian valleys, on the contrary, we found schools everywhere. Will it be believed that in this little territory, some twenty miles long by eighteen broad, while there is a college at La Tour, a Latin grammar-school at Pomaret, and fifteen principal schools, one to each parish, there are upwards of one hundred schools throughout the district, if one includes the smaller side schools, open some three or four or five months in winter, one in each quartier of each parish!

In former papers in this Magazine (see SUNDAY MAGAZINE for 1865, pp. 7 and 852) accounts have been given of the educational establishment at La Tour, and of the great services of Dr. Gilly and General Beckwith in connection with these and other Waldensian operations. On these, therefore, we will not enlarge, but proceed to notice our second subject:—The present position of the Waldensian Church with respect to Italy.

The present most hopeful position of the Waldenses has been attained, under Providence, as a result of the great political changes of 1848 and 1859-61. In 1848, Charles Albert, King of Sardinia, granted a free constitution to his subjects: and it was on February 17th of that same year that he passed an ever-memorable decree, emancipating the Waldenses from all civil and political disabilities, and securing to them the free exercise of their worship throughout his kingdom. It was a kingdom of four millions then: it numbers twenty-two millions to-day. Charles Albert was the only Italian sovereign who, in his constitution of 1848, inserted a clause securing religious liberty to his subjects; and while God has removed the Italian despots from their places, the son of Charles Albert not merely retains the throne of his sires, but wears the crown of United Italy: so that now the Waldenses, as subjects of Victor-Emmanuel, and by his father's act secured in full liberty of worship, may go forth with an open Bible among the twenty-two millions of their fellow-countrymen, and preach the very faith for which their fathers had to die.

Have they taken that work in hand? What response are they giving to the call of God's Providence? How are they employing their marvellous opportunity? The following table furnishes the reply; and if my reader take the trouble to glance at a map of Italy, he will see the extent of the ground occupied from the position of these stations. At each of them the Waldensian Church has one or more agents, whose number and special work is indicated below :—

Be it borne in mind that it is but eighteen years since the Waldensian Church found access to any of these stations ; and in respect to the larger number, five years only : yet, wherever she now has an ordained labourer, there is gathered a congregation varying from some forty souls up to four hundred—in some cases the communicants number nearly two hundred, of whom the majority have come out from the Church of Rome.

Where, I ask, on the face of the earth, have we an illustration of Divine Providence more remarkable than the past history and present position of the Waldenses present? Now, at length, we discern God's intention in hiding them so long among their mountain recesses ; in preserving the truth there during the long night of the dark ages, and through the centuries of persecution which followed. He had a work for this people to do in Italy.

When on a bright Sunday morning last May, we approached the spacious building which raises its ornate pinnacles in front of the Corso del Re at Turin, we scarce believed it could be the Chiesa Valdese, or Waldensian church, till we saw over the open porch this inscription, carved in large Italian characters : "Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls." The date of this building is 1853. The service in the morning was French, in the afternoon, Italian. A large congregation of many hundred persons filled the building on both occasions. M. Meille, the pastor, a native of the valleys, is a deeply pious man,—tall, dark, and striking in aspect. He would in any country, and in any language, be esteemed a great preacher ; and apart altogether from the Waldensian population, and the converts from Popery, his presence in Turin is most important ; one proof of which I cannot forbear to mention. A very interesting institution, called "Artigianelli Valdesi," exists in that city. It is in fact a home for sixteen poor, friendless Waldensian boys, who are there brought under kind and Christian influence, saved from ruin, and taught a trade—hence the name. To enlarge this institution, a sum of 31,244 francs (about 1250*l.* sterling), was last year placed in M. Meille's hands by one of his congregation, as a thank-offering for spiritual good received under his ministry. The donor was Baron S——, the Russian Ambassador, who, while the Italian court resided at Turin, joined each Lord's Day in the simple worship of the Waldenses.

Returning in the afternoon to the Italian service, conducted by the younger M. Meille, we found a most interesting audience, many of them recent converts from Popery ; and besides the congregation, who were seated, there was a curious peripatetic assemblage of men, women and children, who entered the porch from the open street, attracted by curiosity, and kept coming and going during the whole time of the service. To a stranger it seemed an annoying interruption, but the preacher and the regular congregation were evidently quite accustomed to it. We learned afterwards that these comers and goers are all Roman Catholics. Some stay but a few minutes ; others longer ; while others, arrested and interested, remain to the conclusion of the service, and not a few who are now members in the communion of the Church were thus first gathered in. The singing was inexpressibly touching. Something, no doubt, might be due to the associations of the scene ; but as the swell of those rich Italian voices, which almost drowned the organ, rose in the hymn, "Di pace al principe," the effect was thrilling. One felt within that church that the Psalmist's words might have been penned expressly for these Waldenses : "Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads ; we went through fire and through water ; but Thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place." How wonderful, that, in the very city from whence, two centuries ago, the Propaganda sent forth an edict to exterminate every Waldensian by fire and sword we should hear the Gospel preached in Italian by a Waldensian ! Looking round the audience we saw some soldiers in uniform ; soldiers of Piedmont here met peacefully to worship God ; and remembering the old persecutions, Isaiah's prophecy came to mind : "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb."

In other papers in this Magazine mention has been made of the little college at La Tour. The new sphere which God's Providence lately called the Waldensian Church to occupy suggested at once the desirableness of transferring the theological department of the college from the valleys to a more central position in Italy. A long-tried friend of the Waldenses, Dr. Stewart, of the Scotch Church at Leghorn, deeply impressed with this necessity, appealed to one or two friends in Britain and America for help to secure a large building which in 1861 was vacant in Florence. The needed 5000*l.* was at once put into his hands, and the Palazzo Salviati secured. It was with no little interest that we visited this building. Half-an-hour previously we had been looking up to the barred window of the prison where, a few years ago, Francesco and Rosa Madiai had been confined for reading the Word of God—and here, in the same city, and in what had formerly been the palace of a Cardinal, we heard the Word of God publicly expounded to a class of fourteen youths who were to go over the length and breadth of Italy as ministers of the Gospel. Stranger still—the very man to whom they were listening, Professor Geymonat, had been in 1854 himself imprisoned in Florence like the Madiai. In the lower story of this old palazzo we visited the Italian schools of the Waldensian Church, where the New Testament is daily read and taught: here, too, is a printing office—the Claudian Press—where we found eight or nine workmen busily printing the Word of God, the Pilgrim's Progress, Catechisms, and exposures of Popery, all in Italian. These publications are issued unceasingly, and sold at the depots of evangelical books, which are established in Leghorn, Genoa, Milan, Naples, &c., as well as by colporteurs throughout the Italian kingdom. As we emerged from this busy scene into the sunny cortile, or open inner court which one invariably finds in Italian palazzos, it was significant indeed to observe, looking down on us from one of the lofty windows, not the portly form and scarlet cape of old Cardinal Salviati, but the beaming face of Dr. Revel, a descendant of the martyred Valdesi, now President of the College here.

There is much more to tell, but we must draw these sketches to a close. Our aim throughout has been, not merely to enlist the interest of our readers in the marvellous story of the Waldenses, but to press on their attention the special reason why at the present hour we should remember them in our prayers, and afford them the material help they need for the new work which God has given them to do. From the snowy Alps to its most southern extremity, Italy (excluding Venetia and Rome) is now open to the truth. Not indeed that the people are all ready to welcome it. Alas! no. There is everywhere among the masses a woful amount of ignorance, which the priests turn to account by prejudicing them against Evangelical teaching, (witness the recent outrage at Barletta, where the mob, hounded on by the priests, massacred nine persons connected with the Evangelist's meeting :) and sadder than the blind ignorance of the masses, and harder to deal with, is the immorality, the indifference to all religion, and open infidelity of the educated and the refined.

Nevertheless, Italy is at this moment as it never was before opened to the circulation and preaching of God's holy Word. Side by side with that great fact mark this other :—In a remote northern corner of that land God has for long centuries marvellously preserved a community of men who have held a pure faith amid fearful trials, and who constitute at this hour a Christian Church, small indeed and poor, but thoroughly organised and in full working order. These Waldenses have proved their willingness to come forth from their seclusion, now that God has opened the way, and to take their share in the glorious work of Italy's evangelisation. Already they have fifty-six agents in the field. They are willing to give life and labour; they can give no more. They are very far from putting themselves forward as the only agents suitable for this great enterprise: they welcome other Christian agencies, and feel that all are too few. But this they do claim,—a pre-eminent fitness for the work: and it is the truth and justice of this claim which we anxiously press on our readers. The Waldenses are Italians by birth, and by civil rights and privileges. They are Italians, who, in Italy, since the days of the Primitive Church, have opposed the tyranny of Rome, and resisted it even unto blood. They possess standards eminently scriptural. They constitute no undefined religious society, but an organised Church; and we maintain, that if all this be borne in mind, it were to ignore the clearest indications of God's Providence not to give them the chief place in our sympathies, and the chief share of our contributions for the evangelisation of long-benighted Italy.

A special appeal is at this moment made by the Waldensian Church to British Christians. To continue even her present amount of Evangelistic work in Italy, an annual sum of 4000*l.* is needed from this country. If we refuse it, some of her stations must be closed. Silver and gold the Waldenses have little of; but what they have—the men and the work—they give freely. Surely this is an occasion when the Apostolic injunction will touch the consciences and open the hands of many amongst us: "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

In the following passage, not more striking than true, Mr. Ruskin addresses a class of persons becoming each season more numerous; and as bearing on my present subject—the duty we owe to Christian brethren on the Continent—I venture to append it here :—

"There has now (1857) been peace between England and the Continental powers about thirty-five years, and during that period the English have visited the Continent at the rate of many thousands a year, staying there, I suppose, on the average, each two or three months; nor these an inferior kind of English, but the kind which ought to be the best—the noblest born, the best taught, the richest in time and money, having more leisure, knowledge, and power, than any other portion of the nation. These, we might suppose, beholding, as they travelled, the condition of the States in which the Papal religion is professed, and being, at the same time, the most enlightened section of a great Protestant nation, would have been animated with some desire to dissipate the Romanist errors, and to communicate to others the better knowledge which they possessed themselves. I doubt not but that He who gave peace upon the earth, and gave it by the hand of England, expected this much of her, and has watched every one of the millions of her travellers as they crossed the sea, and kept count for him of his travelling expenses, and of their distribution, in a manner of which neither the traveller nor his courier were at all informed. I doubt not, I say, but that such accounts have been literally kept for all of us, and that a day will come when they will be made clearly legible to us, and when we shall see added together, on one side of the account-book, a great sum, the certain portion, whatever it may be, of this thirty-five years' spendings of the rich English, accounted for in this manner :—

". . . To shell cameos and bits of mosaic bought at Rome, so much ; to coral horns and lava brooches bought at Naples, so much ; to glass beads at Venice, and gold filagree at Genoa, so much ; to pictures, and statues, and ornaments, everywhere, so much ; to avant-couriers and extra post-horses, for show and magnificence, so much ; to great entertainments and good places for seeing sights, so much. This, I say, will be the sum on one side of the book ; and on the other will be written—

"To the struggling Protestant Churches of France, Switzerland, and PIEDMONT, so much.

"Had we not better do this piece of statistics for ourselves, in time?"

A FEAST OF ISRAEL.

It must have been a very beautiful sight to witness the tribes of Israel going up to "the sanctuary" to worship the Lord of Hosts on the Feast of the Passover. As this first and greatest of the three festivals of the Law fell to be held in spring, nature and religion united to cheer the heart of the people, and to tune it, like a sacred harp, for the celebration of the praise of Jehovah. So early as in February (Adar), the Levites sped through the country in all directions, preparing the way for the expected travellers. The roads and bridges were inspected, the wells and tanks were cleaned and repaired, and the adjacent fields carefully examined, lest the feelings of the pious might be offended by the sight of anything unlawful. The graves were fenced in or whitened, so as to be conspicuous at a distance, lest any of the Lord's guests should be defiled by touching them unawares. For it was emphatically enjoined in the Law that no unclean person should eat of the paschal lamb. Should any one unfortunately be in that state, an opportunity was given him to eat it the next month, which was called the Lesser Passover. This, however, was regarded as a poor compensation for the loss of those enjoyments which the Great Passover alone could furnish. To go up to Jerusalem with the families of the house of Jacob ; to walk with beloved friends across the hills and valleys of Judah, now blooming with the fresh life of spring ; to see the Holy City clad in its most beautiful attire, and peopled at this time with thousands and hundreds of thousands of the tribes of Israel ; to witness the worship of the Lord in its highest splendour ; to hear the songs and rapturous responses of the priests and the Levites, and the hallels of the innumerable multitude ; to enjoy the merry din and bustle of so many cheerful guests, young and old, rich and poor, from far and near,—all this was too grand and too impressive not to be looked forward to throughout the year as one of the greatest blessings and privileges which a son of Abraham could enjoy while he was in the land of the living.

The Passover, which lasted seven days, commenced on the 15th of Nisan, and ended on the 21st, but the 14th used to be included in the number of the sacred days, since on the close of that day the paschal lamb was to be killed. In Egypt, where the feast was celebrated for the first time, the lamb was chosen from the flock as early as the 10th of the month. This custom, it seems, obtained in Palestine as long as the people continued to kill the lamb in their own houses, according to the original precept in Exodus xii. This precept, however, was modified by a later commandment in Deut. xvi. 5, 6. The people were instructed by it that, after they had taken possession of the promised land, they should not "sacrifice the passover within any of their gates, but at the place which the Lord should choose to place his name in." But this modification, it would appear, was not carried into practice even after the Temple was built, and the worship of the Lord centred there. The people continued to kill and eat the sacrifice in their own houses on the evening of the 14th, and to go up to Jerusalem on the 15th to celebrate the Passover on the ensuing days, "the days of the unleavened bread." It was, most likely, owing to this disregard of the Law that the influence of the Passover gradually declined during the reign of the kings of Judah. Not until Hezekiah's attention was drawn to this neglect was a reform commenced (2 Chron. xxx.). We are informed that this reform met with considerable opposition from many who were loth to abandon the old habit. The posts, whom the king had sent from city to city, "they laughed to scorn, and mocked." It was his great and pious grandson Josiah who succeeded in carrying out the reform in its full extent. He restored the Passover, "so that it was done in such a sort as it was written." The people no more killed the paschal lambs within their own gates, but brought them to Jerusalem, and killed them there. From those days, too, the lawyers and pharisees took charge of the organisation of that great solemnity. They drew up a set of rules and regulations, describing in the minutest detail every thing to be observed, not only during the days of the festival, but for a considerable time before, in order to secure perfect observance, according to the Law. It was required by this code that the Passover should be held every year in Israel, and it was so as long as there was a Temple in Jerusalem. We find those regulations fully recorded in the Talmud. It is strange that though the Jews held stubbornly to the old habit of killing the paschal lamb in their houses before the Temple was built, they are now very averse to that habit, and have been ever since the Temple was destroyed. The Jews in the present day observe "the feast of the unleavened bread," but keep no true Passover, no lamb being killed. This is all the more remarkable, in that the paschal lamb is the only sacrifice they could have safely continued, since according to its original institution it could be offered by every master of a family without the aid of a priest and without an altar. But just as God once caused Caiaphas to prophesy what he did not mean, and as He caused Pilate to write what he did not understand, so He has caused the Jews to confirm that which they do not believe; for by doing away with the offering of the paschal lamb altogether they have confirmed the truth of God, that the true Passover is sacrificed, thus rendering all other sacrifices worthless and absurd.

Through the reform of Josiah, the killing and eating of the lamb was confined to the Holy City, and the Israelite after that, as was to be expected, postponed the selection of a faultless male lamb till after his arrival in town. His care was all the greater, however, for the utensils which were to be used in the sacrifice, and which he had to carry along with him on his journey to the sanctuary and back. Many days before the festival commenced, the household was busy from dawn till dusk. A large kettle, which was never used on any other occasion, was filled with water and hung over the fire. Meanwhile, all the utensils of silver, copper, and tin, which had to be used for the sacrifice and in the eating of it, were scoured smooth and shining, and when the water was declared to be fully boiling, they were dipped into the steaming fluid, and then quickly washed over again with cold water. Iron implements were put in the fire till they were red hot. Iron mortars were filled with red hot coals, which were kept glowing till a thread wound round the outside of the mortar was burnt away. Wooden utensils were cleaned, or, as the term was, made kausher, by means of a red-hot stone, which was rubbed across them after they had been dipped in boiling water. The earthen wares had to be all new, and to be declared kausher,—thrice dipped into boiling water. Similar were the purifications prescribed for the table at which the family was to eat the paschal lamb, and similar were the requirements regarding the forms or stools on which they were to sit or to recline, the table utensils, and every other article of furniture which they were to use during a stay of at least eight days at Jerusalem. And they had to carry all those things up to the city and back, during a journey which lasted many days, across hills and through valleys, over rivers and rivulets; sometimes through charming scenes, and sometimes also through waste sun-burnt districts.

It was certainly no trifling matter for the master of a family to resolve on going up with his wife and children to Jerusalem to this feast; and we need not therefore marvel to learn that in the days of backsliding and idolatrous apostacy, those solemn observances were altogether neglected. Still, when the people were in the right spirit, they must have enthusiastically enjoyed those journeys, for they lay close to the very heart of their national life, and no doubt they were fully conscious of their blessings as the chosen and redeemed people of a holy and loving God. To our Western feelings, especially now that the comforts of travelling are carried to such a pitch of perfection, it would be strange to break up our household, and to travel with our family, carrying a quantity of furniture, some sixty or eighty miles, not for the purpose of permanently remaining, but merely on an annual visit to the metropolis. But to Orientals, and especially to Hebrews, who never could wholly forget their nomadic extraction, such a pilgrimage was nothing extraordinary. Of course the journey was accomplished in caravan manner; and dull, monotonous, and unsafe as travelling in that country was for single persons, it was very interesting, diversified, and agreeable when performed in company. And the Passover journeys must have been especially so. One was not then compelled to go with any caravan that might turn up, but could join a company after one's own tastes and inclinations. Many weeks before the journey, kindred families, living in the same neighbourhood, and united by ties of friendship, or by still higher sympathies, made arrangements to form a caravan, and the cheerful activity and intercourse these arrangements must have caused to the females and the young people may be imagined. The day appointed for the departure having arrived, the families which had agreed to form a caravan met together early in the morning, a little before sunrise, before the house of the eldest of them. Suddenly a merry noise turned the quiet of the morning into something of the lively din of a market day. The neighing of horses was heard, and the braying of mules and asses, as, burdened with the furniture and the provisions, they were ready for the road, while men, women, and children, assembling in cheerful confusion, welcomed one another with loud greetings, such as, "The Lord bless thee! The Lord preserve thy going out and thy coming in!" Then the eldest of the company, having offered up a short prayer or pronounced a blessing, recited, or rather chanted, the first verse of the 122nd Psalm, "I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go unto the house of the Lord," and the whole party responded in chorus, "Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem!" the fresh morning breeze carrying the merry tones across the fields to neighbouring farms, where other companies were assembling, and preparing for the same journey. Meanwhile the sun, risen higher, tinges the tops of the vine-clad hills with gold and purple, and the women and children are lifted on the backs of their beasts. Each one takes the place assigned to him or her, the eldest takes the lead ahead, the women with the children are placed behind him, and are shut in on both sides by the men, who ride or walk on the left and right, while the servants, with the beasts of burden, bring up the rear. And now, when the sun has dispelled the clouds, and is pouring down streams of gold upon pasture and vineyard, on hill and valley, all rejoicing in the fresh blessings of another spring, the roads, far and near, are seen to be dotted with journeying companies, whose bright-coloured dresses contrast strongly with the verdure of the terraced slopes around, and whose noisy joyful chatting, and harmonious choruses, mingle with the thousand cheerful voices of nature rising on all sides, from lea and lawn, and bush and grove. It is then that the unparalleled "Songs of degrees" (Ps. cxx.—cxxxiv.) are heard resounding through the land, pouring down into the valleys from the tops of the hills, and rising up again from the bottom of the valleys in cheerful response. One company is singing "Hail and peace" to another, and receiving in return a cordial "The Lord bless thee! The Lord be thy sun and shield." It seems indeed as if the whole of Palestine, from Dan to Beersheba, and from the river to the shores of the sea, were one great concert-room, and all Israel one choir bursting out into chants of praise to Jehovah. What an impression this must have made on the hearts of those pilgrims, as they travelled through the charming districts perfumed with the fragrance of the slopes of Hermon, with the mountains of Zion before them, when they heard the song rise from a thousand tongues, "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! It is like the precious ointment of Aaron, . . . as the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descendeth upon the mountains of Zion."

Arrived at Jerusalem the pilgrim family repaired to the house of the friend who was to accommodate them. It should be noticed that the host was remunerated by a present of the skin of the lamb, the oven in which it was roasted, and some of the vessels used on the occasion. Those who could find no accommodation in the town, pitched their tents outside the walls, so that Jerusalem from a distance looked like a beleaguered city. Then the lamb was bought which had to be killed in the Temple between three and five o'clock in the afternoon of the 14th of Nisan, for thus the pharisees and rabbinists understood the expression in Exodus xii. 6, "between two evenings." Meanwhile careful preparations were made for the celebration of the feast of unleavened bread, which was deemed to begin so early as on the 14th, because the bread was baked on that day, though not eaten before the paschal meal. Everybody on this day cleaned himself, cut his nails and hair, and took a bath, according to the precept in Exodus xix. 10. The most important business of the day was the careful searching of the house for the purpose of clearing away even the slightest particle of leavened bread that might be left, and preventing the possibility of any one committing a most serious offence against the Law, for it was written, "Every soul that eats anything leavened in these days shall be cut off from Israel." So after every one, brush and towel in hand, had carefully examined and cleaned all the rooms, cupboards, presses, boxes, and corners in the house, the master closed the proceedings by carrying the leavened matter which might have been found, in a closed box, to some remote spot, where it was burnt. He then solemnly pronounced over it the following words: "May everything leavened, save this, which may have been left in my house, without my knowledge, be scattered and made like unto the dust of the earth." Early in the morning the house-mother baked the bread or cakes, which were usually of wheat-flour, or, in default of that, of barley, rye, or oat-meal. She laid aside a portion of the dough and uttered these words: "Praise be unto thee, O Lord our God, who hast commanded us to prepare an unleavened cake." This cake was then taken to the Temple for the consumption of the priests.

At three o'clock in the afternoon the sounds of the trumpets, bursting down upon the town from the Temple, announced the commencement of the festival. The walls of the court of the Temple were hung with many-coloured tapestry, and nothing was spared to render the appearance of the building as splendid as possible. The usual evening sacrifice having been offered, the priests ordered the heads of the families, who were crowding outside the gates, each carrying a living lamb on his shoulder, to enter in. As the court could not possibly contain all of them, they were distributed into three divisions, and the first division having entered, the gates were shut. The sight which then presented itself to the eye must have been very imposing and solemnising. Two parallel rows of priests, all of them dressed in their festival robes, were seen forming a long procession, which extended from the court up to the entrance of the Temple, properly so-called. Those priests who formed the row on the left-hand side held each of them a silver basin in his hand; those in the opposite row held golden basins. Each head of a family then slew his lamb in order, and the priest who was nearest to him received the blood in his basin, which he handed to the next priest, who gave his empty basin in return. The blood having been in this way handed up to the last priest, who stood next to the altar, it was thrown out towards its base in a single jet, whence it ran off by tubes. Levites were spread through the crowd to assist the heads of families in killing the lambs, it being required that the work of the three divisions should be accomplished before five o'clock—within the space of two hours. At the same time the number of the persons who were to eat each lamb was ascertained. This number was not allowed to be under ten or above twenty. The slain lambs were suspended on the hooks which were on the pillars and walls of the court, skinned and cut up, and the fat given to the priests, who sent it up to the altar in the same way as they had sent up the blood. Here the fat was salted and thrown into the fire. Meanwhile the master of the family wrapped the lamb in its skin and carried it home. A spit, made of the wood of the pomegranate, was thrust lengthwise through the carcase, and the animal was thus put into an oven or sort of stove specially constructed for the purpose. It was so placed as not to touch the side of the oven, lest the cooking should be partially affected by hot earthenware and not wholly by fire, according to Exodus xii. 9. Two things were above all others to be observed: 1st, that no bone should be broken; and 2ndly, that the flesh should be thoroughly roasted. He who transgressed in either of these points was liable to a penalty of forty stripes.

Meanwhile the lamps were lighted and the table spread. Upon the males only was it obligatory to partake of the meal; the females were neither excluded nor compelled to be present. The roasted lamb occupied the middle of the table, right before the master of the family. A basin filled with bitter herbs, and another basin filled with a sweet sauce, were placed on either side. If the family was in good circumstances, each guest had a cup placed next to the piece of unleavened bread that was before him. If they were poor people, one cup had to serve for all, and went round from hand to hand. The latter was apparently the case with that company of poor Galileans, who on the memorable and solemn evening before the Crucifixion, for the first time ate the body and drank the blood of the true Paschal Lamb. The master of the family, having pronounced a short benediction, opened the meal by filling the first cup with wine, which was mostly red. This having been drunk, they then ate the bread and the bitter herbs, which were dipped in the sweet sauce. The second cup being filled, the eldest son, to fulfil the commandment implicitly contained, as was thought, in Exodus xii. 26, asked his father what the meaning of this festival repast was; whereupon the father told the story of the destruction of the first-born of the Egyptians, and the miraculous way in which the Lord rescued his people out of the hand of the angel of destruction, and out of the hand of Pharaoh, the mighty king. The "great hallel" (Ps. cxiii.—cxviii.) was then sung, during which the lamb was distributed among the guests, and the third cup filled. This was called by the special name of "the cup of benediction," because it was the cup that accompanied the lamb when being eaten. As the Apostle Paul gives the same name to the cup drunk by the Church at the Lord's Supper (1 Cor. x. 16), we may conclude that the Lord instituted that ordinance while He was filling the third paschal cup. After the eating of the lamb, the singing of the "great hallel" was continued; and then the fourth or last cup was filled. A short hymn closed the solemnity. In some families a fifth cup was added, on which occasion the so-called "greater hallel" (i.e. Ps. cxx.—cxxxvii.) used to be sung.

According to our manner of reckoning, this supper took place at the close of the 14th of Nisan, but as the Jews calculated the day from sunset to sunset,—i. e. 6 p.m.,—the paschal meal really began on the 15th of Nisan. Though the guests were all dressed in their travelling costume, and had their loins girded up to remind each other of the haste with which their fathers ate the first Passover on their flight from the land of bondage, yet no hurry took place in the eating of this commemorative repast. Nor was there any occasion for hurry, since the people had to repair to the Temple again about midnight. The whole evening, from sunset till about eleven o'clock, was consequently devoted to this supper; full scope being given for every one of the guests to contribute all in his power towards making this solemn religious feast at the same time a happy, cheerful, family repast. Here all cares were for a while dismissed, and each member of the company was called upon to assist in realising the peace and joy that became a family rescued by the mighty arm of the living God, and numbered amongst the generations in whom the Lord of Hosts is well pleased. We may imagine the lively conversation that was kept up among the dozen or score of persons, who, all united by one spirit, and believing in one God, here found an opportunity for expressing to one another those sentiments of cordial fellowship, which can nowhere be expressed so well as around the table of a family festival. For though the bread which was being eaten was called "the bread of affliction" (Deut. xvi. 3), yet no affliction needed to be felt in these happy circles, the affliction which gave the name to the bread being long past, leaving behind it abundant reason for thanks to Him who had delivered them out of it. This was not a fast, but a feast; and so every soul was invited to rejoice. Hymns were sung, and stories were told, and pithy sentences uttered, and riddles propounded,—this last being an innocent sport of which the Eastern mind is very fond, and in which the Eastern genius is peculiarly skilled. Thus in cheerful, cordial talk, the hours fled away, till the sound of the Temple trumpet called the happy guests to the sanctuary to return their thanks to the great Benefactor. During that night the Temple presented a spectacle not less lively than that of the preceding day. Few persons in Jerusalem went to bed. Everybody went to the Temple, the spacious courts of which were crowded. Nor did anybody go with empty hands. Of all the peace-offerings that were offered in the course of the year, these were undoubtedly the richest. A large portion of them fell to the priests; the rest was taken to the court of the women, where it was boiled. The families ate it in the eating-rooms of the Temple or took it home, but in no case was it permitted to be eaten outside the town.

The 15th of Nisan being the first of the days of unleavened bread, was regarded as an exceedingly holy day. And so was the 21st, or the last day. All the seven days of the feast were called Sabbaths, but the first and the last were called "great Sabbaths." The people were permitted to go to their daily labour (though most probably under considerable restrictions) on the five intervening days; but no work was done on the first or the last. Neither, if one of these five intervening days happened to be a Saturday, was there, of course, any work done on it. The seven days were also marked out by special sacrifices. Besides the usual daily burnt-offering, a feast-offering was offered every day, and this consisted of two young bullocks, a ram, and seven lambs of the first year as a burnt-offering, together with meat and drink-offerings, and a goat as a sin-offering. In addition to these public offerings, many offered private voluntary peace-offerings, taken either from the flock or the herd.

Connected with this festival there was a solemn thanksgiving to God for the blessings bestowed upon the crops, and a humble supplication for the success of the now-beginning harvest. Thus the Passover was also a harvest-feast. In the night of the 16th of Nisan some deputies of the Sanhedrim went to a field in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and cut a sheaf of barley, which, with the observance of several minute ceremonies, was dedicated to God as a wave-offering. It was from this moment that the fifty days were counted to the days of Pentecost. This solemnity was not exactly prescribed in the Law, but it was perfectly in accordance with the precept given in Lev. xxiii. 10, &c., and especially so with the spirit and meaning of the Passover. It was meet to remind the people of the truth that the God who had rescued them from the sufferings of Egypt and from the death-angel was the same who caused their food to spring up from the earth. There was a beautiful analogy between the exodus of the children of Israel out of Egypt and the spring. The revival of creation from the cold death-like winter-sleep was a striking illustration of the revival of Israel as the free people of God from the tomb of Egyptian bondage. When offering the first sheaf on the feast of Passover, they gratefully remembered that God on that memorable evening, when all the first-born in Egypt were slain, had by a great deed confirmed his saying to Pharaoh: "Israel is my son, even my first-born." It was on that evening that God had chosen them as the first-fruits of the nations, and that, as He brings up the life-sustaining bread from the dark bosom of the earth, so He had called them out of the dark pit of ignorance, idolatry, and slavery, to be a source of blessing and salvation, a quickening and nutritious bread as it were, to the other nations of the world. This great truth, however, was not fully understood in Israel until the true Passover was offered, and the only true deliverance from the only real slavery was consummated.

There were several interesting features in the symbolic character of the Passover suggestive of profound spiritual truths, and which revealed the heart of God in all the riches of its love. First it proclaimed, in the most graphic way, the great fundamental truth, that, boundless as God's willingness is to save sinners, yet salvation can only rest upon the firm foundation of perfect righteousness. There can be no manifestation of love at the cost of justice and holiness. The Passover was a sacrifice. God expressly called it by that name. (Exod. xii. 27.) It was a bloody sacrifice, in which the blood occupied, not a secondary, but the very first place; it was the conditio sine qua non of the redemption. Whatever may have been the spiritual privileges which Israel possessed as God's chosen people, none of these could have saved them from the sword of the angel of death. Their houses were not spared on account of their being children of Abraham, nor on account of their being circumcised, nor on account of any virtue or righteousness of their own. Notwithstanding all this, they would certainly have been struck with desolation, had the blood of the slain paschal lamb been missing from their door-posts. It is difficult to conceive how the truth that without sacrificial blood there is no salvation could have been proclaimed more emphatically. This was the manifestation of the great truth of God's eternal and unchangeable justice. But, at the same time, there was as emphatic a manifestation of God's eternal and unchangeable love to his people. It was not their blood which God desired to see. He provided another blood to be shed in the place of theirs. This fact could not fail to set the spiritually-minded a-thinking seriously over grave questions. That the blood of lambs could not save indeed, must have been perceived by such men as David and Isaiah. They must have been looking out for a Lamb which God himself was to provide. At length this Lamb appeared in the flesh. And with a shout of joyful surprise John cried, "Behold the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world."*

The paschal lamb was the first sacrifice which Israel as a nation offered at the command of God. It was previous to all the other sacrifices which were instituted under the Law. It was consequently the fundamental sacrifice, upon which the whole sacrificial system was based, and from which it sprang up like the tree with its branches from the one root. And this fundamental sacrifice was not offered by an ordained priest but by every head of a family. Here was another great truth taught to the people. "Ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests," said the Lord to them (Exod. xix. 6). Every time that the Jew slew and ate his paschal lamb he was reminded of his sacerdotal dignity. When assembled with his family round the paschal table, he was in the midst of them as a real priest of God, not merely in the figurative but in the true sense of the word. If he fully realised that fact, he could not be doubtful as to the place which was assigned to him as the head of a household in relation to God, nor could he be ignorant of the duties which hence devolved upon him in relation to his family. A better institution for securing the holy character of the latter could not be imagined. The family, again, when seated at the paschal table was made conscious of the fact that God had, in the most immediate way possible, united them with Himself. There was no mediator between them and God except—the lamb. There were no priests except the family themselves. All the other priests were instituted after the institution of the general priesthood. And they were also done away with, while the general priesthood continued. For the paschal lamb continued also. It is seated in the throne of God—the crucified Mediator between God and man.

This feeling of union in God as one family was strongly confirmed by the precept that the lamb must be eaten in a company. God is not a God of isolation. His feelings are social because He is love. Godly as it may look to some, yet there is nothing god-like in a hermit's life. A man who wants to enjoy God only for himself is least of all enjoyed by God. God is nowhere more pleased than where brethren dwell together in unity. It is there He "commandeth the blessing, even life for evermore."

And God desires a true, firm union; not a merely accidental, transient union, which may be broken at any moment. No bone of the lamb was to be broken. It must lie before the eyes of the guests as one whole thing, emblematic of the inseparable union which binds them together as a family of God. Just so the bread at the Lord's Supper, which symbolizes the body of the true paschal lamb, is one bread, and "we being many," says the Apostle, "are one bread and one body, for we are all partakers of that one bread." At the same time this union guarded against uniformity, or a fusion of the many into one. It was not the head of the family only who was permitted to partake of the lamb and to drink the cup. All the guests partook of it, each one showing by his act his cordial union with the whole body of the family.

* The author of "Ecce Homo" sees in John's exclamation, "Behold the Lamb of God!" only an allusion to the 23rd Psalm. According to his interpretation of the passage, John only compared Christ with a lamb in virtue of the meekness and gentleness of his character. This would undoubtedly have been the case if John had been a heathen, e.g., a disciple of Socrates. But John was a Jew, who from his childhood had every year eaten the paschal lamb, and had seen thousands of lambs slain at the altar as sacrifices for the sins of the people. In the mouth of such a man the expression "a lamb of God that taketh away sins" means something more than simply "a meek creature." It is very easy to make of the Gospels just what we please, if we do not care for the claims of history, and allow Jews to speak and to think like heathens. The Christ of Renan is a heathenish caricature of the Christ of the Gospels. "Ecce Homo" is an attempt to make that caricature available for the Christian Church.

The Passover meal was highly suggestive of the truth that God and his people have nothing to do with the corruption that is in the world. During seven days the people ate no other but sweet, unleavened bread. Leavened bread is impure bread, bread in a state of fermentation, — i.e., corruption and decomposition. The Passover was, as it were, a teacher of God crying all through Israel: "Take heed and beware of the leaven of Egypt, of the sin and corruption of the unholy, ungodly world. Let all that you feed upon, body and soul, be pure and clean. For I am holy, and there is neither sin nor darkness in me." And this teaching was re-echoed and perpetuated by another messenger of God, who, while pointing at the true Passover, said: "Let us keep the feast, not with old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness, but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth."

SELF-WILL.

I WOULD open out my life,
All my secret cares,
What the burden of my strife,
Where the growing tares.
Saviour, do not turn away,
Hear a wilful child to-day.

Bright and happy should I be,
Could I learn to wait!
Good in all things I should see,
And the journey straight,
Would I but my God believe,
And his blessed love receive.

But I cannot learn to say
"Let Thy will be done!"
And I do not really pray
That the fight be won.
Love of self and love of pride
Still the face of Jesus hide.

I would work, when Thou hast said
"Rest thee, and be still!"
Or I toss me on my bed,
Fretting that I 'm ill.
Gifts I have I do not use,
Gifts I have not, these I choose.

Yet the earth consents to wait
For the showers of spring,
And the birds defer to mate,
And the larks to sing,
Till the winter time is past,
And the trees are budding fast.

Thou, O Lord, hast waited long,
Sinful souls to save;
Make me in Thy patience strong,
All my lot to brave.
Teach me how to pray like Thee,
Then the Father I shall see.

Let my fondest hopes depart,
Or my days be few,
Only come into my heart,
Gladness to renew.
Then when all things pass away,
Bright will dawn my heavenly day.

Thee for life and death I choose,
All to Thee resign;
Then, whatever else I lose,
Thou wilt still be mine.
Where is there a Friend like Thee,
Who can love us perfectly!

A VISIT TO THE RAUHE HAUS AT HORN.

At five o'clock on the second morning of our voyage from Leith to Hamburgh—Friday, 19th August, 1864—the engines were stopped for a few minutes, and we heard in our berths the tramp of seamen and the hauling of ropes on the deck overhead. For want of a more likely suggestion, I concluded that a pilot must have been taken on board, although I was aware we were still at a considerable distance from the coast. Again, however, after an interval of an hour, the same thing happened. A third time, after I had come on deck, the engines were stopped, and then I discovered the cause of the phenomenon. The way of the ship was diminished in order to afford an opportunity of throwing the lead, so as to mark the soundings with greater exactness. The captain, an intelligent and polite officer, kindly explained to me the reason of the operation.

A bank of great extent lies here, in the course of a ship bound from Leith to the Elbe. Its slopes are gradual and regular; the soundings are minutely marked in the charts, at some places twenty-five fathoms, at others twenty, and at others fifteen. The point which navigators endeavour first to make is Heligoland, a small rock projecting from the sea, about thirty miles from the mouth of the Elbe. As the currents are variable, and the object small, seamen often experience difficulty in making the point; and the difficulty would be much greater if the bank were not in the neighbourhood. When they cannot see their way above the water, they feel their way on the bottom. The position and shape of the bank being known, to ascertain the depth under her keel determines the position of the ship.

But after we were in full sight of Heligoland, about twelve miles ahead, the master continued to throw the lead and to mark the soundings. Why? He did not then need to feel the shape of the bottom in order to determine his course, for the island was full in view in broad daylight: but he might need such measurements on some darker and sterner day; therefore he made his observations, and laid up the results in store for a future time of need. Wise navigator! Would that landsmen, as they sail across the sea of life to an eternal shore, would go and do likewise.

At the distance of a few miles, Heligoland presented the appearance of a large baronial mansion, built of red sandstone, rising sheer from a boundless lawn of level green. I played with this illusion until I almost believed it.

A small town of lively white houses nestles on the level ground, under shelter of the rock; and a few more adventurous mansions are perched on the side of the steep. Over all floats the British flag. We ought to bear ourselves modestly and gently among foreigners. We sometimes complain that they do not like us; but is there not a cause? We plant our foot on every land and every sea, with more regard to our own interests than either to the prejudices or the honour of other nations. The Channel Islands, bristling with British cannon, embosomed within a bay of France; Gibraltar, a strong hand on the throat of Spain; Heligoland, a British watch-tower at the gates of Germany; and many other advanced posts, seized and held without much regard to the wishes of our neighbours, prompt to jealousy and breed dislike. In these circumstances, it is the bounden duty of Queen Victoria's subjects, when they travel abroad, to avoid all haughty airs and irritating language. If we will retain our iron hand, we should at least cover it with a velvet glove, that our intercourse with neighbours may be pleasant and profitable.

Hamburgh is a great and crowded seaport. If Count Bismarck and his royal master could contrive to annex it, they would add a bright jewel to the Prussian crown. If the chief seaport of Germany were safely enclosed in the embrace of that ambitious monarchy, it would bring as dower to the successful suitor a large augmentation of influence in the counsels of peace, and of power in the event of war.

In the general aspect of the city, one feature arrests and surprises a stranger more than all beside. When you leave the river, and penetrate through the dense narrow streets that line its banks; when you begin to emerge into the opener and higher parts of the city, where the better-off classes reside, and expect to see something analogous to the parks and gardens of London and Edinburgh, you find lakes instead of lawns, water in lieu of grass. Immense sheets of water burst upon the view here and there, with palatial residences surrounding them, the white walls and glittering windows of the houses mirrored in the lake. In summer, when I saw these liquid play-grounds, small fairy steamers flitted to and fro like grasshoppers, delivering their passengers at one wharf, and puffing away to another. Small boats and gigs, propelled by rowers, old and young, male and female, made the surface of the lake literally alive. In winter, no doubt, when the boats are resting, the human passengers move about as thickly and as quickly on the surface of the ice. These intramural lakes, while they adorn the scene, serve as spaces for healthful exercise to the citizens.

For me, however, the chief object of interest at Hamburgh was Wichern's celebrated reformatory, the Rauhe Haus. The city, with its "sins and sorrows," affords, alas! a continual and abundant supply of the raw material, in the shape of neglected miserable children; and the Rauhe Haus is a grand factory, where the wretched débris of humanity, which the sea of dissolute society casts up on its shores, is done again into civilised and Christianised forms by the skill of trained educators and the power of Christian love.

How long, O Lord! how long, shall the wickedness of the wicked busy itself in providing work for the loving hearts and labouring hands of Christ's disciples? Patience! The Master did not disdain to visit this world—to become a man and die, in order that He might gather wrecks from that heaving sea. The servants must imbibe his spirit and follow his steps; the saved must in their turn be saviours. For this very end they are left awhile in the body, that they may save a soul from death and hide a multitude of sins.

On the morning of Saturday, the only day that I could devote to Hamburgh, I started, under the kind guidance of Dr. Craig, missionary of the Irish Presbyterian Church, to visit the Rauhe Haus at Horn. I shall not give here even the briefest sketch either of the history or the character of that remarkable institution. It has become familiar as a household word in this country since the publication of Mr. Stevenson's book, and it has been still further elucidated in the recent work of Mr. de Liefde.* Assuming that my readers already possess a knowledge of its early struggles and its later triumphs, I shall submit some notes of my own visit, and the impressions that I received from the scene.

In the first instance we were placed under the direction of one of the Candidats, and under his guidance we visited all the homes and workshops devoted to the boys. The distinguishing principle of the institution is that, instead of all the inmates being kept in one large building, classified according to age and attainments, they are distributed in about a dozen comparatively small houses, at some distance from each other, and arranged, as closely as circumstances admit, after the pattern of families. Brothers who are full-grown young men, under training for various missionary fields, dwell in the house, with a number of boys under their instruction, and a young minister superintends the whole. Here is a department of training for the ministry, which cannot be obtained in our colleges. The charge of one of these homes for a time must be well fitted to give a young man an experience which will be useful afterwards in every department of the ministry.

In this way, when it is by Christian wisdom and energy turned to account, even the wickedness of the wicked becomes an instrument of good. The miserable results of vice become in the Reformatory the means of educating missionaries, who shall hereafter contend with vice on its own field. Thus, the very filthiness of the dissolute city is compelled incidentally to give keener edge to instruments that shall be employed to cleanse that filthiness away; as the physical refuse of the city, when thrown back on the fields, increases the supply of the people's bread.

In these days, when men, feeling themselves brimful of philosophy, are much moved to part with what little of faith they once possessed, it is eminently instructive to notice, from the whole history of the Rauhe Haus, and similar monuments of Christian love, that faith in Christ, like the living stream, has set and kept all the mills going. With Wichern and his coadjutors in the real work of saving the lost, it is not a choice between praying and working. They pray and work; they work and pray. Those who work, do not cease to pray; and those who pray do not therefore cease to work. A loving Christianity seldom falls into any difficulty regarding the spheres appropriate to these two departments. If the lights are burning, there is no risk of a collision in the channel. I suppose those who do not pray are very apt to glide into the opinion that prayer is not fitted to have any effect on the various ills that flesh is heir to; and those who do not work upon the sores of the world are very apt to glide into the opinion that no amount of effort would produce any appreciable improvement. The grand lesson taught by the Horn Reformatory is, that when vice and ungodliness are bringing society to ruin, it is Christian Faith that hastes to the rescue. Wichern's saying is: Jesus Christ is the founder of the Rauhe Haus.

The most interesting and impressive memory of the scene that I retain is an interview with Wichern himself, its founder, and still its head. Although he now holds an elevated official station under the Prussian Government, he retains his house among the cottages of the Reformatory, and resides there some months of every year. He received us with the utmost kindness, and explained all his projects with enthusiasm. He bears the marks of a quarter of a century of heavy care and toils in the most difficult of all problems; but his eye retains its fire, and his step does not falter. His personal presence accords with the station he holds in popular esteem as the most eloquent man in Germany.

First of all he volunteered to lead us over those homes of the Reformatory that we had not yet seen. These happened to be the division appropriated to girls. When we came within reach of a troop of girls engaged in some species of industry, it was very curious, sometimes even ludicrous, to observe the struggle between reverence and familiarity that distracted these poor outcast maidens, when their father, and in a sense their saviour, passed by. They looked unutterable things from beneath their eyebrows, and smiled indescribable smiles when he jauntily hailed them as he quickly passed. I observed on several occasions, that of any band of girls that we approached, the one that stood on the flank nearest him held out her hand with a sort of girlish blush, and touched his; but none of the rest left rank—all seemed to count that they obtained in common the benefit of the vicarious salutation. Oh, that man is greatly beloved, greatly honoured. What are titles and coronets in comparison with the ardent love lavished on the great philanthropist from the full hearts of those emancipated immortals who consciously owe their redemption under God to him?

We returned to Dr. Wichern's house, and there he displayed with boyish glee a grand set of plans, just received from Berlin, representing a reformatory for that city on a great scale, on the model of the Rauhe Haus. This is the King's home, and that other Swiss cottage among the trees is the Crown Prince's, and so on; each separate family home of the projected establishment is the donation of some member of the Royal house, or of the wealthy aristocracy of the capital. With a humorous twinkle in his eye, Dr. Wichern gravely reminded us that the trees and shrubs that constituted on the plans a fairy surrounding to the several cottages had not yet grown. They effloresced as yet only on paper; but there was an earnest intention of carrying them into fact. It is to be hoped that the warlike ambition of Prussian statesmen will not divert them from that more blessed conquest that, under the lead of Wichern, they had at that date honourably begun.

A band of the Brothers from the Rauhe Haus had been in the Danish war, and the old man was eloquent in the narrative of their services on many bloody fields, not as soldiers, but as angels of mercy hovering over the contending hosts, and ministering to the wants, both bodily and spiritual, of the wounded on either side. Often these devoted men had carried wounded soldiers from where they fell under fire, and yet not one of them was hurt.

When I mentioned to Dr. Wichern that we in England and Scotland were very generally familiar with his work, through the exposition of it given in Mr. Stevenson's "Praying and Working," he paused, clenched his hand, and said with great solemnity and emphasis, "No man—no man (Nein Mensch), whether native or foreigner, has so well appreciated our work, both in its general features as a reformatory, and in the peculiarities which distinguish it from others." I think it my duty to bear my simple testimony to the fact, that in the opinion of Wichern himself, Mr. Stevenson has caught up his ideas, and communicated his conceptions to the British nation, with an accuracy that even among his own countrymen has never been surpassed.

As music holds a higher place among the reformatory and educational agencies in the Rauhe Haus than is conceded to it in similar institutions in our own country, I shall subjoin some account of their "song-book," printed by the inmates in their own establishment, which I bought in their shop and carried home.

On its title-page is a well executed device, representing a good shepherd with a wearied lamb on his shoulders, and a musical reed in his outstretched hand. To this device Dr. Wichern refers in the preface, as the appropriate symbol of the institution. Music mingles with every department of this reclaiming and reforming work. While the shepherd seeks and finds and carries home the lost, he holds the reed as an instrument in his hand. Christians who have tried this species of work know right well that music has not power to renew an evil heart; but wise men do not discard it as a servant because it possesses not the Master's life-giving power.

The design of the collection is thus expressed by Wichern in the preface:—"Whoever would understand this little book, must accept it as 'our songs' (unsere lieder); that is, as the songs which are sung by the inmates of the Rough House, and must imagine himself among that earnest and happy company to whom an earnest and happy song is a true heart's joy. When the sun shines from the blue heavens so clearly and cheerfully through the foliage; when the noise of the hammer and the plane is heard from the workshops; when we wander merrily and happily over the wide fields, and through the shady woods of Wandsbeck; when the holiday evening in summer assembles the boys in the beautiful chesnut grove, like a palace built of leaves and branches, where they swing in the boughs, and hold jubilee on the loftiest summits; when the girls sit at their noiseless work, or admire the beauty of their little flower-gardens, or rest under the shade of the pines;—then song rings heartily out from every breast, and every singer does his best. Whoever makes these songs resound in his heart as the unpretending utterance of such heartfelt joy in a life like this, will with us rejoice in them, with us sing them, and with us take now this, and now that one for his own, if he has not done so long before.

"The whole book bears the marks of its original design. As our first intention was simply to multiply for our own use copies of the songs which are sung here every day and every evening, very little order has been maintained in the collection. Every one is at liberty to arrange the songs according to his own taste: the main point is that each should sing with his whole heart, making that word of the poet his own:

> I sing as the bird sings
> That dwells among the branches.

. . . May it bear its part in the restoration of the frequently disturbed and even destroyed harmony between the peculiarly Christian and the national life:—a pair which should not stand over against each other as strangers, but mingle and unite, so that through their union they may work out the true regeneration of our people. May this little book also show what a healing, reviving, sunny life-power flows from a chorus of healthful song."

Wichern's idea, it will be observed, is to allow ordinary songs and specifically spiritual hymns to mingle and alternate as they do in the life of Christians. It is a precious conception, and worthy of earnest regard for all who are engaged in the spiritual training of the young, to weave the hymns of Christian faith as threads through all the web of common life. The songs of "Unsere Lieder," accordingly, in every case accompanied by the music, range through all the scale, from ordinary ballads of children's play or patriots' aspiration, up to the most elevated anticipations of triumphing Faith. I subjoin some specimens of these several classes, transferring the tone as well as the measure of the original as fully as I can into our vernacular, that the reader may obtain a more vivid idea than any description could convey of the instruments which, with the aid of music, have been employed with great success by our neighbours in reclaiming and elevating neglected youth. The first is a simple moral ballad of the Fatherland; the second is a gentle apostrophe to God's glorious works; and the third is the bold out-breathing of a fully-assured faith:—

I.

Sat a band of German princes
Once at Worms, in Kaisersaal,
Counting wealth and subjects, praising
Each his own land over all.

Proudly spake the prince of Sachsen,
"My dominion and its worth!
Why, the mountains teem with silver;
I draw treasures from the earth."

"See my land's exub'rant richness,"
Said the ruler of the Rhine;
"Golden harvests in her valleys,
On her hill-slopes luscious wine."

"Pop'lous cities, well-stored cloisters," Ludwig lord of Baiern cries
"For my country over others Justly claims the foremost prize."

Up spake Everard the bearded,
Wurtemberg's loved chieftain then:
"My land owns nor mines, nor cities
Charged with myriads of men;

"Yet it holds a hidden jewel,
This,—that wheresoe'er I tread,
On the breast of every subject
I can safely lay my head."

Then confessed the lord of Sachsen,
Lord of Baiern, lord of Rhine,
"Bearded count, thou art the richest;
Ours is dross, the gem is thine."

II.

When I behold the stars of night
That stud the sky with golden light,
Serene delight from heaven distils,
And peace divine my bosom fills.

And when their loving eyes meet mine,
I fain would rise to where they shine,
Behold their glory face to face,
And run with them their nightly race.

The moon, a beauteous silver boat,
On seas celestial seems to float;
While marshalled hosts their order keep,
To waft her through the silent deep.

Like watchmen, marching to and fro,
Around the world they gladly go;
To souls distressed a comfort given,
To hopeful hearts a type of heaven.

But farewell now, ye stars of night,
In watch so true, in sheen so bright;
While you aloft your vigils keep,
I softly close my eyes in sleep.

III.

Set me free; set me free,
That my Saviour I may see;
For my weary spirit longeth
Straight to join the crowd that throngeth
Round Him on yon glassy sea.

Sweetest light; sweetest light,
Through the dark clouds shining bright;
When shall life's bonds burst asunder,
That with all the holy yonder,
I may stand before Thy sight?

Ravishing; ravishing
Are the praises angels sing:
Over hills and valleys soaring,
Had I wings, I'd stand adoring
There this night our common King.

What surprise; what surprise
Waits in Zion my opening eyes;
City this that hath foundations,
Blessed home of ransomed nations,
There even now my treasure lies.

Paradise; Paradise,
What an ecstacy is this!
Trees of life in glory gleaming,
Heaven, indeed, and not a dreaming!
Bring us, Lord, to Paradise.

Christian hymns, in which the land of Luther has been peculiarly fertile, have, under Providence, performed an important function in keeping alive the people's faith in many parts of Germany, when another Gospel was taught in the schools and preached from the pulpits. In our own country, as well as in America, a revived spiritual life has of late years expressed and exercised itself through hymns constructed on New Testament models, and filled with the name and the doctrines of Christ. From the Scriptures, as the only fountain, should flow the streams alike of prayer and of praise; but while it draws all from the source of inspiration, the life of individual believers or of congregated churches should be permitted, as to form, to grow freely. It does not conduce to the health and comeliness of either the spiritual or the vegetable life, to crop the tree too closely in.

This notice of the Rough House song-book may be appropriately closed with lines from Karl Bormann—inserted by Wichern in front of all, by way of prologue—lamenting the decay of song, both common and sacred, as at once a symptom and a cause of national degeneracy. The verses, though aimed at the backslidings of our continental neighbours, may be useful in pointing out our own defects, and in prompting us to reform and revival.

Once in the German countries, folk were so rich in song,
That heart-warm music greeted you where'er you passed along.
In song they wept, in song they prayed to God on high who saves;
At marriages they sang in choir, and by their open graves;
The countryman behind his plough, the shepherd on the lea
The maiden at her spinning-wheel, sang all right merrily.
When little children played, the ring to tiny music ran,
And louder, stronger notes arose from every labouring man.
By whom the music was composed, no one could understand;
It sprang, like blossoms, from the ground, and passed from hand to hand;
Till on a dark night lately, a robber, shrewd and deft,
Forth from the people's hearts and lips their sweet song-treasure reft,
Leaving instead mere cunningness, with envy gaunt combined,
And loud fantastic murmurings within an empty mind.
The people have been poisoned, and they faint beneath their pains,
Their hearts are stunned, their lips are mute, the venom's in their veins.
Oh, Lord! to Thee melodious sounds the motion of the spheres,
The grasshopper and cricket make sweet music in thine ears;
Think Thou on a bewitchèd race throughout our Fatherland,
And break the ban from off their hearts by Thy almighty hand.
Let my dear people throw again into that song their voice,
Wherein all being jubilant before their God rejoice.
Give us again our Psalms, with their spirit-stirring glow,
That chase the devil out of us, and work his kingdom woe.

WILLIAM ARNOT.

THE SURPRISE OF THE CHRISTIAN'S END.

"When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream."—Psalm cxxvi. 1.

Not without awe can we approach the subject proposed to us. We are to speak of things not yet known by experience to the living. May we not fear that at the close of this meditation we shall have to use the confession of the Patriarch, and say, "I have uttered that I understood not: things too wonderful for me, which I knew not?"

And yet the meditation of death is an employment profitable for the living. Philosophers said of old, that the one business of life was "to practise dying and the having died;" to learn, by study and discipline, how to meet the article of death and the state of death—the moment of dying, and its consequences. A noble saying! a glorious conception! But that which philosophy could only say and not do, the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ has put it within our reach both to say and to do. We are permitted to pass within the veil which separates the invisible world from the material, and so to realize, not by bold conjecture, but by the light of revealed truth, something at least of that which eye hath not seen nor ear heard, but which God hath prepared, in the world that shall be, for them that love Him.

We do not encourage that sort of meditation of death which busies itself with its circumstances or its accompaniments. There are some things about death, which are only gloomy, only mournful. We advise no one to dwell amidst the accidents of death, its last unconscious gaspings, or the things which happen to the body when the soul is gone from it. Of the two, the practice of the state of death is more profitable than the practice of the act of dying. To place ourselves in thought as we shall be, as the immortal part of us will be, when dissolution is accomplished; when the last struggle is over, and the body is left, a dead weight, without sense or motion, upon the bed which was the arena of the closing conflict; to place ourselves in thought as we shall be when all this is ended, and the spirit is gone forth, gone back, gone home, to God who gave it—this is full of profit. From such meditations we return to the world of business and of society, wiser if graver men, better able to estimate things that are by the measure of things that shall be, and to weigh the perishable and the transitory in the balances of the permanent and the eternal.

The thought which I propose for your meditation at this time is briefly expressed in the words, "The surprise of the Christian's end." "When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion;" when the Lord brought back from the land of their exile his banished and scattered ones; when He gathered once again, in a home never to be desolated, those who had been wandering, each for his threescore years and ten or fourscore years, through the waste howling wilderness of this world; "then were we like unto them that dream." It was like a dream too delightful to be true: we felt as if it must be an imagination and an illusion soon to be dissipated and broken. But, no: the other was the illusion, this is the reality. Earth and earthly life was the shadow; death brings us into the substance and verity of things hoped for. "I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness."

In what is to be said we speak of "the Christian." We speak not to-day—we hope we need not speak to-day—of the moment after death as it is for the ungodly or the unbelieving. We speak of those who, having been redeemed, as all the world has been redeemed, by the sacrifice of the death of Christ; having been baptized, as all the Church has been baptized, in an ordinance given as a connecting link between the world-wide redemption and the individual man; have also, by the grace of God, been brought to personal repentance, personal faith, and personal holiness; have lived, whether steadily from early years, or by a marked change, at some later point of life, in a devout and diligent use of all the means of grace private and public, in a faithful (however imperfect) discharge of every known duty, and in an inward communion, carefully cherished, with God himself through his Son Jesus Christ by his Holy Spirit. Such a person is a Christian indeed. Such a person is one who "overcometh:" one who "lives, because Christ lives:" one who "knows in whom he has believed," and finds Him "able to keep his deposit,"—the soul which he has committed to Him "against the day" of his appearing and his kingdom.

And when we speak of the "end" of such a person, we do not forget—the subject shows that we do not forget—that that end is much more truly his beginning. Viewed from below, it is an end; viewed from above, it is a beginning. Now first will he see that life of his which was "hidden with Christ in God:" now first will he find himself safe and free; old things indeed passed away, and God himself making all things new.

"The surprise of the Christian's end."

God grant that in what we say on this subject we may be describing that which we ourselves shall one day know! God save us all from the sad and mournful unreality, of peeping between the rails of a forbidden Paradise, at joys and blessings in which we are never to expatiate! Rather may He quicken in us such a longing for the thing described as shall make us resolve, in his strength, to live for it now and in death to find it!

1. The surprise of the Christian's end will be, first of all, the surprise of change.

Not without difficulty had he risen, while upon earth, to the conception of a spiritual existence. In earlier years the world had hemmed him closely in: he saw things only through its medium, and practically deemed it the only truth, the only reality. Even when he began to know Christ, it was at first but (as St. Paul writes) "after the flesh," in a worldly way, with many admixtures of earth and earthly regards, with many lingering infirmities and still besetting sins. Which of us can say that, even now, a spiritual existence is a strongly apprehended fact for him? How many live and die carnal, sensual, earthly!

Think then of the dead Christian's surprise when he awakes up to an existence wholly and only spiritual. Who among the living can do more than guess, roughly and darkly guess, at the nature of the change thus indicated?

View it in two aspects. Two things are gone, which made up, but a moment before, or but a few hours before, all but the whole of being.

One of these is the world. The world is gone: annihilated for him: reduced to non-being and to nothingness. O, where now are the attractions of the world? its vast bazaar of riches, honours, and pleasures? It is as though they had all perished in one fire; a little heap of ashes all that remains. And yet for those things a whole generation is still living, labouring, suffering, sinning on. What could he not tell them, might he but return to them from the dead? That little moment, that brief act—the one spent, the other done, within the four curtains of a common bed—has consumed a whole Babylon of lying vanities. What has become of those ambitions once so powerful? of those luxuries once so delightful? of that public opinion, that voice of men, once so impressive, so decisive, so formidable? Gone, perished, silenced, despised! That public opinion itself must stand at the bar of God: who can tremble at it? But, alas! we tremble still, and even if one came unto us from the dead, he would vainly bid us to disregard it.

But there, but then, in the departed state, in the moment after death, the world is gone, and is not. Can it be, the Christian may say to himself, that I, even I, who heard the voice of God, and saw the vision of the Most High; I, whose eyes were open even then to ruin and to salvation, who walked by a different rule and sought another honour; yet was influenced by a power so transitory, so fallacious? What a change! Now, great Babylon is fallen, is fallen: now, the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth, reigneth alone!

The other thing which is gone is the body. I know not how to speak of that change. The Christian awakes only a spirit. For the time he is "unclothed:" he is not yet "clothed upon." Even when he is clothed upon, it will be with a spiritual body, of which we speak not for the present. At present, the body is gone. How shall he speak of himself? Shall he dare any longer to use the word "I," to think of "himself" as still existing in a state so changed? This body, given to me as an instrument, made too often by me a dictator; this body, meant for me to use as my lodging-house, as my worship, as my temple; a place to labour in for God, to rest in with God, to worship in before God; but turned by me too often into a banqueting-room of waste and excess, into a palace of self and sin—now it is demolished, it is laid in ruin, it lies there on that bed, and I am here. I am without it. I have left it behind me. No longer will its wants call me; no longer will its limits confine me; no longer will its languors enfeeble, or its infirmities fetter me. Now I am all spirit. O marvellous change! O the novelty, the strangeness, the wonder! How shall I know myself in my transfiguration? Lord Jesus, who hast died, who hast awakened, who hast gone before me into the Hades of the blessed, undertake for me!

2. The surprise of the Christian's end will be a surprise of safety. The change which has passed upon him is from buffeting into repose, from toil to rest, from danger to security.

You can fancy a man who has passed through some fearful peril; some sickness which seemed to be unto death; some accident, by flood or fire, which appeared to be death itself; some operation through which few men pass alive; some judicial trial, or a charge false but specious, under which for a whole day, through every conflict of evidence and every fluctuation of judgment, a man has awaited the issue with an agonized and tortured mind. And through it all he has emerged into safety. The sickness has taken its decisive turn, and the turn is to life. The fire-escape has arrived in time; the drowning man is recovered; the verdict of acquittal has been pronounced at evening. Those are examples, in a lower sense, of the surprise of safety.

But how shall it be, the moment after death, for the Christian? O what a surprise of calm, of escape, of security and serenity, of perfect peace! What a contrast to any one day which he has ever lived before! When did he ever before awaken to a consciousness of secure repose? Has he ever before known what it was to have no warfare to wage, no enemy to encounter, no ambush and no treachery and no mutiny to apprehend? Has he ever ventured to dream of such a condition below, without soon suffering for it, without bitterly regretting and repenting of it? Had he not learned, by painful experience, to associate the thought of security with the thought of danger—the dream of safety with the awakening to defeat? Was it not his one aim, his one work below, to keep himself from expecting, almost from desiring repose? And now, without fear of deception, without fear of presumption, without fear of disguised hostility or lurking treachery, it is his business to rest—it is his business to enjoy—it is his business to surrender himself to the sense of safety. The world is not, and the body is not, and, for him, the devil is not: his power touches not those who rest in Christ from their labours: "the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and there shall no torment touch them." Yet a little while, and he who has here been faithful unto death will find himself safe for ever, and be satisfied as he awakes and wonders!

3. The surprise of which we speak will be a surprise of explanation.

We have known, some of us, what it is to pore long over a difficult passage in some foreign or ancient author, seeing no light, and at last despairing of arriving at the truth contained in it. And yet we could see all the time that there was a meaning in the words, deep and important, could we but catch it. The celebrity of the writer, our own experience of his profound wisdom, our own delight in his magnificent mind, assured us of the value of each sentence that he had left on record: it may be that some flash of genius was emitted already from that page of which yet the full sense was hidden. We have closed the book, athirst and unsatisfied. Another day we have returned to the study: and then, as we calmly read, with fresh faculties, the passage before so unintelligible, it came into our mind clear, orderly, and beautiful, and we wondered that we could ever have found it obscure.

I speak after the manner of men, to illustrate, by a poor simple parallel, what I have called the surprise of explanation. Even thus will it be with the Christian in that end which is also his beginning. How will the Book of God spread itself open to him when he reads it in his new condition? I might speak of the Book of Revelation; of those divine truths which he has read and pondered and lived by below, but in which there were, to the end, many "things hard to be understood"—things which, with the Angels themselves, he rather "desired to look into" than fathomed in their depth or comprehended in their consistency. How will the work of redemption and the work of grace, the dispensations of God towards fallen man, unfold themselves before him when for the first time he studies them in God's presence!

But I would rather speak now of another book of God; the record, preserved in memory, of God's dealings personally with him. Who has not been perplexed and staggered here below by some things which have befallen him? Who has not sometimes said to himself, "If the Lord be with me, why then is all this befallen me?" Not so much—for that, perhaps, he could always understand—Why have I been so severely tried, why have I had so many sorrows, why have the strokes of Divine chastisement fallen upon me so heavily and so thickly? but rather, How can it be that I, a believer (as I trust) in Christ Jesus, a child of God through faith, a partaker in some degree of the influences of his Spirit, should have been left thus uncheered by the light of his comfort, thus "hardly bested" in the midst of my foes, thus lagging, loitering, and backsliding in the path of duty and of obedience?

Will not these things, in every part, come back upon him then with what has been termed the surprise of explanation? Will he not say, I see now how paltry was that "honour" from which "the Lord kept me back"—I see now how injurious might have been that happiness which was so often stretched out to me and as often withdrawn—I see now how dangerous for me would have been that rapid advance, that triumphant progress, even along the road of grace, which I once thought it hard should be denied me? If the enemy had been put out before me all at once, might not the beasts of the field have increased upon me? If victory over sin had been sudden and instantaneous, might not the poisonous after-growth of spiritual pride have made havoc altogether of watchfulness, of humility, and of the Christian mind?

And thus the surprise of change, and the surprise of safety, will be accompanied, in the Christian's end, by the surprise of explanation. He will see, as before he could only believe, that God in all things had done well. The mind of that God, reverenced and admired and loved above all things, will evermore be flashing forth afresh from the pages of memory, illuminating the dark and explaining the enigmatical.

4. There will be the surprise, too, of reunion.

We know what the joy of meeting after separation is below. We know, all of us, the start of delightful surprise with which, in the street or by the way, we meet again a friend long unseen, one with whom we once held sweet converse, one whose very sight recalls scenes of youthful happiness, or faces and forms long lost but never forgotten. How much more, if the sight of that friend recalls the recollection of dangers together faced and conquered, of hairbreadth escapes or formidable conflicts which we once shared as brothers, and the memory of which is precious in proportion to their severity. Poor and valueless will all such earthly reunions appear to him who has been "counted worthy to obtain that world." We know not that there is much written in Scripture on the future meeting and co-existence in heaven of human friends and kinsmen. Questions are often asked on this subject, in the anxiety and affection of recent bereavement, which a minister of God cannot confidently answer. Sometimes he does best to reply in the safest and most certain of all assurances, "Whatever will be for your true happiness in that world, God will give it you." And those who possess anything of true and living faith will desire that no earthly tie should predominate in their thought of future blessedness over the great central bond in which alone all else are one. That dying Christian did but express a feeling in which all ought to participate who, when reminded by surrounding friends of the happiness on which he was entering, when he should see this person and that—sister, and child, and wife—whom he had loved and lost below, replied in one word to every such suggestion, "Yes, but I shall see Jesus!" In that one divine union every human reunion will be well-nigh merged and lost.

And yet we doubt not that such reunions will be among the surprises of the Christian's end. And O think what it will be to him to find his new home peopled already with familiar forms! souls washed, like his own, in the blood of Christ—possessed, like his own, by the Holy Spirit—perfected, like his own, through suffering—saved, like his own, with a salvation never to be forfeited—admitted, like his own, through the gate of death into joys ever-growing, ever new—purified from all admixture of evil, beyond sorrow, beyond separation, beyond change for ever!

5. There is one point in our subject which the Scripture itself has drawn out for us; the surprise of recompense and of reward.

Our Lord himself has recorded, in the third of his memorable parables in the 25th chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel, with what astonishment in the great day of account his servants will hear of deeds done by them in the body; deeds of love and service to Him their Lord and King, of which they themselves had been utterly unconscious. Even thus will it be, doubtless, in the moment of his awakening, with all that a Christian has done through his Master's grace in the days of his flesh. How will he find in that hour that nothing had been overlooked, nothing forgotten, of all that had been truly done for Christ!

Every hearty prayer and every earnest effort, every struggle with self, every victory over sin, every endeavour to benefit man and to bring honour to God, will then be seen to have borne its proper fruit, and to be blessed with its due recompense of reward. He may say to himself then, How has much come to little, and little come to much! That which I once thought great is now seen to be little—earth and its glories, self and its achievements; and that which I once thought little is now seen to have been great—small sacrifices, humble toils, trifling conquests, common duties. The Christian woman, who was inclined to rate highly her wise words, her extended influences, her charitable exploits, will find then that what God reckoned far above these—that which has survived all these, that which is rewarded when these are disregarded—was that "ornament of a meek and quiet spirit" which the Word of God should have taught her was in his sight of great price. And the Christian minister may find in that day that his persuasive reasonings, his eloquent sermons, if not lost upon others, have been lost to him; and that, in their stead, that which has survived the great change is rather some secret wrestling with himself in the privacy of his chamber, and some unseen unnoticed visit, when inclination strongly drew another way, to an abode of poverty, of sickness, of sin. Great may be the surprises which have been enumerated in other kinds; but greatest, perhaps, to a humble Christian, the discovery of his own reward; the discovery that the words of Scripture which tell, or seem to tell, of a recompense for every deed, were, for good as for evil, literally true; the discovery that God had marked indeed what man never saw, and crowned with his eternal blessing deeds which the doer had forgotten.

6. There will be the surprise, too, of anticipation. When the change from life to death is accomplished, how will the one remaining change foretold to us start forth into prominence! The soul divested of the body will understand—it may be for the first time—why Resurrection should be described in Scripture as the one hope of man. So long as the gate of death has yet to be passed through, it is natural that the expectation of what lies next beyond death should predominate in our minds over an event more distant. Many men say, Death, and then Heaven. Few, comparatively, distinguish, in their thoughts, between the paradise of the separate soul and the heaven of the reconstructed man. But, the gate of death once passed, the soul finds, not without wonder, that there is a difference between being "unclothed" by death, and "clothed upon" by resurrection. Then the surprise of repose is largely tinged also with the surprise of expectation; promises, read with little intelligence below, become invested with a new meaning; the comfort of rest is itself found to be but a transition—a reparative process, not a permanent condition; and hope works again, as once with reference to the state after death, so now with regard to the state after resurrection; the souls beneath the altar are heard crying, "How long, O Lord?" and need to be calmed with the assurance that they are but waiting, through the long-suffering of God, for others not yet perfected.

7. Finally, the surprise of the Christian's end—of the moment after death—is, above all, and as the root of all, a surprise of contemplation.

"As for me, I will behold Thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with Thy likeness." "We shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is." "I have a desire to depart, and to be with Christ." "While we are at home in the body," so long, and only so long, "we are absent from the Lord." "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise."

I suppose that there is no one of us who can understand as yet what will be the surprise of seeing Christ. After all that we have read of his works and of his words, of his life and of his death, which of us has formed to himself any real image of his Saviour? most of all of his Saviour in that body of glory in which He rose and ascended, in which He reigns and makes his intercession? Which of us, might I not almost ask, if the sight of the Lord Jesus Christ himself were suddenly vouchsafed to him, would not echo the language on earth of a loved and loving disciple, and say, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord?" Yes, great as may be the change required in other respects before any one of us could acceptably enter that wonderful world after death; in this surely it is greatest of all—the power to bear God's manifested presence in the person of Jesus Christ.

And may I not well make it this application of the subject on which we have dwelt, that it urge us to a deeper and more personal acquaintance now, while the life of earth lasts, with that Divine Saviour whose presence is the very life of heaven; urge us to make sure of our ground, as his faithful and loving servants in this world, for the expectation—without which it were good for us if we had not been born—that "when He shall appear we shall be like Him;" that when we depart hence, we shall behold his face, and be satisfied, as we awake, with his likeness?

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.

Within a few weeks of each other, two of the most notable "representative men" of the age have passed away—William Whewell, Master of Trinity, and John Keble, author of the "Christian Year." As unlike to one another as possible in many things, in one great feature they were alike—in their loyalty to Divine Revelation. The one a philosopher, the other a poet; the one devoted to science, and full of its pushing spirit, the other of intensely æsthetic taste and reverential temperament; the one a vigorous man of action, the other retiring and contemplative—they have both left their mark deep on the age, and they both claim honour from posterity as having resisted tendencies that might have drawn the one to scepticism, and the other to Rome. Of Keble it has been well said by a Nonconformist journalist, "He was a Tractarian; he was a Sacerdotalist; he was a very rigid ecclesiastic. In almost everything that relates to Church life and outward Christian worship on earth he was opposed to us and to that which we most cherish. Yet, if we were to single out one man in the Established Church who was almost a personification of the Christian graces, we should single out John Keble. He was as gentle as the gentlest woman, and as spiritual as a saint. He was a saint,—a good and holy man, with some human weakness; but perhaps as little of sin as any man who has lived in these times. But it is less as a man than as a poet that we know him. Who does not know and has not sung his hymns? No recent English collection of Christian hymns could be without some of Mr. Keble's; and they are therefore to be found in nearly all the books used in Nonconformist places of worship. Keble is to the Christian Church what Tennyson is to all of our own age, whether of Christ or not—the poet of lofty spirituality. We wish he had not so often sung in such sectarian dress, but we have always forgotten the dress when we have heard the song."

The last thing that Dr. Whewell had read to him was the chapter in the Acts on the death of Stephen; and the last words that fell from his lips, and probably the last thought that occupied his mighty intellect was the prayer of the proto-martyr, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit."

Whatever may be the ultimate fruits of Dr. Pusey's Eirenikon, it seems at present as if war, not peace, were to be the result of its publication. A somewhat fierce strife has been raging between the representatives of English and Continental Popery, regarding the great question so amply discussed in it—the worship of the Virgin. Dr. Newman, it will be remembered, tried as much as possible to do away with the effect of Dr. Pusey's array of quotations that showed so clearly the blasphemous nature of the claims set up by Popish writers innumerable on behalf of the Virgin. They were mostly popular writers, he said, not recognised authorities; what was objectionable was but a little part of what they had written; much of it that had an ugly look might be explained if the connection and purpose were taken into account, and so forth. Still Dr. Newman had to confess that Dr. Pusey's quotations had horrified him. He was obliged to disown with disgust some five-and-twenty or thirty sentences and phrases, and to say "that as spoken by man to man in England in the nineteenth century, and according to that literal sense which they bear in the mouths of Englishmen and English women, I consider them calculated to prejudice inquirers, to frighten the unlearned, to unsettle consciences, to provoke blasphemy, and to work the loss of souls." In a letter to the Tablet, Dr. Newman has even published Bishop Challoner's anathema:—"Cursed be every goddess-worshipper that believes the Blessed Virgin Mary to be more than a creature, but worships her or puts his trust in her more than God, that believes her above her Son, and that she can in anything command Him." Such plain and honest speaking is not suffered by Dr. Newman's co-religionists to pass without challenge. He has been charged with having "put up our Mother in a public place, and taken her prerogatives to pieces, not reverently, not lovingly, not devotionally, but coldly, dogmatically and drily." He is especially reprehended for having made a comparison between Anglican and Continental devotion disparaging to the latter, although the Pope, the bishops, and nearly all the "Catholic world" have been nurtured amid its influences. Meanwhile, the pamphlets and manifestoes of other Popish writers indicate no disposition towards compromise on this or any other point. Archbishop Manning, in his Pastoral on the "Reunion of Christendom," gives no hint of a disposition to negotiate with the Anglican Church as a branch of the Church Catholic, or to do more than smooth the way for the return of her erring sheep one by one to the true fold. Canon Oakeley, in his review of Dr. Pusey, repeats the old topics, rebukes Anglican blindness and perverseness, and affirms as "a simple fact," what Dr. Newman rejects as a "horrible notion," that the blood of the Virgin is partaken of in the holy Eucharist. Father Faber is most loudly uncompromising of all. "Beware," he says, "beware of representing the Church of God as abating one jot or tittle of the greatest of those prerogatives which seemed most arrogant and most preposterous even in the Middle Ages; beware of representing her as having changed one atom in this her temper and her spirit; we must adhere strictly and zealously to high principle. Truth—and remember this is one great distinction between Catholics and heretics—Truth is not ours, but God's; Truth is not ours to bate and pare down."

The Queen has given a pleasing and characteristic evidence at once of her desire to give honour to whom honour is due, and of her sympathy with well-considered plans for elevating the condition of the poor, by the letter she has written to Mr. Peabody, whose munificent gift of a quarter of a million sterling for the benefit of the poor of London we have adverted to on former occasions. Large-hearted men will feel glad that in thus expressing her royal regard and gratitude to an American citizen, the Queen has woven a friendly bond between the two great sections of the Anglo-Saxon family, at a time when not a little had occurred to disturb the cordiality of their feelings; while their pleasure will not be less at so pronounced an instance of the policy which has been so characteristic of her Majesty, of conferring honour on those who have been eminent benefactors of the masses of her subjects. The sympathy of the Queen with "the poor and needy," and her appreciation of well-devised schemes for their temporal good, are universally known, and constitute one of the firmest foundations of the national attachment both to her person and to her throne.

The negotiations for union between four branches of the Presbyterian Church in Great Britain have now reached the furthest point which can be attained by the private negotiations of committees, and in a few weeks more the scheme will probably be launched on the sea of public discussion. The negotiating bodies are—the Free Church of Scotland, numbering about 900 congregations; the United Presbyterian Church, mainly in Scotland, but partly in England, numbering about 600; the English Presbyterian Church, numbering about 100; and the Cameronian, or Reformed Presbyterian Church, numbering about 50. It is understood that in committee a satisfactory conclusion has been reached on the points requiring to be adjusted. In a matter like this, where there are a good many divergent interests and feelings, and a good deal of vis inertiæ has to be overcome, the friends of union will probably take their stand with great firmness and earnestness on the great Christian duty of seeking and realising a visible and incorporating union, wherever such union is practicable. Meanwhile, symptoms are beginning to show themselves of the possibility of the question assuming still larger dimensions. The Rev. J. O. Dykes, who was lately obliged, through ill-health, to resign his charge as colleague of Dr. Candlish in Edinburgh, and who is at present in Australia, in lately addressing the General Assembly there, formed by the union of the churches representing the Established, the Free, and the United Presbyterian, said: "I wish from my heart that we had one Church at home to correspond with the one Church here. In one particular, at least, you are ahead of us at home. In one thing we may envy you. In one thing we trust and try to walk in your steps. You are united. We at home have begun (I think I may say) to feel our way in that direction also. Indications of this are abroad. The Church I represent has been you know for years in close and earnest conference with another represented by many of you, and with two lesser Churches, with considerable promise, it would seem, of coming to an issue. I do not disguise that to me, as to many, this would be still more desirable were that basis broadened, or were there any likelihood that it would be, so as to embrace all Scotch Presbyterians." Although Mr. Dykes, fortified by his Australian experience, has been the first to broach this comprehensive scheme, it is understood, as he remarks, that in Scotland others are familiar with the aspiration, and very probably it will find utterance when the subject comes to be publicly ventilated.

An important meeting has been held in Belfast on the subject of ministerial support in the Irish Presbyterian Church. The members of that Church, it is acknowledged among themselves, do not contribute for the support of their ministers in the proportion which they ought to observe. The ministry is consequently in a somewhat impoverished state, a fact which is not creditable to a Church in which there are 130,000 communicants, many, if not most, of whom are in circumstances of tolerable comfort. The meeting seemed to point to the desirableness of a General Fund, corresponding to the Sustentation Fund in the Free Church of Scotland. The Regium Donum, it was said, while an utterly inadequate means of support, relieved the people from the sense of responsibility, and some of the speakers did not hesitate to say that in their judgment they would get on better without it.

From the Report of the Belfast Branch of the Bible and Colportage Society of Ireland, we are glad to observe that the book agent and the colporteur continue to prosecute their labours with encouraging success. The number of colporteurs has not been increased during the year, but some of them seem to be penetrating more into Roman Catholic strata, and leaving useful deposits there. The work is only in its infancy, and yet the results have been considerable. In seven years the Belfast branch has sold nearly a million and a half of publications, of which upwards of 67,000 have been Bibles and Testaments.

A very interesting movement has been inaugurated in Paris towards a new translation of the Bible into French. The interest created by this movement is the more remarkable that France is so little of a Bible-reading country. Even in the Sunday-schools of the country there is little familiarity with Bible language and Bible narratives, and such is the general ignorance, that in a popular journal a writer lately felt it necessary to explain to his readers that "the Bible is called the Old Testament," and that the "New Testament is the second portion of the Bible, and was written after the death of Christ." M. Petavel, a Swiss minister in London, having called a meeting in the Grand Hall of the Sorbonne on the 22nd March, it was filled to overflowing, and among those present were politicians, senators, priests, pastors, and Jews. It was explained that the undertaking was to be prosecuted on the neutral ground of literature and philology, and that doctrine was to be avoided. This accounts for the cordial co-operation of so many discordant religionists. It is interesting to remark that while the popularity of the undertaking is probably due indirectly in some measure to the work of Renan, a severe rebuke administered to him by M. Thierry, the President (brother of the historian), is said to have been received by the meeting with sympathy, amounting to enthusiasm. M. Guizot and the Comte de Montalembert have declined to join the Society. The "Monde," the ultramontane clerical paper, is vehemently opposed to the project. It is strongly denounced by the Cardinal-Archbishop of Lyons, who, in claiming for the Church the sole authority over the sacred text, exemplifies the unchanging opposition of Rome to the popular use of the Word of God.

While the savants of the metropolis are co-operating for a revised translation, it is pleasant to find that the version in ordinary circulation is from time to time accomplishing its blessed work. In France much is done by the agency of colporteurs for promoting the reading and the pondering of the Bible. At the head of the agency of the British and Foreign Bible Society in France is the distinguished M. de Pressensé, so well known as an author, and of whose new work on the Life of Jesus Christ, we subjoin a notice further on. M. de Pressensé bears testimony to the increasing facilities and encouragements which colporteurs are receiving from the authorities, as well as the success of their labours. The following interesting extract shows how the opposition of infidelity is sometimes vanquished:—

"It is a year ago since a colporteur, who is stationed in one of the most important manufacturing towns in the east of France, met in a workshop with a young man, who attracted his attention by his serious manner, and the whole of his behaviour. He offered the Bible to him, at the same time endeavouring to convince him of the great moral benefit which its perusal would be calculated to confer on him. To his great regret, he was at once repulsed, though, it is true, with a certain kind of courtesy ; but this was soon followed by a succession of impious expressions, which were truly of a character to take away anything like perseverance from a champion less determined than our friend. He did not, therefore, leave the young man; and, after a lengthened conversation, he succeeded in persuading his antagonist to provide himself with a Bible, in order that he might search out for himself the truths about which he had never previously read, and also to meet with the colporteur that they might discuss the doctrines of the Bible together. These meetings took place at certain intervals, but without any of them being of such a character as to warrant the least hope that the young man had attained to better thoughts in regard to religion. All at once the colporteur learned that the young man had been compelled to return to his native place, owing to some family matters, and that there was no prospect of his coming back to the factory. Our colporteur took pains to inquire whether he had carried his Bible away with him ; and the affirmative answer which he received encouraged him, and led him to pray daily on behalf of the young man. More than a year after all this had occurred, the same colporteur whilst prosecuting his work in the department where he is now stationed, reached a town filled with factories. He entered one of them, situated in an isolated part of the town, and the gates of which were open. The men were all at their meals. Looking into a corner of the work-room, his eyes rested on a man who seemed to take no part in the noisy conversation of his companions, for his back was turned on them. He was, in fact, occupied with reading. The colporteur went towards him, and before he was able to see the face of the reader, he discovered, to his great joy, that the Bible was the book which he was reading. He uttered an exclamation of pleasure, on which the man turned round. No ! he could not be mistaken ! it was the young infidel, for whose conversion he had so unceasingly prayed for more than a year ! and from whom he then learned, that, being powerfully impressed by the warm appeals to which he had been almost compelled to listen, he began seriously to read the Bible, as well as to pray, and that, after a time, the Lord had graciously opened his eyes and his heart ; that now the Word of God was the food of his soul, and that his most ardent desire was to make known its contents to all the world."

Whoever have been accustomed to think of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew and similar atrocities as belonging to a dark age that can never return, must have been rudely startled out of the pleasant dream by the tragedy of Barletta. For some time evangelical operations have been going on in that town, as along the whole of the Adriatic, not without results. On the 19th March, a raving crowd, led by priests, passed through the streets with an enormous Christ (image) for ensign, shouting furiously, "Death to the Protestants ! Death to foreigners ! Live the faith ! Live Jesus Christ !" The crowd rushed into the houses of Protestants, consigning everything to destruction. The first accounts, by which a man was thrown from the third story of a house, three women murdered three persons, and so on, seem to have been exaggerated ; but according to the Rev. W. Arthur, who was in Milan at the time, six lives have been taken, and of these one was burned or half burned along with the furniture of his house. The Protestant minister, M. Giannini, escaped by the roof of the house. A list, it is said, was found of the names of 200 suspected or odious persons. This murderous outrage has excited universal horror. In the Italian Parliament it was alluded to by the ministry in a tone that did it honour. The mass of the Italian people seem to have no sympathy with it. But it shows what murderous hatred may lodge in the bosoms of a disappointed priesthood, and what inflammable and excitable materials an uneducated and fanatical Italian populace form. It is not considered that the cause of religion will suffer from these proceedings in the end.

The correspondent of "Evangelical Christendom," writing before the outbreak of this riot, refers to the labours of the Rev. Theodore Meyer, of Ancona, who superintends a whole staff of colporteurs ranging over the whole shore-line of the Adriatic. Barletta is one of the towns which are thus visited, and where a number of Bible readers are found. The labours of these colporteurs are full of adventure ; some of them are converted priests ; and they are doing a great work in sowing seed and preparing the way for the establishment of Gospel ordinances.

The work is going forward in Milan and other great towns. There are 1000 church members in Milan, gathered from all ranks of the citizens ; two evangelical journals are printed in the city, and a great evangelical light radiates in all directions, to Pavia, Bergamo, Brescia, Caravaggio, Cremona, and especially northwards to Como, Intra, and many a village in the valleys which run down from the great Alpine chain. In writing to the Watchman about the Barletta massacre, Mr. Arthur takes notice of the extraordinary progress of the evangelical cause in Milan. Six years ago, he says, he could find no meeting of native Italian evangelicals, except a dozen or so in a private house. Now, within two days, he had seen a school examined, a prayer-meeting of five deacons or leaders in a private room ; and three public meetings ; one of forty, chiefly men ; one of twenty, nearly all women ; and one of about 280, chiefly men ; all these were on week days ; on Good Friday and Sunday he expected to see more.

According to a correspondent of the Times, "the year 1867 is destined to behold Spiritual Rome putting forth all her strength and displaying herself in all her grandeur. In the first place there is to be a canonization, of how many saints we know not as yet, but certainly of one Polish, and one Neapolitan saint. Then in the month of June is to be celebrated the Centenary of the Martyrdom of St. Peter. That this would take place has been already reported, but the date was undecided until lately, it having been under discussion whether 1865, 1866, or 1867 was the correct year. The best authorities, or perhaps political circumstances, have solved this numerical difficulty, and June of 1867 will witness certainly one of the most effective ecclesiastical spectacles that has ever been presented to the world. At the same time, too, it is decided to hold an Ecumenical Council, in itself a great event, to which the Roman Catholic prelates from all parts of the world will be invited, and indeed invitations to distant parts are said to have been already sent. What, therefore, is the strength of the purely spiritual element, as understood by the successor of St. Peter, will stand a chance of being tried on this great occasion. The idea of the Centenary originated, it is said, with the Pope, who, true Italian as he is, was much impressed by the meeting last year to celebrate the Centenary of Dante. Hence he adopted and applied it to another and a higher subject, hoping, no doubt, in this way to rally the Catholic world to the defence of the waning fortunes of the Holy See."

That no part of the spiritual pretensions of the Pope is abated in consequence of recent temporal calamities, is evident from the unblushing terms of a reply lately given to an address from strangers. "I alone," he said to such, "despite my unworthiness, am the successor of the Apostles, the Vicar of Jesus Christ; I alone have the mission to guide and direct the bark of Peter; I am the way, the truth, and the life. They who are with me are with the Church; they who are not with me are out of the Church, they are out of the way, the truth, and the life. Let men well understand this, that they be not deceived or led astray by soi-disant Catholics, who desire and teach something quite different from what the Head of the Church desires and teaches."

The missionary records of the month bring before us an unusual number of casualties, which if they do not hinder the proper work of missions, try the faith and patience both of missionaries and missionary directors. It is not very long since the cyclone did much damage to missionary buildings in Calcutta and its neighbourhood. The Moravian Brethen at Baziya, in South Africa, have encountered a somewhat similar catastrophe in the shape of a whirlwind, which in a moment levelled church, dwelling-house, and outbuildings with the ground. Happily no life was lost, though the missionary with his wife and daughter were thrown down beneath the ruins. The accident seems to have had some comic features as well as tragic; for some of the household effects, such as a pair of boots, were brought back from distances of two or three miles, and, as the missionary was writing home, people were continually arriving, bringing articles of every description, which they had picked up while searching the country in the direction taken by the whirlwind. The Wesleyan Mission has lost the ship "John Wesley," under very remarkable circumstances. It was totally wrecked on a reef in the Tonga Islands last November. When the vessel had been for two hours bumping against the reef, she gave a great crash, broke her back, and filled rapidly. At that very moment a great earthquake took place, followed by some great waves, which raised the wreck up, carried her inside the reef, and left her in less than three feet water. All lives were saved by this remarkable means.

In adverting to the disruption of the Brahma Somaj at Calcutta, in a former number, we adverted to the more free social intercourse between Hindu and Christian ladies, as a remarkable evidence of the decreasing influence of caste. From the "Indian Mirror," as quoted by the "Friend of India," it appears that such intercourse is advancing. The "Mirror" describes a meeting of native ladies held at the house of Dr. Robson, of the Free Church Mission, the first of its kind in the country. "There were seventeen ladies present, of whom the majority were Brahmicas. The proceedings commenced with a display of various figures on the wall by means of the magic lantern. Dr. Robson then exhibited the air pump and illustrated some of the elementary principles of pneumatics; he also performed about a dozen brilliant and amusing experiments with oxygen, phosphorus, and sulphur. After these experiments were over, the ladies enjoyed most unreserved and hearty interchange of thoughts and feelings with some of their European sisters, who were also present on the occasion, and who, with characteristic cordiality, did all in their power to sustain the liveliness of the meeting with music and conversation. The native ladies enjoyed to their hearts' content the rich fund of instruction and amusement to which they were treated, and though the meeting broke up at 10 p.m., they parted from their European sisters with the greatest reluctance. That such meetings are admirably calculated to impress our countrywomen with a taste for scientific truths, and at the same time improve their tastes and habits by bringing them into free and familiar intercourse with pious and enlightened Christian women, it is impossible to deny; and we should very much like to see them placed on a permanent footing."

The accounts of the progress of Christianity in Madagascar continue to be of the most cheering and satisfactory character. Mr. Toy, of the London Missionary Society, writes: "On Christmas Day alone I baptised 221 adults, and again on Sunday last nearly seventy more. I have never seen anything like it. The work is evidently from God. All these are now under instruction once a week by myself, and again by the native preachers and deacons. I have divided them among several, in order more successfully to instruct them, and to investigate their characters previous to admission into church fellowship, each teacher having from twelve to fifteen under his charge. Of course it is to be expected that some are not genuine. I have, therefore, as much on my hands as my strength will allow, almost more than I know how to get through. I may just add that among those recently baptised are the eldest son of the Prime Minister, the eldest son of the Chief Secretary of State, and several sons of other high officers; also Rainivoninahitrianarivo (well known to Mr. Ellis), a near relation of the Prime Minister, and Ramaniraka, Under-Secretary of State. Mr. Briggs has also baptised several sons of the high officers, and Razanakombana, son of one of those who visited England in the time of the early missionaries."

Among recent books, we give a prominent place to the eagerly expected work of M. de Pressensé,—"Jesus Christ, his Life, Times, and Work." The fame of M. de Pressensé's critique on the work of Renan—generally acknowledged to have been among the ablest that appeared—raised no ordinary degree of expectancy in connection with the more complete treatise with which he has been engaged for some time. Though it professes not to be a reply to any work, it is obviously designed to present a complete and correct view of the life and work of our Blessed Lord, in contrast to the deeply erroneous as well as the sadly imperfect views of them that have lately come from various quarters. The writer, like Renan, visited Judea and Galilee, but "not that he might garnish his work with lavish descriptions of nature, and merge in the dazzling radiance of the East that calm and quiet beauty of the Gospel which belongs not to this world; but that he might engrave, as deeply as possible, that seal of reality which is the token of every true history." Of the five books into which the work is divided, the first dwells on preliminary considerations,—the supernatural, the religions of the past, the decline of Judaism, and the sources of the life of Christ. In the second book, Christ's preparation for his work is considered; then, in three books, "The Time of Public Favour; The Period of Conflict; and The Great Work—Death and Victory." It is refreshing to meet with the work of an able and excellent author, whose appreciation of our Lord Jesus Christ, both in his person and in his work, is at once profound and discriminating, and whom no doubts or difficulties hinder from claiming the honour due to the Name that is above every name. In point of learning, intellectual power, and that point and brilliancy of diction for which the French language is so remarkable when wielded by a master, the merit of this work is remarkably high. Many passages are of the greatest beauty, and verify the closing apostrophe of the writer. "At times I have seemed, in the brief illumination of some blessed hour, to see Thee in Thy Divine Majesty—Thy brow radiant with love and grief, and crowned with that spotless purity which has terrors only for the proud, because it is inseparable from Thy sovereign love. I have seemed to see Thee on the shores of the lake Thou lovedst, or in the villages of Galilee, or in the midst of that retinue of the afflicted and despised who formed Thy guard of honour in Thy royal progress of mercy. But when I have sought to fix the holy vision, the pencil has trembled in my unskilful hands, and I have only been able to give a dim outline of that which had bound me in the dust in adoration before Thee." It must be added, that in several points of importance, M. de Pressensé's views are not such as will find acceptance with the more orthodox section of readers in this country, although abroad they may be looked on as less unsatisfactory.

By far the most copious and varied account of the social and religious customs of the Chinese that has yet appeared, will be found in two well-filled volumes, by the Rev. Justus Doolittle, of the Fuhchau Mission of the American Board, entitled "Social Life of the Chinese: with some Account of their Religious, Governmental, Educational, and Business Customs and Opinions." Fourteen years' residence in Fuhchau have given Mr. Doolittle opportunities of observation of which he has availed himself with remarkable diligence. The ways and customs delineated are often very unique and characteristic; and while some favourable features are worthy of all commendation, the general impression of the people which this work conveys is not flattering. Several chapters of the work are devoted to missionary topics, and the author strongly urges Christians at home to persevere in efforts and prayers for the conversion of China. He finds a bond of communion, and therefore a memento of duty in the circumstance that Western Christians are almost universally tea-drinkers, and ought, therefore, to think much of the country to which they owe "the cup that cheers but not inebriates." And as Saturday evening in the West corresponds with Sunday morning in China, he particularly urges that Saturday evening should be a time for special prayer for China, particularly its missionary labourers.

Two volumes have appeared almost simultaneously, one in Edinburgh, the other in Glasgow, consisting of Lectures for the Times, preached by half-a-dozen of the ministers and professors of either city, entitled respectively, "Christianity and Modern Speculation," and "Divine Revelation Explained and Vindicated." The Lectures originated in the conviction that when men's minds are so much agitated on questions of vital importance, and when so much that is fitted to unsettle them is printed in newspapers and elsewhere, it becomes the leaders of religious thought to take special measures to give a wholesome direction to honest inquirers. The Lectures were very popular as delivered, and many of them are able discussions of the subjects treated in them. The characteristic differences of the two cities will be found reflected in their respective volumes,—Edinburgh maintaining the truth as firmly, yet with more freedom of thought and calmness of vision; Glasgow, the old stronghold of the Covenant, with, perhaps, a little more tendency to dogmatism, and a larger mixture both of the excellencies and the defects of Puritanism. The Glasgow volume bears throughout the impress of local controversy; that of Edinburgh has a wider and more catholic sweep.

"The Judgment Books," by Alexander Macleod, D.D., is a fresh and powerful practical volume, in which the author, more successful, as we think, in the practical illustration and enforcement of great truths, than in the establishment of the exegetical theory of the Apocalyptic "books," which is the framework of his treatise, brings out the many forms in which the laws of retribution assert themselves here and hereafter. Full of the freshest and best things in modern literature, the author throws a great wealth of illustration over his subject. Perhaps the style is just a little too modern; on such a subject it would be an advantage to have somewhat more of the solemn tone and stately tread of some of the grand old writers of former days.

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

XXI.

As the winter went on, it was sad to look on the evident though slow decline of Catherine Weir. It seemed as if the dead season was dragging her to its bosom, to lay her among the leaves of past summers. She was still to be found in the shop, or appeared in it as often as the bell suspended over the door rang to announce the entrance of a customer; but she was terribly worn, and her step indicated much weakness. Nor had the signs of restless trouble diminished as these tide-marks indicated ebbing strength. There was the same dry fierce fire in her eyes; the same forceful compression of her lips; the same evidences of brooding over some one absorbing thought or feeling. She seemed to me, and to Dr. Duncan as well, to be dying of resentment. Would nobody do anything for her? I thought. Would not her father help her? He had got more gentle now; whence I had reason to hope that Christian principles and feelings had begun to rise and operate in him; while surely the influence of his son must, by this time, have done something not only to soften his character generally, but to appease the anger he had cherished towards the one ewe-lamb, against which, having wandered away into the desert place, he had closed and barred the door of the sheep-fold. I would go and see him, and try what could be done for her.

I may be forgiven here if I make the remark that I cannot help thinking that what measure of success I had already had with my people, was partly owing to this, that when I thought of a thing and had concluded it might do, I very seldom put off the consequent action. I found I was wrong sometimes, and that the particular action did no good; but thus movement was kept up in my operative nature, preventing it from sinking towards the inactivity to which I was but too much inclined. Besides, to find out what will not do, is a step towards finding out what will do. Moreover, an attempt in itself unsuccessful may set something or other in motion that will help.

My present attempt turned out one of my failures, though I cannot think that it would have been better left unmade.

A red rayless sun, which one might have imagined sullen and disconsolate because he could not make the dead earth smile into flowers, was looking through the frosty fog of the winter morning as I walked across the bridge to find Thomas Weir in his workshop. The poplars stood like goblin sentinels, with black heads, upon which the long hair stood on end, all along the dark cold river. Nature looked like a life out of which the love has vanished. I turned from it and hastened on.

Thomas was busy working with a spokeshave at the spoke of a cart-wheel. How curiously the smallest visual fact will sometimes keep its place in the memory, when it cannot with all earnestness of endeavour recall a thought—a far more important fact. That will come again only when its time comes first.

"A cold morning, Thomas," I called from the door.

"I can always keep myself warm, sir," returned Thomas, cheerfully.

"What are you doing, Tom?" I said, going up to him first.

"A little job for myself, sir. I'm making a few bookshelves."

"I want to have a little talk with your father. Just step out in a minute or so, and let me have half-an-hour."

"Yes, sir, certainly."

I then went to the other end of the shop, for, curiously, as it seemed to me, although father and son were on the best of terms, they always worked as far from each other as the shop would permit, and it was a very large room.

"It is not easy always to keep warm through and through, Thomas," I said.

I suppose my tone revealed to his quick perceptions that "more was meant than met the ear." He looked up from his work, his tool filled with an uncompleted shaving.

"And when the heart gets cold," I went on, "it is not easily warmed again. The fire's hard to light there, Thomas."

Still he looked at me, stooping over his work, apparently with a presentiment of what was coming.

"I fear there is no way of lighting it again, except the blacksmith's way."

"Hammering the iron till it is red-hot, you mean, sir?"

"I do. When a man's heart has grown cold, the blows of affliction must fall thick and heavy before the fire can be got that will light it.—When did you see your daughter Catherine, Thomas?"

His head dropped, and he began to work as if for bare life. Not a word came from the form now bent over his tool as if he had never lifted himself up since he first began in the morning. I could just see that his face was deadly pale, and his lips compressed like those of one of the violent who take the kingdom of heaven by force. But it was for no such agony of effort that his were thus closed. He went on working till the silence became so lengthened that it seemed settled into the endless. I felt embarrassed. To break a silence is sometimes as hard as to break a spell. What Thomas would have done or said if he had not had this safety-valve of bodily exertion, I cannot even imagine.

"Thomas," I said, at length, laying my hand on his shoulder, "you are not going to part company with me, I hope."

"You drive a man too far, sir. I've given in more to you than ever I did to man, sir; and I don't know that I oughtn't to be ashamed of it. But you don't know where to stop. If we lived a thousand years you would be driving a man on to the last. And there's no good in that, sir. A man must be at peace somewhen."

"The question is, Thomas, whether I would be driving you on or back. You and I too must go on or back. I want to go on myself, and to make you go on too. I don't want to be parted from you now or then."

"That's all very well, sir, and very kind, I don't doubt; but, as I said afore, a man must be at peace somewhen."

"That's what I want so much that I want you to go on. Peace! I trust in God we shall both have it one day, somewhen, as you say. Have you got this peace so plentifully now that you are satisfied as you are? You will never get it but by going on."

"I do not think there is any good got in stirring a puddle. Let by-gones be by-gones. You make a mistake, sir, in rousing an anger which I would willingly let sleep."

"Better a wakeful anger, and a wakeful conscience with it, than an anger sunk into indifference, and a sleeping dog of a conscience that will not bark. To have ceased to be angry is not one step nearer to your daughter. Better strike her, abuse her, with the chance of a kiss to follow. Ah, Thomas, you are like Jonas with his gourd."

"I don't see what that has to do with it."

"I will tell you. You are fierce in wrath at the disgrace to your family. Your pride is up in arms. You don't care for the misery of your daughter, who, the more wrong she has done, is the more to be pitied by a father's heart. Your pride, I say, is all that you care about. The wrong your daughter has done, you care nothing about; or you would have taken her to your arms years ago, in the hope that the fervour of your love would drive the devil out of her and make her repent. I say it is not the wrong, but the disgrace you care for. The gourd of your pride is withered, and yet you will water it with your daughter's misery."

"Go out of my shop," he cried; "or I may say what I should be sorry for."

I turned at once and left him. I found young Tom round the corner, leaning against the wall, and reading his Virgil.

"Don't speak to your father, Tom," I said, "for a while. I've put him out of temper. He will be best left alone."

He looked frightened.

"There's no harm done, Tom, my boy. I've been talking to him about your sister. He must have time to think over what I have said to him."

"I see, sir; I see."

"Be as attentive to him as you can."

"I will, sir."

It was not alone resentment at my interference that had thus put the poor fellow beside himself, I was certain: I had called up all the old misery—set the wound bleeding again. Shame was once more wide awake and tearing at his heart. That his daughter should have done so! For she had been his pride. She had been the belle of the village, and very lovely; but having been apprenticed to a dressmaker in Addicehead, had, after being there about a year and a half, returned home, apparently in a decline. After the birth of her child, however, she had, to her own disappointment, and no doubt to that of her father as well, begun to recover. What a time of wretchedness it must have been to both of them until she left his house, one can imagine. Most likely the misery of the father vented itself in greater unkindness than he felt, which, sinking into the proud nature she had derived from him, roused such a resentment as rarely if ever can be thoroughly appeased until Death comes in to help the reconciliation. How often has an old love blazed up again under the blowing of his cold breath, and sent the spirit warm at heart into the regions of the unknown! She never would utter a word to reveal the name or condition of him by whom she had been wronged. To his child, as long as he drew his life from her, she behaved with strange alternations of dislike and passionate affection; after which season the latter began to diminish in violence, and the former to become more fixed, till at length, by the time I had made their acquaintance, her feelings seemed to have settled into what would have been indifference but for the constant reminder of her shame and her wrong together, which his very presence necessarily was.

They were not only the gossips of the village who judged that the fact of Addicehead's being a garrison-town had something to do with the fate that had befallen her; a fate by which, in its very spring-time, when its flowers were loveliest, and hope was its strongest for summer, her life was changed into the dreary wind-swept, rain-sodden moor. The man who can accept such a sacrifice from a woman,—I say nothing of wiling it from her—is, in his meanness, selfishness, and dishonour, contemptible as the Pharisee who with his long prayers devours the widow's house. He leaves her desolate, while he walks off free. Would to God a man like the great-hearted, pure-bodied Milton, a man whom young men are compelled to respect, would in this our age, utter such a word as, making "mad the guilty," if such grace might be accorded them, would "appal the free," lest they too should fall into such a mire of selfish dishonour!

XXII.

About this time my father was taken ill, and several journeys to London followed. It is only as vicar that I am writing these memorials—for such they should be called, rather than annals, though certainly the use of the latter word has of late become vague enough for all convenience—therefore I have said nothing about my home-relations; but I must just mention here that I had a half-sister, about half my own age, whose anxiety during my father's illness rendered my visits more frequent than perhaps they would have been from my own. But my sister was right in her anxiety. My father grew worse, and in December he died. I will not eulogise one so dear to me. That he was no common man will appear from the fact of his unconventionality and justice in leaving his property to my sister, saying in his will that he had done all I could require of him, in giving me a good education; and that, men having means in their power which women had not, it was unjust to the latter to make them, without a choice, dependent upon the former. After the funeral, my sister, feeling it impossible to remain in the house any longer, begged me to take her with me. So, after arranging affairs, we set out, and reached Marshmallows on New Year's Day.

My sister being so much younger than myself, her presence in my house made very little change in my habits. She came into my ways without any difficulty, so that I did not experience the least restraint from having to consider her. And I soon began to find her of considerable service among the poor and sick of my flock, the latter class being more numerous this winter, on account of the greater severity of the weather.

I now began to note a change in the habits of Catherine Weir. As far as I remember, I had never up to this time seen her out of her own house, except in church, at which she had been a regular attendant for months. Now, however, I began to meet her when and where I least expected—I do not say often, but so often as to make me believe she went wandering about frequently. It was always at night, however, and always in stormy weather. The marvel was, not that a sick woman could do so—for a sick woman may be able to do anything—but that she could do so more than once: that was the marvel. At the same time, I began to miss her from church.

Possibly my reader may wonder how I came to have the chance of meeting any one again and again at night and in stormy weather. I can relieve him from the difficulty. Odd as it will appear to some readers, I had naturally a predilection for rough weather. I think I enjoyed fighting with a storm in winter nearly as much as lying on the grass under a beech-tree in summer. Possibly this assertion may seem strange to one likewise who has remarked the ordinary peaceableness of my disposition. But he may have done me the justice to remark at the same time, that I have some considerable pleasure in fighting the devil, though none in fighting my fellow-man, even in the ordinary form of disputation, in which however it is not heart's blood, but soul's blood, that is so often shed. Indeed there are many controversies far more immoral, as to the manner in which they are conducted, than a brutal prize-fight. There is a pleasure of its own in conflict; and I have always experienced a certain indescribable, though I believe not at all unusual exaltation, even in struggling with a well-set, thoroughly roused storm of wind and snow or rain. The sources of this by no means unusual delight, I will not stay to examine, indicating only that I believe the sources are deep.—I was now quite well, and had no reason to fear bad consequences from the indulgence of this surely innocent form of the love of strife.

But I find I must give another reason as well, if I would be thoroughly honest with my reader. The fact was, that as I had recovered strength, I had become more troubled and restless about Miss Oldcastle. I could not see how I was to make any progress towards her favour. There seemed a barrier as insurmountable as intangible between her and me. The will of one woman came between and parted us, and that will was as the magic line over which no effort of will or strength could enable the enchanted knight to make a single stride. And this consciousness of being fettered by insensible and infrangible bonds, this need of doing something with nothing tangible in the reach of the outstretched hand, so worked upon my mind, that it naturally sought relief, as often as the elemental strife arose, by mingling unconstrained with the tumult of the night.—Will my readers find it hard to believe that this disquietude of mind should gradually sink away as the hours of Saturday glided down into night, and the day of my best labour drew nigh? Or will they answer, "We believe it easily; for then you could at least see the lady, and that comforted you"? Whatever it was that quieted me, not the less have I to thank God for it. All might have been so different. What a fearful thing would it have been for me to have found my mind so full of my own cares, that I was unable to do God's work and bear my neighbour's burden! But even then I would have cried to Him, and said, "I know thee that thou art not a hard master."

Now, however, that I have quite accounted, as I believe, by the peculiarity both of my disposition and circumstances, for unusual wanderings under conditions when most people consider themselves fortunate within doors, I must return to Catherine Weir, the eccentricity of whose late behaviour, being in the particulars discussed identical with that of mine, led to the necessity for the explanation of my habits given above.

One January afternoon, just as twilight was folding her grey cloak about her, and vanishing in the night, the wind blowing hard from the south-west, melting the snow under foot, and sorely disturbing the dignity of the one grand old cedar which stood before my study window, and now filled my room with the great sweeps of its moaning, I felt as if the elements were calling me, and rose to obey the summons. My sister was, by this time, so accustomed to my going out in all weathers, that she troubled me with no expostulation. My spirits began to rise the moment I was in the wind. Keen, and cold, and unsparing it swept through the leafless branches around me, with a different hiss for every tree that bent, and swayed, and tossed in its torrent, as I made my way to the gate and out upon the road, by which, turning to the right, away from the village, I sought a kind of common, open and treeless, the nearest approach to a moor that there was in the county, I believe, over which such a wind swept unstayed by house, or shrub, or fence, the only shelter it afforded lying in the inequalities of its surface.

I had walked with my head bent low against the blast, for the better part of a mile, fighting for every step of the way, when, coming to a deep-cut in the common opening at right angles from the road, whence at some time or other a large quantity of sand had been carted, I turned into its defence to recover my breath, and listen to the noise of the wind in the fierce rush of its sea over the open channel of the common. And I remember I was thinking with myself: "If the air would only become faintly visible for a moment, what a sight it would be of waste grandeur with its thousands of billowing eddies and self-involved, conflicting, and swallowing whirlpools from the sea-bottom of this common!" when, with my imagination resting on the fancied vision, I was startled by such a moan as seemed about to break into a storm of passionate cries, but was followed by the words:

"O God! I cannot bear it longer. Hast thou no help for me?"

Instinctively almost, I knew that Catherine Weir was beside me, though I could not see where she was. In a moment more, however, I thought I could distinguish through the darkness—imagination no doubt filling up the truth of its form—a figure crouching in such an attitude of abandoned despair as recalled one of Flaxman's outlines, the body bent forward over the drawn-up knees, and the face thus hidden even from the darkness. I could not help saying to myself, as I took a step or two towards her, "What is thy trouble to hers!"

I may here remark that I had come to the conclusion from pondering over her case, that until a yet deeper and bitterer resentment than that which she bore to her father was removed, it would be of no use attacking the latter. For the former kept her in a state of hostility towards her whole race: with herself at war she had no gentle thoughts, no love for her kind; but ever from every hurt that she received from or imagined to be offered her by anything human. So I had resolved that the next time I had an opportunity of speaking to her, I would make an attempt to probe the evil to its root, though I had but little hope, I confess, of doing any good. And now when I heard her say, "Hast thou no help for me?" I went near her with the words:

She fed her wound with fresh-renewed bale

"God has, indeed, help for his own offspring. Has He not suffered that He might help? But you have not yet forgiven."

When I began to speak, she gave a slight start: she was far too miserable to be terrified at anything. Before I had finished, she stood erect on her feet, facing me with the whiteness of her face glimmering through the blackness of the night.

"I ask Him for peace," she said, "and he sends me more torment."

And I thought of Ahab when he said, "Hast thou found me, O mine enemy?"

"If we had what we asked for always, we should too often find it was not what we wanted, after all."

"You will not leave me alone," she said. "It is too bad."

Poor woman! It was well for her she could pray to God in her trouble; for she could scarcely endure a word from her fellow-man. She, despairing before God, was fierce as a tigress to her fellow-sinner who would stretch a hand to help her out of the mire, and set her beside him on the rock which he felt firm under his own feet.

"I will not leave you alone, Catherine," I said, feeling that I must at length assume another tone of speech with her who resisted gentleness. "Scorn my interference as you will," I said, "I have yet to give an account of you. And I have to fear lest my Master should require your blood at my hands. I did not follow you here, you may well believe me; but I have found you here, and I must speak."

All this time the wind was roaring overhead. But in the hollow was stillness, and I was so near her, that I could hear every word she said, although she spoke in a low compressed tone.

"Have you a right to persecute me," she said, "because I am unhappy?"

"I have a right, and more than a right, I have a duty to aid your better self against your worse. You, I fear, are siding with your worse self."

"You judge me hard. I have had wrongs that——"

And here she stopped in a way that let me know she would say no more.

"That you have had wrongs, and bitter wrongs, I do not for a moment doubt. And him who has done you most wrong, you will not forgive."

"No."

"No. Not even for the sake of Him who, hanging on the tree, after all the bitterness of blows and whipping, and derision, and rudest gestures and taunts, even when the faintness of death was upon Him cried to his Father to forgive their cruelty. He asks you to forgive the man who wronged you, and you will not—not even for Him! Oh, Catherine, Catherine!"

"It is very easy to talk, Mr. Walton," she returned with forced but cool scorn.

"Tell me, then," I said, "have you nothing to repent of? Have you done no wrong in this same miserable matter?"

"I do not understand you, sir," she said, freezingly, petulantly, not sure, perhaps, or unwilling to believe, that I meant what I did mean.

I was fully resolved to be plain with her now.

"Catherine Weir," I said, "did not God give you a house to keep fair and pure for Him? Did you keep it so?"

"He lied to me," she cried fiercely, with a cry that seemed to pierce through the storm over our head, up towards the everlasting justice. "He lied, and I trusted. For his sake I sinned, and he threw me from him."

"You gave him what was not yours to give. What right had you to cast your pearl before a swine? But dare you say it was all for his sake you did it?"

She made a broken gesture of lifting her hands to her head, let them drop by her side, and said nothing.

"You knew you were doing wrong. You felt it even more than he did. For God made you with a more delicate sense of purity, with a shrinking from the temptation, with a womanly foreboding of disgrace, to help you to hold the cup of your honour steady, which yet you dropped on the ground. Do not seek refuge in the cant about a woman's weakness. The strength of the woman is as needful to her womanhood, as the strength of the man is to his manhood; and a woman is just as strong as she will be. And now, instead of humbling yourself before your Father in heaven, whom you have wronged more even than your father on earth, you rage over your injuries and cherish hatred against him who wronged you. But I will go yet further, and show you in God's name, that you wronged your seducer. For you were his keeper, as he was yours. What if he had found a noble-hearted girl who also trusted him entirely—just until she knew she ought not to listen to him a moment longer? who, when his love showed itself less than human, caring but for itself, rose in the royalty of her maidenhood, and looked him in the face? Would he not have been ashamed before her, and so before himself, seeing in the glass of her dignity his own contemptibleness? But instead of such a woman he found you, who let him do as he would. No redemption for him in you. And now he walks the earth the worse for you, defiled by your spoil, glorying in his poor victory over you, despising all women for your sake, unrepentant and proud, ruining others the easier that he has already ruined you."

"He does! he does!" she shrieked, "but I will have my revenge. I can and I will."

And, darting past me, she rushed out into the storm. I followed, and could just see that she took the way to the village. Her dim shape went down the wind before me into the darkness. I followed in the same direction, fast and faster, for the wind was behind me, and a vague fear which ever grew in my heart, urged me to overtake her. What had I done? To what might I not have driven her? And although all I had said was true, and I had spoken from motives which, as far as I knew my own heart, I could not condemn, yet, as I sped after her, there came a reaction of feeling from the severity with which I had displayed her own case against her. "Ah! poor sister," I thought, "was it for me thus to reproach thee who hadst suffered already so fiercely? If the Spirit speaking in thy heart could not win thee, how should my words of hard accusation, true though they were, every one of them, rouse in thee anything but the wrath that springs from shame? Should I not have tried again, and yet again, to waken thy love? and then a sweet and healing shame, like that of her who bathed the Master's feet with her tears, would have bred fresh love, and no wrath."

But again I answered for myself, that my heart had not been the less tender towards her that I had tried to humble her, for it was that she might slip from under the net of her pride. Even when my tongue spoke the hardest things I could find, my heart was yearning over her. If I could but make her feel that she too had been wrong, would not the sense of common wrong between them help her to forgive? And with the first motion of willing pardon, would not a spring of tenderness, grief, and hope, burst from her poor old dried-up heart, and make it young and fresh once more? Thus I reasoned with myself as I followed her back through the darkness.

The wind fell a little as we came near the village, and the rain began to come down in torrents. There must have been a moon somewhere behind the clouds, for the darkness became less dense, and I began to fancy I could again see the dim shape which had rushed from me. I increased my speed, and became certain of it. Suddenly, her strength giving way, or her foot stumbling over something in the road, she fell to the earth with a cry.

I was beside her in a moment. She was insensible. I did what I could for her, and in a few minutes she began to come to herself.

"Where am I? Who is it?" she asked, listlessly.

When she found who I was, she made a great effort to rise, and succeeded.

"You must take my arm," I said, "and I will help you to the vicarage."

"I will go home," she answered.

"Lean on me now, at least; for you must get somewhere."

"What does it matter?" she said, in such a tone of despair, that it went to my very heart.

A wild half-cry, half-sob followed, and then she took my arm, and said nothing more. Nor did I trouble her with any words, except, when we reached the gate, to beg her to come into the vicarage instead of going home. But she would not listen to me, and so I took her home.

She pulled the key of the shop from her pocket. Her hand trembled so that I took it from her, and opened the door. A candle with a long snuff was flickering on the counter; and stretched out on the counter, with his head about a foot from the candle, lay little Gerard, fast asleep.

"Ah, little darling!" I said in my heart, "this is not much like painting the sky yet. But who knows?" And as I uttered the common-place question in my mind, in my mind it was suddenly changed into the half of a great dim prophecy by the answer which arose to it there, for the answer was "God."

I lifted the little fellow in my arms. He had fallen asleep weeping, and his face was dirty, and streaked with the channels of his tears. Catherine had snuffed the candle, and now stood with it in her hand, waiting for me to go. But, without heeding her, I bore my child to the door that led to their dwelling. I had never been up those stairs before, and therefore knew nothing of the way. But without offering any opposition, his mother followed, and lighted me. What a sad face of suffering and strife it was upon which that dim light fell! She set the candle down upon the table of a small room at the top of the stairs, which might have been comfortable enough but that it was neglected and disordered. And now I saw that she did not even have her child to sleep with her, for his crib stood in a corner of this their sitting-room.

I sat down on a hair-cloth couch, and proceeded to undress little Gerard, trying as much as I could not to wake him. In this I was almost successful. Catherine stood staring at me without saying a word. She looked dazed, perhaps from the effects of her fall. But she brought me his nightgown notwithstanding. Just as I had finished putting it on, and was rising to lay him in his crib, he opened his eyes, and looked at me; then gave a hurried look round, as if for his mother; then threw his arms round my neck and kissed me. I laid him down and the same moment he was fast asleep. In the morning it would not be even a dream to him.

"Now," I thought, "you are safe for the night, poor fatherless child. Even your mother's hardness will not make you sad now. Perhaps the Heavenly Father will send you loving dreams."

I turned to Catherine, and bade her good-night. She just put her hand in mine; but, instead of returning my leave-taking, she said:

"Do not fancy you will get the better of me, Mr. Walton, by being kind to that boy. I will have my revenge, and I know how. I am only waiting my time. When he is just going to drink, I will dash it from his hand. I will. At the altar I will."

Her eyes were flashing almost with madness, and she made fierce gestures with her right arm. I saw that argument was useless.

"You loved him once, Catherine," I said. "Love him again. Love him better. Forgive him. Revenge is far worse than anything you have done yet."

"What do I care! Why should I care?"

And she laughed terribly.

I made haste to leave the room and the house; but I lingered for nearly an hour about the place before I could make up my mind to go home, so much was I afraid lest she should do something altogether insane. But at length I saw the candle appear in the shop, which was some relief to my anxiety; and reflecting that her one consuming thought of revenge was some security for her conduct otherwise, I went home.

That night my own troubles seemed small to me, and I did not brood over them at all. My mind was filled with the idea of the sad misery which, rather than in which, that poor woman was; and I prayed for her as for a desolated human world whose sun had deserted the heavens, whose fair fields, rivers, and groves were hardening into the frost of death, and all their germs of hope becoming but portions of the lifeless mass. "If I am sorrowful," I said, "God lives none the less. And his will is better than mine, yea is my hidden and perfected will. In Him is my life. His will be done. What, then, is my trouble compared to hers? I will not sink into it and be selfish."

In the morning my first business was to inquire after her. I found her in the shop, looking very ill, and obstinately reserved. Gerard sat in a corner, looking as far from happy as a child of his years could look. As I left the shop he crept out with me.

"Gerard, come back," said his mother.

"I will not take him away," I said.

The boy looked up in my face, as if he wanted to whisper to me, and I stooped to listen.

"I dreamed last night," said the boy, "that a big angel with white wings came and took me out of my bed, and carried me high, high up—so high that I could not dream any more."

"We shall be carried up so high one day, Gerard, my boy, that we shall not want to dream any more. For we shall be carried up to God himself. Now go back to your mother."

He obeyed at once, and I went on through the village.

XXIII.

I WANTED just to pass the gate, and look up the road towards Oldcastle Hall. I thought to see nothing but the empty road between the leafless trees, lying there like a dead stream that would not bear me on to the "sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice" that lay beyond. But just as I reached the gate, Miss Oldcastle came out of the lodge, where I learned afterwards the woman that kept the gate was ill.

When she saw me she stopped, and I entered hurriedly, and addressed her. But I could say nothing better than the merest commonplaces. For her old manner, which I had almost forgotten, a certain coldness shadowed with haughtiness, whose influence I had strongly felt when I began to make her acquaintance, had returned. I cannot make my reader understand how this could be blended with the sweetness in her face and the gentleness of her manners; but there the opposites were, and I could feel them both. There was likewise a certain drawing of herself away from me, which checked the smallest advance on my part; so that—I wonder at it now, but so it was—after a few words of very ordinary conversation, I bade her good-morning and went away, feeling like "a man forbid"—as if I had done her some wrong, and she had chidden me for it. What a stone lay in my breast! I could hardly breathe for it. What could have caused her to change her manner towards me? I had made no advance; I could not have offended her. Yet there she glided up the road, and here stood I, outside the gate. That road was now a flowing river that bore from me the treasure of the earth, while my boat was spell-bound, and could not follow. I would run after her, fall at her feet, and intreat to know wherein I had offended her. But there I stood enchanted, and there she floated away between the trees; till at length she turned the slow sweep, and I, breathing deep as she vanished from my sight, turned likewise, and walked back the dreary way to the village. And now I knew that I had never been miserable in my life before. And I knew, too, that I had never loved her as I loved her now.

But, as I had for the last ten years of my life been striving to be a right will, with a thousand failures and forgetfulnesses every one of those years, while yet the desire grew stronger as hope recovered from every failure, I would now try to do my work as if nothing had happened to incapacitate me for it. So I went on to fulfil the plan with which I had left home, including, as it did, a visit to Thomas Weir, whom I had not seen in his own shop since he had ordered me out of it. This, as far as I was concerned, was more accidental than intentional. I had, indeed, abstained from going to him for a while, in order to give him time to come round; but then circumstances which I have recorded intervened to prevent me; so that as yet no advance had been made on my part any more than on his towards a reconciliation; which, however, could have been such only on one side, for I had not been in the least offended by the way he had behaved to me, and needed no reconciliation. To tell the truth, I was pleased to find that my words had had force enough with him to rouse his wrath. Anything rather than indifference! That the heart of the honest man would in the end right me, I could not doubt: in the meantime I would see whether a friendly call might not improve the state of affairs. Till he yielded to the voice within him, however, I could not expect that our relation to each other would be quite restored. As long as he resisted his conscience, and knew that I sided with his conscience, it was impossible he should regard me with peaceful eyes, however much he might desire to be friendly with me.

I found him busy, as usual, for he was one of the most diligent men I have ever known. But his face was gloomy, and I thought or fancied that the old scorn had begun once more to usurp the expression of it. Young Tom was not in the shop.

"It is a long time since I saw you, now, Thomas."

"I can hardly wonder at that," he returned, as if he were trying to do me justice, but his eyes dropped, and he resumed his work, and said no more. I thought it better to make no reference to the past even by assuring him that it was not from resentment that I had been a stranger.

"How is Tom?" I asked.

"Well enough," he returned. Then, with a smile of peevishness not unmingled with contempt, he added: "He's getting too uppish for me. I don't think the Latin agrees with him."

I could not help suspecting at once how the matter stood—namely, that the father, unhappy in his conduct to his daughter, and unable to make up his mind to do right with regard to her, had been behaving captiously and unjustly to his son, and so had rendered himself more miserable than ever.

"Perhaps he finds it too much for him without me," I said, evasively; "but I called to-day partly to inform him that I am quite ready now to recommence our readings together; after which I hope you will find the Latin agree with him better."

"I wish you would let him alone, sir—I mean, take no more trouble about him. You see I can't do as you want me; I wasn't made to go another man's way; and so it's very hard—more than I can bear—to be under so much obligation to you."

"But you mistake me altogether, Thomas. It is for the lad's own sake that I want to go on reading with him. And you won't interfere between him and any use I can be of to him. I assure you, to have you go my way instead of your own is the last thing I could wish, though I confess I do wish very much that you would choose the right way for your own way."

He made me no answer, but maintained a sullen silence.

"Thomas," I said at length, "I had thought you were breaking every bond of Satan that withheld you from entering into the kingdom of heaven; but I fear he has strengthened his bands and holds you now as much a captive as ever. So it is not even your own way you are walking in, but his."

"It's no use your trying to frighten me. I don't believe in the devil."

"It is God I want you to believe in. And I am not going to dispute with you now about whether there is a devil or not. In a matter of life and death we have no time for settling every disputed point."

"Life or death! What do you mean?"

"I mean that whether you believe there is a devil or not, you know there is an evil power in your mind dragging you down. I am not speaking in generals; I mean now, and you know as to what I mean it. And if you yield to it, that evil power, whatever may be your theory about it, will drag you down to death. It is a matter of life or death, I repeat, not of theory about the devil."

"Well, I always did say, that if you once give a priest an inch he'll take an ell; and I am sorry I forgot it for once."

Having said this, he shut up his mouth in a manner that indicated plainly enough he would not open it again for some time. This, more than his speech, irritated me, and with a mere "good morning," I walked out of the shop.

No sooner was I in the open air than I knew that I too, I as well as poor Thomas Weir, was under a spell; knew that I had gone to him before I had recovered sufficiently from the mingled disappointment and mortification of my interview with Miss Oldcastle; that while I spoke to him I was not speaking with a whole heart; that I had been discharging a duty as if I had been discharging a musket; that, although I had spoken the truth, I had spoken it ungraciously and selfishly.

I could not bear it. I turned instantly and went back into the shop.

"Thomas, my friend," I said, holding out my hand, "I beg your pardon. I was wrong. I spoke to you as I ought not. I was troubled in my own mind, and that made me lose my temper and be rude to you, who are far more troubled than I am. Forgive me!"

He did not take my hand at first, but stared at me as if, not comprehending me, he supposed that I was backing up what I had said last with more of the same sort. But by the time I had finished he saw what I meant; his countenance altered and looked as if the evil spirit were about to depart from him; he held out his hand, gave mine a great grasp, dropped his head, went on with his work, and said never a word.

I went out of the shop once more, but in a greatly altered mood.

On the way home, I tried to find out how it was that I had that morning failed so signally. I had little virtue in keeping my temper, because it was naturally very even; therefore I had the more shame in losing it. I had borne all my uneasiness about Miss Oldcastle without, as far as I knew, transgressing in this fashion till this very morning. Were great sorrows less hurtful to the temper than small disappointments? Yes, surely. But Shakspeare represents Brutus, after hearing of the sudden death of his wife, as losing his temper with Cassius to a degree that bewildered the latter, who said he did not know that Brutus could have been so angry. Is this consistent with the character of the stately-minded Brutus, or with the dignity of sorrow? It is. For the loss of his wife alone would have made him only less irritable; but the whole weight of an army, with its distracting cares and conflicting interests, pressed upon him; and the battle of an empire was to be fought at daybreak, so that he could not be alone with his grief. Between the silence of death in his mind, and the roar of life in his brain, he became irritable.

Looking yet deeper into it, I found that till this morning I had experienced no personal mortification with respect to Miss Oldcastle. It was not the mere disappointment of having no more talk with her, for the sight of her was a blessing I had not in the least expected, that had worked upon me, but the fact that she had repelled or seemed to repel me. And thus I found that self was at the root of the wrong I had done to one over whose mental condition, especially while I was telling him the unwelcome truth, I ought to have been as tender as a mother over her wounded child. I could not say that it was wrong to feel disappointed or even mortified; but something was wrong when one whose especial business it was to serve his people in the name of Him who was full of grace and truth, made them suffer because of his own inward pain.

No sooner had I settled this in my mind than my trouble returned with a sudden pang. Had I actually seen her that morning, and spoken to her, and left her with a pain in my heart? What if that face of hers was doomed ever to bring with it such a pain—to be ever to me no more than a lovely vision radiating grief? If so, I would endure in silence and as patiently as I could, trying to make up for the lack o. brightness in my own fate by causing more brightness in the fate of others. I would at least keep on trying to do my work.

That moment I felt a little hand poke itself into mine. I looked down, and there was Gerard Weir looking up in my face. I found myself in the midst of the children coming out of school, for it was Saturday, and a half-holiday. He smiled in my face, and I hope I smiled in his; and so, hand in hand, we went on to the vicarage, where I gave him up to my sister. But I cannot convey to my reader any notion of the quietness that entered my heart with the grasp of that childish hand. I think it was the faith of the boy in me that comforted me, but I could not help thinking of the words of our Lord about receiving a child in his name and so receiving Him. By the time we reached the vicarage my heart was very quiet. As the little child held by my hand, so I seemed to be holding by God's hand. And a sense of heart-security, as well as soul-safety, awoke in me; and I said to myself,—Surely He will take care of my heart as well as of my mind and my conscience. For one blessed moment I seemed to be at the very centre of things, looking out quietly upon my own troubled emotions as upon something outside of me—apart from me, even as one from the firm rock may look abroad upon the vexed sea. And I thought I then knew something of what the Apostle meant when he said, "Your life is hid with Christ in God." I knew that there was a deeper self than that which was thus troubled.

I had not had my usual ramble this morning, and was otherwise ill-prepared for the Sunday. So I went early into the church; but finding that the sexton's wife had not yet finished lighting the stove, I sat down by my own fire in the vestry.

Suppose I am sitting there now while I say one word for our congregations in winter. I was very particular in having the church well warmed before Sunday. I think some parsons must neglect seeing after this matter on principle, because warmth may make a weary creature go to sleep here and there about the place: as if any healing doctrine could enter the soul while it is on the rack of the frost. The clergy should see—for it is their business—that their people have no occasion to think of their bodies at all while they are in church. They have enough ado to think of the truth. When our Lord was feeding even their bodies, he made them all sit down on the grass. It is worth noticing that there was much grass in the place—a rare thing I should think in those countries—and therefore, perhaps, it was chosen by Him for their comfort in feeding their souls and bodies both. If I may judge from experiences of my own, one of the reasons why some churches are of all places the least likely for anything good to be found in, is, that they are as wretchedly cold to the body as they are to the soul—too cold every way for anything to grow in them. Edelweiss, "Noble-white"—as they call a plant growing under the snow on some of the Alps—could not survive the winter in such churches. There is small welcome in a cold house. And the clergyman, who is the steward, should look to it. It is for him to give his Master's friends a welcome to his Master's house—for the welcome of a servant is precious, and now-a-days very rare.

And now Mrs. Stone must have finished. I go into the old church which looks as if it were quietly waiting for its people. No. She has not done yet. Never mind.—How full of meaning the vaulted roof looks! as if, having gathered a soul of its own out of the generations that have worshipped here for so long, it had feeling enough to grow hungry for a psalm before the end of the week.

Some such half-foolish fancy was now passing through my tranquillized mind or rather heart—for the mind would have rejected it at once—when to my—what shall I call it?—not amazement, for the delight was too strong for amazement—the old organ woke up and began to think aloud. As if it had been brooding over it all the week in the wonderful convolutions of its wooden brain, it began to sigh out the Agnus Dei of Mozart's Twelfth Mass upon the air of the still church, which lay swept and garnished for the Sunday.—How could it be? I know now; and I guessed then; and my guess was right; and my reader must be content to guess too. I took no step to verify my conjecture, for I felt that I was upon my honour, but sat in one of the pews and listened, till the old organ sobbed itself into silence. Then I heard the steps of the sexton's wife vanish from the church, heard her lock the door, and knew that I was alone in the ancient pile, with the twilight growing thick about me, and felt like Sir Galahad, when, after the "rolling organ-harmony," he heard "wings flutter, voices hover clear." In a moment the mood changed; and I was sorry, not that the dear organ was dead for the night, but actually felt gently mournful that the wonderful old thing never had and never could have a conscious life of its own. So strangely does the passion—which I had not invented, reader, whoever thou art that thinkest love and a church do not well harmonize—so strangely, I say, full to overflowing of its own vitality, does it radiate life, that it would even of its own superabundance quicken into blessed consciousness the inanimate objects around it, thinking what they would feel had they a consciousness correspondent to their form, were their faculties moved from within themselves instead of from the will and operation of humanity.

I lingered on long in the dark church, as my reader knows I had done often before. Nor did I move from the seat I had first taken till I left the sacred building. And there I made my sermon for the next morning. And herewith I impart it to my reader. But he need not be afraid of another such as I have already given him, for I impart it only in its original germ, its concentrated essence of sermon these four verses:

Had I the grace to win the grace
Of some old man complete in lore,
My face would worship at his face,
Like childhood seated on the floor.

Had I the grace to win the grace
Of childhood, loving shy, apart,
The child should find a nearer place,
And teach me resting on my heart.

Had I the grace to win the grace
Of maiden living all above,
My soul would trample down the base,
That she might have a man to love.

A perfect grace I could not win
Knocks now at my half-open door:
Ah, Lord of glory, come Thou in,
Thy grace divine is all and more.

This was what I made for myself. I told my people that God had created all our worships, reverences, tendernesses, loves. That they had come out of his heart, and He had made them in us because they were in Him first. That otherwise He would not have cared to make them. That all that we could imagine of the wise, the lovely, the beautiful, was in Him, only infinitely more of them than we could not merely imagine, but understand, even if He did all He could to explain them to us, to make us understand them. That in Him was all the wise teaching of the best man ever known in the world and more; all the grace and gentleness and truth of the best child and more; all the tenderness and devotion of the truest type of womankind and more; for there is a love that passeth the love of women, not the love of Jonathan to David, though David said so; but the love of God to the men and women whom He has made. Therefore, we must be all God's; and all our aspirations, all our worships, all our honours, all our loves, must centre in Him, the Best.

XXIV.

Feeling rather more than the usual reaction so well-known to clergymen after the concentrated duties of the Sunday, I resolved on Monday to have the long country walk I had been disappointed of on the Saturday previous. It was such a day as it seems impossible to describe except in negatives. It was not stormy, it was not rainy, it was not sunshiny, it was not snowy, it was not frosty, it was not foggy, it was not clear, it was nothing but cloudy and quiet and cold and generally ungenial, with just a puff of wind now and then to give an assertion to its ungeniality. I should not in the least have cared to tell what sort the day was, had it not been an exact representation of my own mind. It was not the day that made me such as itself. The weather could always easily influence the surface of my mind, my external mood, but it could never go much further. The smallest pleasure would break through the conditions that merely came of such a day. But this morning my whole mind and heart seemed like the day. The summer was thousands of miles off on the other side of the globe. Ethelwyn, up at the old house there across the river, seemed millions of miles away. The summer might come back; she never would come nearer: it was absurd to expect it. For in such moods stupidity constantly arrogates to itself the qualities and claims of insight. In fact, it passes itself off for common sense, making the most dreary ever appear the most reasonable. In such moods a man might almost be persuaded that it was ridiculous to expect any such poetic absurdity as the summer, with its diamond mornings and its opal evenings, ever to come again; nay, to think that it ever had had any existence except in the fancies of the human heart—one of its castles in the air. The whole of life seemed faint and foggy, with no red in it anywhere; and when I glanced at my present relations in Marshmallows, I could not help finding several circumstances to give some appearance of justice to this appearance of things. I seemed to myself to have done no good. I had driven Catherine Weir to the verge of suicide, while at the same time I could not restrain her from the contemplation of some dire revenge. I had lost the man upon whom I had most reckoned as a seal of my ministry, namely Thomas Weir. True there was Old Rogers; but Old Rogers was just as good before I found him. I could not dream of having made him any better. And so I went on brooding over all the disappointing portions of my labour, all the time thinking about myself, instead of God and the work that lay for me to do in the days to come.

"Nobody," I said, "but Old Rogers understands me. Nobody would care, as far as my teaching goes, if another man took my place from next Sunday forward. And for Miss Oldcastle, her playing the Agnus Dei on Saturday afternoon, even if she intended that I should hear it, could only indicate at most that she knew how she had behaved to me in the morning, and thought she had gone too far and been unkind, or perhaps was afraid lest she should be accountable for any failure I might make in my Sunday duties, and therefore felt bound to do something to restore my equanimity."

Choosing, though without consciously intending to do so, the dreariest path to be found, I wandered up the side of the slow black river, with the sentinel pollards looking at themselves in its gloomy mirror, just as I was looking at myself in the mirror of my circumstances. They leaned in all directions, irregular as the headstones in an ancient churchyard. In the summer they looked like explosions of green leaves at the best; now they looked like the burnt-out cases of the summer's fireworks. How different, too, was the river from the time when a whole fleet of shining white lilies lay anchored among their own broad green leaves upon its clear waters, filled with sunlight in every pore, as they themselves would fill the pores of a million-caverned sponge! But I could not even recall the past summer as beautiful. I seemed to care for nothing. But the first miserable afternoon at Marshmallows looked now as if it had been the whole of my coming relation to the place seen through a reversed telescope. And here I was in it now.

The walk along the side was tolerably dry, although the river was bank-full. But when I came to the bridge I wanted to cross—a wooden one—I found that the approach to it had been partly undermined and carried away, for here the river had overflowed its banks in one of the late storms; and all about the place was still very wet and swampy. I could therefore get no further in my gloomy walk, and so turned back upon my steps. Scarcely had I done so, when I saw a man coming hastily towards me from far upon the straight line of the river walk. I could not mistake him at any distance. It was Old Rogers. I felt both ashamed and comforted when I recognized him.

"Well, Old Rogers," I said, as soon as he came within hail, trying to speak cheerfully, "you cannot get much farther this way—without wading a bit, at least."

"I don't want to go no further now, sir. I came to find you."

"Nothing amiss, I hope?"

"Nothing as I knows on, sir. I only wanted to have a little chat with you. I told master I wanted to leave for an hour or so. He allus lets me do just as I like."

"But how did you know where to find me?"

"I saw you come this way. You passed me right on the bridge, and didn't see me, sir. So says I to myself, 'Old Rogers, summat's amiss wi' the parson to-day. He never went by me like that afore. This won't do. You just go and see.' So I went home and told master, and here I be, sir. And I hope you're noways offended with the liberty of me."

"Did I really pass you on the bridge?" I said, unable to understand it.

"That you did, sir. I knowed parson must be a goodish bit in his own in'ards afore he would do that."

"I needn't tell you I didn't see you, Old Rogers."

"I could tell you that, sir. I hope there's nothing gone main wrong, sir. Miss is well, sir, I hope?"

"Quite well, I thank you. No, my dear fellow, nothing's gone main wrong, as you say. Some of my running tackle got jammed a bit, that's all. I'm a little out of spirits, I believe."

"Well, sir, don't you be afeard I'm going to be troublesome. Don't think I want to get aboard your ship, except you fling me a rope. There's a many things you mun ha' to think about, that an ignorant man like me couldn't take up if you was to let 'em drop. And being a gentleman, I do believe, makes the matter worse betuxt us. And there's many a thing that no man can go talkin' about to any one but only the Lord himself. Still you can't help us poor folks seeing when there's summat amiss, and we can't help havin' our own thoughts any more than the sailor's jackdaw that couldn't speak. And sometimes we may be nearer the mark than you would suppose, for God has made us all of one blood, you know."

"What are you driving at, Old Rogers?" I said with a smile, which was none the less true that I suspected he had read some of the worst trouble of my heart. For why should I mind an honourable man like him knowing what oppressed me, though, as things were, I certainly should not, as he said, choose to tell it to any but one?

"I don't want to say what I was driving at, if it was anything but this—that I want to put to the clumsy hand of a rough old tar, with a heart as soft as the pitch that makes his hand hard—to trim your sails a bit, sir, and help you to lie a point closer to the wind. You're not just close-hauled, sir."

"Say on, Old Rogers. I understand you, and I will listen with all my heart, for you have a good right to speak."

And Old Rogers spoke thus:

"Oncet upon a time, I made a voyage in a merchant barque. We were becalmed in the south seas. And weary work it wur, a doin' of nothin' from day to day. But when the water began to come up thick from the bottom of the water-casks, it was wearier a deal. Then a thick fog came on, as white as snow a'most, and we couldn't see more than a few yards ahead or on any side of us. But the fog didn't keep the heat off; it only made it worse, and the water was fast going done. The short allowance grew shorter and shorter, and the men, some of them, were half-mad with thirst, and began to look bad at one another. I kept up my heart by looking ahead inside me. For days and days the fog hung about us as if the air had been made o' flocks o' wool. The captain took to his berth, and several of the crew to their hammocks, for it was just as hot on deck as anywhere else. The mate lay on a spare-sail on the quarter-deck, groaning. I had a strong suspicion that the schooner was drifting, and hove the lead again and again, but could find no bottom. Some of the men got hold of the spirits, and that didn't quench their thirst. It drove them clean mad. I had to knock one of them down myself with a capstan-bar, for he ran at the mate with his knife. At last I began to lose all hope. And still I was sure the schooner was slowly drifting. My head was like to burst, and my tongue was like a lump of holystone in my mouth. One morning, I had just, as I thought, lain down on the deck to breathe my last, hoping I should die before I went quite mad with thirst, when all at once the fog lifted, like the foot of a sail. I sprung to my feet. There was the blue sky overhead; but the terrible burning sun was there. A moment more and a light air blew on my cheek, and, turning my face to it as if it had been the very breath of God, there was an island within half a mile, and I saw the shine of water on the face of a rock on the shore. I cried out, 'Land on the weather-quarter! Water in sight!' In a moment more a boat was lowered, and in a few minutes the boat's crew, of which I was one, were lying, clothes and all, in a little stream that came down from the hills above.—There, Mr. Walton! that's what I wanted to say to you."

This is as near the story of my old friend as my limited knowledge of sea-affairs allows me to report it.

"I understand you quite, Old Rogers, and I thank you heartily," I said.

"No doubt," resumed he, "King Solomon was quite right, as he always was, I suppose, in what he said, for his wisdom mun ha' laid mostly in the tongue—right, I say, when he said, 'Boast not thyself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth;' but I can't help thinking there's another side to it. I think it would be as good advice to a man on the other tack, whose boasting lay far to windward, and he close on a lee-shore wi' breakers—it wouldn't be amiss to say to him, 'Don't strike your colours to the morrow; for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth.' There's just as many good days as bad ones; as much fair weather as foul in the days to come. And if a man keeps up heart, he's all the better for that, and none the worse when the evil day does come. But, God forgive me! I'm talking like a heathen. As if there was any chance about what the days would bring forth. No, my lad," said the old sailor, assuming the dignity of his superior years under the inspiration of the truth, "boast nor trust nor hope in the morrow. Boast and trust and hope in God, for thou shalt yet praise Him, who is the health of thy countenance and thy God."

I could but hold out my hand. I had nothing to say. For he had spoken to me as an angel of God.

The old man was silent for some moments: his emotion needed time to still itself again. Nor did he return to the subject. He held out his hand once more, saying—

"Good day, sir. I must go back to my work."

"I will go back with you," I returned.

And so we walked back side by side to the village, but not a word did we speak the one to the other, till we shook hands and parted upon the bridge, where we had first met. Old Rogers went to his work, and I lingered upon the bridge. I leaned upon the low parapet, and looked up the stream as far as the mists creeping about the banks, and hovering in thinnest veils over the surface of the water, would permit. Then I turned and looked down the river crawling on to the sweep it made out of sight just where Mr. Brownrigg's farm began to come down to its banks. Then I looked to the left, and there stood my old church, as quiet in the dreary day, though not so bright, as in the sunshine: even the graves themselves must look yet more "solemn sad" in a wintry day like this, than they look when the sunlight that enfolds them proclaims that God is not the God of the dead but of the living. One of the great battles that we have to fight in this world—for twenty great battles have to be fought all at once and in one—is the battle with appearances. I turned me to the right, and there once more I saw, as on that first afternoon, the weathercock that watched the winds over the stables at Oldcastle Hall. It had caught just one glimpse of the sun through some rent in the vapours, and flung it across to me, then vanished again amid the general dinginess of the hour.

XXV.

I HAVE said, near the beginning of my story, that my parish was a large one: how is it that I have mentioned but one of the great families in it, and have indeed confined my recollections entirely to the village and its immediate neighbourhood? Will my reader have patience while I explain this to him a little? First, as he may have observed, my personal attraction is towards the poor rather than the rich. I was made so. I can generally get nearer the poor than the rich. But I say generally, for I have known a few rich people quite as much to my mind as the best of the poor. Thereupon, of course, their education would give them the advantage with me in the possibilities of communion. But when the heart is right, and there is a good stock of common sense as well,—a gift predominant, as far as I am aware, in no one class over another, education will turn the scale very gently with me. And then when I reflect that some of these poor people would have made nobler ladies and gentlemen than all but two or three I know, if they had only had the opportunity, there is a reaction towards the poor, something like a feeling of favour because they have not had fair play—a feeling soon modified, though not altered, by the reflection that they are such because God who loves them better than we do, has so ordered their lot, and by the recollection that not only was our Lord himself poor, but He said the poor were blessed. And let me just say in passing that I not only believe it because He said it, but I believe it because I see that it is so. I think sometimes that the world must have been especially created for the poor, and that particular allowances will be made for the rich because they are born into such disadvantages, and with their wickednesses and their miseries, their love of spiritual dirt and meanness, subserve the highest growth and emancipation of the poor, that they may inherit both the earth and the kingdom of heaven.

But I have been once more wandering from my subject.

Thus it was that the people in the village lying close to my door attracted most of my attention at first; of which attention those more immediately associated with the village, as, for instance, the inhabitants of the Hall, came in for a share, although they did not belong to the same class.

Again, the houses of most of the gentlefolk lay considerably apart from the church and from each other. Many of them went elsewhere to church, and

I did not feel bound to visit those, for I had enough to occupy me without, and had little chance of getting a hold of them to do them good. Still there were one or two families which I would have visited oftener, I confess, had I been more interested in them, or had I had a horse. Therefore, I ought to have bought a horse sooner than I did. Before this winter was over, however, I did buy one, partly to please Dr. Duncan, who urged me to it for the sake of my health, partly because I could then do my duty better, and partly, I confess, from having been very fond of an old mare of my father's, when I was a boy, living, after my mother's death, at a farm of his in B—shire. Happening to come across a gray mare very much like her, I bought her at once.

I think it was the very day after the events recorded in my last chapter that I mounted her to pay a visit to two rich maiden ladies, whose carriage stopped at the Lych-gate most Sundays when the weather was favourable, but whom I had called upon only once since I came to the parish. I should not have thought this visit worth mentioning, except for the conversation I had with them, during which a hint or two were dropped which had an influence in colouring my thoughts for some time after.

I was shown with much ceremony by a butler, as old apparently as his livery of yellow and green, into the presence of the two ladies, one of whom sat in state reading a volume of the Spectator. She was very tall, and as square as the straight long-backed chair upon which she sat. A fat asthmatic poodle lay at her feet upon the hearth-rug. The other, a little lively grey-haired creature, who looked like a most ancient girl whom no power of gathering years would ever make old, was standing upon a high chair, making love to a demoniacal-looking cockatoo in a gilded cage. As I entered the room, the latter all but jumped from her perch with a merry though wavering laugh, and advanced to meet me.

"Jonathan, bring the cake and wine," she cried to the retreating servant.

The former rose with a solemn stiff-backedness, which was more amusing than dignified, and extended her hand as I approached her, without moving from her place.

"We were afraid, Mr. Walton," said the little lady, "that you had forgotten we were parishioners of yours."

"That I could hardly do," I answered, "seeing you are such regular attendants at church. But I confess I have given you ground for your rebuke, Miss Crowther. I bought a horse, however, the other day, and this is the first use I have put him to.

"We're charmed to see you. It is very good of you not to forget such uninteresting girls as we are."

"You forget, Jemima," interposed her sister, in a feminine bass, "that time is always on the wing. I should have thought we were both decidedly middle-aged, though you are the elder by I will not say how many years."

"All but ten years, Hester. I remember rocking you in your cradle scores of times. But somehow, Mr. Walton, I can't help feeling as if she was my elder sister. She is so learned, you see; and I don't read anything but the newspapers."

"And your Bible, Jemima. Do yourself justice."

"That's a matter of course, sister. But this is not the way to entertain Mr. Walton."

"The gentlemen used to entertain the ladies when I was young, Jemima. I do not know how it may have been when you were."

"Much the same, I believe, sister. But if you look at Mr. Walton, I think you will see that he is pretty much entertained as it is."

"I agree with Miss Hester," I said. "It is the duty of gentlemen to entertain ladies. But it is so much the kinder of ladies when they surpass their duty, and condescend to entertain gentlemen."

"What can surpass duty, Mr. Walton! I confess I do not agree with your doctrines upon that point."

"I do not quite understand you, Miss Hester," I returned.

"Why, Mr. Walton—I hope you will not think me rude, but it always seems to me—and it has given me much pain, when I consider that your congregation is chiefly composed of the lower classes, who may be greatly injured by such a style of preaching. I must say I think so, Mr. Walton. Only perhaps you are one of those who think a lady's opinion on such matters is worth nothing."

"On the contrary, I respect an opinion just as far as the lady or gentleman who holds it seems to me qualified to have formed it first. But you have not yet told me what you think so objectionable in my preaching."

"You always speak as if faith in Christ was something greater than duty. Now I think duty the first thing."

"I quite agree with you, Miss Crowther. For how can I, or any clergyman, urge a man to that which is not his duty? But tell me, is not faith in Christ a duty? Where you have mistaken me is, that you think I speak of faith as higher than duty, when indeed I speak of faith as higher than any other duty. It is the highest duty of man. I do not say the duty he always sees clearest, or even sees at all. But the fact is, that when that which is a duty becomes the highest delight of a man, the joy of his very being, he no more thinks or needs to think about it as a duty. What would you think of the love of a son who, when an appeal was made to his affections, should say, 'O yes, I love my mother dearly: it is my duty, of course'?"

"That sounds very plausible, Mr. Walton; but still I cannot help feeling that you preach faith and not works. I do not say that you are not to preach faith, of course; but you know faith without works is dead."

"Now, really, Hester," interposed Miss Jemima, "I cannot think how it is, but, for my part, I should have said that Mr. Walton was constantly preaching works. He's always telling you to do something or other. I know I always come out of the church with something on my mind; and I've got to work it off somehow before I'm comfortable."

And here Miss Jemima got up on the chair again, and began to flirt with the cockatoo once more, but only in silent signs.

I cannot quite recall how this part of the conversation drew to a close. But I will tell a fact or two about the sisters which may possibly explain how it was that they took up such different notions of my preaching. The younger scarcely left the house, but spent almost the whole of her time in reading small dingy books of eighteenth-century literature. She believed in no other; thought Shakspere sentimental where he was not low, and Bacon pompous; Addison thoroughly respectable and gentlemanly. Pope was the great English poet, incomparably before Milton. The "Essay on Man" contained the deepest wisdom; the "Rape of the Lock" the most graceful imagination to be found in the language. The "Vicar of Wakefield" was pretty, but foolish; while in philosophy, Paley was perfect, especially in his notion of happiness, which she had heard objected to, and therefore warmly defended. Somehow or other, respectability—in position, in morals, in religion, in conduct—was everything. The consequence was that her very nature was old-fashioned, and had nothing in it of that lasting youth which is the birthright—so often despised—of every immortal being. But I have already said more about her than her place in my story justifies.

Miss Crowther, on the contrary, whose eccentricities did not lie on the side of respectability, had gone on shocking the stiff proprieties of her younger sister till she could be shocked no more, and gave in as to the hopelessness of fate. She had had a severe disappointment in youth, had not only survived it, but saved her heart alive out of it, losing only, as far as appeared to the eyes of her neighbours at least, any remnant of selfish care about herself; and she now spent the love which had before been concentrated upon one object, upon every living thing that came near her, even to her sister's sole favourite, the wheezing poodle. She was very odd, it must be confessed, with her gray hair, her clear gray eye with wrinkled eyelids, her light step, her laugh at once girlish and cracked; darting in and out of the cottages, scolding this matron with a lurking smile in every tone, hugging that baby, boxing the ears of the other little tyrant, passing this one's rent, and threatening that other with awful vengeances; but it was a very lovely oddity. Their property was not large, and she knew every living thing on the place down to the dogs and pigs. And Miss Jemima, as the people always called her, transferring the Miss Crowther of primogeniture to the younger, who kept, like King Henry IV.,—

> 'Her' presence, like a robe pontifical, > Ne'er seen but wondered at,

was the actual queen of the neighbourhood; for, though she was the very soul of kindness, she was determined to have her own way, and had it.

Although I did not know all this at the time, such were the two ladies who held these different opinions about my preaching; the one who did nothing but read Messrs. Addison, Pope, Paley, and Co., considering that I neglected the doctrine of works as the seal of faith, and the one who was busy helping her neighbours from morning to night, finding little in my preaching, except incentive to benevolence.

The next point where my recollection can take up the conversation, is where Miss Hester made the following further criticism on my pulpit labours.

"You are too anxious to explain everything, Mr. Walton."

I pause in my recording, to do my critic the justice of remarking that what she said looks worse on paper than it sounded from her lips; for she was a gentlewoman, and the tone has much to do with the impression made by the intellectual contents of all speech.

"Where can be the use of trying to make uneducated people see the grounds of everything?" she said. "It is enough that this or that is in the Bible."

"Yes; but there is just the point. What is in the Bible? Is it this or that?"

"You are their spiritual instructor: tell them what is in the Bible."

"But you have just been objecting to my mode of representing what is in the Bible."

"It will be so much the worse, if you add argument to convince them of what is incorrect."

"I doubt that. Argument will expose itself the sooner that it is not on the side of the truth."

"You cannot expect them to judge of what you tell them."

"The Bible urges upon us to search and understand."

"I grant that for those whose business it is, like yourself."

"Do you think, then, that the Church consists of a few privileged to understand, and a great many who cannot understand, and therefore need not be taught?"

"I said you had to teach them."

"But to teach is to make people understand."

"I don't think so. If you come to that, how much can the wisest of us understand? You remember what Pope says,—

> Superior beings, when of late they saw
> A mortal man unfold all Nature's law,
> Admired such wisdom in an earthly shape,
> And showed a Newton as we show an ape."

"I do not know the passage. Pope is not my Bible. I should call such superior beings very inferior beings indeed."

"Do you call the angels inferior beings?"

"Such angels, certainly."

"He means the good angels, of course."

"And I say the good angels could never behave like that, for contempt is one of the lowest spiritual conditions in which any being can place himself. Our Lord says, 'Take heed that ye despise not one of these little ones, for their angels do always behold the face of my Father, who is in Heaven.'"

"Now will you even say that you understand that passage?"

"Practically, well enough; just as the poorest man of my congregation may understand it. I am not to despise one of the little ones. Pope represents the angels as despising a Newton even."

"And you despise Pope."

"I hope not. I say he was full of despising, and therefore, if for no other reason, a small man."

"Surely you do not jest at his bodily infirmities."

"I had forgotten them quite."

"In every other sense he was a great man."

"I cannot allow it. He was intellectually a great man, but morally a small man."

"Such refinements are not easily followed."

"I will undertake to make the poorest woman in my congregation understand that."

"Why don't you try your friend Mrs. Oldcastle, then? It might do her a little good," said Miss Hester, now becoming, I thought, a little spiteful at hearing her favourite treated so unceremoniously. I found afterwards that there was some kindness in it, however.

"I should have very little influence with Mrs. Oldcastle if I were to make the attempt. But I am not called upon to address my flock individually upon every point of character."

"I thought she was an intimate friend of yours."

"Quite the contrary. We are scarcely friendly."

"I am very glad to hear it," said Miss Jemima, who had been silent during the little controversy that her sister and I had been carrying on. "We have been quite misinformed. The fact is, we thought we might have seen more of you if it had not been for her. And as very few people of her own position in society care to visit her, we thought it a pity she should be your principal friend in the parish."

"Why do they not visit her more?"

"There are strange stories about her, which it is as well to leave alone. They are getting out of date too. But she is not a fit woman to be regarded as the clergyman's friend. There!" said Miss Jemima, as if she had wanted to relieve her bosom of a burden, and had done it.

"I think, however, her religious opinions would correspond with your own, Mr. Walton," said Miss Hester.

"Possibly," I answered, with indifference; "I don't care much about opinion."

"Her daughter would be a nice girl, I fancy, if she weren't kept down by her mother. She looks scared, poor thing! And they say she's not quite—the thing, you know," said Miss Jemima.

"What do you mean, Miss Crowther?"

She gently tapped her forehead with a forefinger.

I laughed. I thought it was not worth my while to enter as the champion of Miss Oldcastle's sanity.

"They are, and have been, a strange family as far back as I can remember; and my mother used to say the same. I am glad she comes to our church now. You mustn't let her set her cap at you though, Mr. Walton. It wouldn't do at all. She's pretty enough, too!"

"Yes," I returned, "she is rather pretty. But I don't think she looks as if she had a cap to set at anybody."

I rose to go, for I did not relish any further pursuit of the conversation in the same direction.

I rode home slowly, brooding on the lovely marvel, that out of such a rough ungracious stem as the Oldcastle family, should have sprung such a delicate, pale, winter-braved flower, as Ethelwyn. And I prayed that I might be honoured to rescue her from the ungenial soil and atmosphere to which the machinations of her mother threatened to confine her for the rest of a suffering life.

MISERERE MEI, DEUS.

O, HEAR ME! Heavenly Father,
For I am sore distrest;
And clouds of darkness gather,
And troubles fill my breast.

My strength is fast declining,
And all my days are spent
In passionate repining
And bitter discontent.

I long for some sure basis
Whereon to rest my feet;
I sigh for some oasis,
For some secure retreat.

And must I sigh for ever,
And sorrow all in vain?
And wilt Thou never, never Have pity on my pain?

I would not now dissemble;
But, striving to speak out,
E'en in my trust I tremble
Upon the brink of doubt—

Not doubting Thee, O Father!
I know how true Thou art;
But fearing, doubting rather
My own deceitful heart.

For idle thoughts come thronging,
And foolish thoughts arise;
And, while I plead my longing,
My longing faints and dies.

Look down in loving-kindness
Upon my mournful case,
And heal my inward blindness,
And all my guilt efface.

Look down on my dejection,
Have mercy on my moan,
And let my first affection
Be henceforth Thine alone!

I long to win Thy favour,
To walk the narrow way;
Against my will I waver,
And go so far astray.

Proud, when I would be humble—
Blind, when I strive to see;
At every step I stumble,
In coming unto Thee.

I do try hard to bridle
The sins that cause my pain;
But all my thoughts are idle,
And all my efforts vain.

I spend my days in grieving
Because of my sad state,
Yet still I go on cleaving
To that I loathe and hate.

My faith decays and dwindles,
My former hopes depart,
And Satan comes and kindles
His wildfires in my heart;

And lo! his fallen angels,
Hearing my fervent prayer,
Robed as Thine own evangels,
Swoop through the viewless air.

They come with passionate pleading;
They come with love-lit eyes;
And leave my bosom bleeding,
For all their words are lies.

I fly—they follow after;
They mock me for my fears;
E'en now their horrid laughter
Is ringing in my ears;

E'en now I quake and quiver,
And fear that I shall fall;
Deliver me! deliver
My faint heart from their thrall.

I am but poor and lowly,
And sunk in sin and guilt;
O, cleanse me, make me holy;
Thou canst, Lord, if Thou wilt.

I come to Thee in meekness,
Thy love alone I plead;
Thou knowest all my weakness,
Give me the strength I need.

Thy loving words thrill through me,
I lift my arms on high;
O, stretch down Thine unto me
And help me or I die.

WILLIAM HENRY HARWOOD.

THE RECHABITES.

BY THE EDITOR.

It is a safe rule to avoid illustrations drawn from ships when preaching at a seaport, or from battle-fields in a garrison, or from pastoral scenes to a congregation of shepherds. The reason of this is obvious. The preacher being much less perfectly acquainted with the subject that furnishes the illustration than his hearers, he is very likely to commit some blunder which the humblest of them can detect; and by this, expose himself and, what is a much more serious evil, his great theme to contempt. So it once fell out with a friend of mine when occupying a pulpit in the Highlands of Forfarshire. He, not unnaturally, thought that the twenty-third Psalm offered peculiarly suitable topics of discourse to the natives of a glen; and having a remarkably good opinion of himself, he never doubted, though a dweller in the plains, that with his knowledge of the habits both of shepherds and their sheep, his sermon would prove a success.

It fell out otherwise; and thus. Among these hills the temperature even in summer is cold rather than hot: full of springs and streams, their herbage is succulent; and it is rarely indeed that their pastures, like those of Italy or Palestine, are so burned by long droughts and scorching suns as to remind one of the Bible figure "withered like grass." This being the case, the sheep of the Grampians are independent of water; nor, though it is abundantly supplied by loch and dark tarn, dancing-streams and green mossy wells where the deer slakes his thirst, do they ever drink—unless, indeed, when they are ill. Ignorant of this, the preacher expatiated on "the still waters" of the Psalm—telling his amazed hearers that the Gospel was as much needed by them as water by their fleecy charges, and exhorting them to seek and enjoy its mercies as they knew their sheep did the river and the mountain streams. Now they knew the reverse of this to be true; and concluded that the preacher must be very ignorant since he did not know what even their children knew; and as they lingered to light their pipes by the church-door, he had the mortification, on retiring, to hear himself and his sermon treated with contempt; one saying to another, Puir bodie, heard ye ever the like o' yon about a sheep drinking!

The habits of the lower animals change to a certain extent with culture and climate. So, indeed, do those of man himself—the natives of hot countries, for example, living chiefly on vegetables, while the Esquimaux, to maintain their vital heat amid the rigours of Greenland, require, as well as use, the fattest animal food—seal, whale, and walrus. So, in consequence of the dry herbage and great heat, the sheep of those countries which supplied the sacred writers with illustrations, freely use water. There, it is indeed necessary to their health and life. Hence it was that a man one day saw a flock approaching the well where he sat way-worn and weary, in a dry parched land, beneath a burning sun. A common sight that; but not so the guardians of this flock—a sight as beautiful as infrequent, seven shepherdesses; sisters all; in the bloom of youth and womanhood. Hand in hand, with arms around each other's necks, these fair ones approach, perhaps unaware of a stranger's presence; and, drawing, fill the troughs that were there, to water their father's sheep. But ere this was done, some men, for the wells of the East were often common property, arrived with their flocks at the same place for the same purpose; and with more of the selfishness of human nature than the courtesy we are accustomed to associate with Eastern manners, they took unmanly advantage of their superior strength to drive the maidens and their flock aside—an act of rudeness, and of plain injustice also, since not they but the shepherdesses had filled the troughs. A banished man, with a price set on his head, and his thoughts far away in the land where his friends and people wore the chains of a galling slavery, the stranger was probably too much occupied with his own sad reflections to take, in the first instance, much interest in the scene. But this rude injustice and oppression rouses a lion within him: and though it was against great odds—he a foreigner and the shepherds natives—he one and they many—Moses, for it is he, steps forward; and with that in his eye, his tones, and bearing that makes the cowards quail and retreat as he advances, he espouses the cause of the weaker party—and rights their wrongs. Fain, but perhaps too modest to ask him to their home, his fair clients content themselves with kind looks and grateful thanks. But full of admiration of his gallant bearing, they relate the whole affair to their father, who instantly sends them back, no unwilling messengers, to invite the stranger to the house—where, conducted by his future wife and her fair train of sisters, Moses found a home. It is to this same house, where he spent forty happy years, that I proceed, to trace the remarkable family whose name stands at the head of this article.

On seeing a girl tending a flock of sheep or herd of cattle, we might conclude that, though presenting with her golden locks, and rosy cheek, and naked feet, a beautiful picture, the nature of her occupation proved the humbleness of her rank. Such an inference would have been wrong in the old times of Scripture. People had more true taste and less false shame in these early days. Laban, for example, was a man of wealth, yet on our first introduction to his daughter, Jacob's future and favourite wife, we find her engaged in the care of her father's flock. "Behold," said the shepherds, speaking of Laban, and directing Jacob's attention to a beautiful maiden who approached them, "Behold, Rachel his daughter cometh with the sheep!" But the head of the house to which Moses was conducted, the father of these fair shepherdesses, held a position much superior to Laban's. Reuel, or Jethro, or Hobab, for he goes by all the three names, appears to have united in himself both the offices of a priest and of a prince in the land of Midian: and thereby affords us a curious and interesting glimpse into the arrangements of society in the patriarchal age. It is probable that at that early period, and among those who, preserving the primitive faith, worshipped one true God, there was no class specially set apart for religious offices—such as the Jews, under the Mosaic dispensation, had in their priests, and we, and all Christian sects, with a few exceptions, have in those called ministers, or clergy. Abraham, for instance, offered sacrifices simply as the head of a family; so did Jacob; and where there was a clan or tribe, the honour and responsibility of discharging such sacred functions belonged probably to its chief, who, after a fashion, united Church and State. Melchizedec did so. He was King of Salem, and also a priest of the Most High God; being honoured and recognised as such on account of his pre-eminent piety throughout the whole land, and by many besides his own subjects. Moses' father-in-law seems to have occupied a similar position. On visiting the Israelites in the wilderness, he offered sacrifice; and in taking part with him in that holy office, Aaron and the elders of Israel virtually acknowledged what might be called his "holy orders." Moses, his son-in-law, the renowned leader of the Hebrew host, himself inspired of God and endowed by nature with the highest qualities of a statesman, paid Jethro yet higher honours—taking counsel of him, and following his advice as how best to lighten the burdens of government, dispense justice to the people, and guide the helm of the Commonwealth.

This distinguished man was the ancestor of the Rechabites—a fact which can be plainly made out by bringing together some scattered parts of Scripture history. It is true that Jethro, though he visited Israel on their approaching his territories during their march through the wilderness, and on that occasion restored his wife and two sons to Moses, did not abide with them; but, taking his departure, bade them farewell, and "went his way into his own land." A branch of his family, however, who were called Kenites, afterwards joined themselves to the Hebrew nation, and being received into its bosom, became partakers of its privileges—an event which is thus recorded in the first chapter of the book of Joshua:—"And the children of the Kenite, Moses' father-in-law, went up out of the city of palm-trees with the children of Judah into the wilderness of Judah, which lieth in the south of Arad: and they went and dwelt among the people." Now the Kenites, being the descendants of Jethro, all that is required to prove that he was the ancestor of the Rechabites is to show their identity with these Kenites, and this is done in the last verse of the second chapter of 1 Chronicles, where it is said, "These are the Kenites that came of Hemath, the father of the house of Rechab."

I have thus traced the stream to its fountain. Sprung from Jethro, the Rechabites had a noble origin; and since it is sometimes with men, as it always is with water, that they rise to the height of the fountain from which they spring, this tribe may have owed somewhat of their superior virtues to their honourable descent. That those who are born of families distinguished for talents and virtue often possess superior properties, is a well-known fact; one recorded in such proverbial expressions as these, "A hawk out of a good nest," "An ounce of blood is better than a pound of bone." If there is so much, as is known to shepherds and sportsmen, in the breed of dogs and horses, much more may we attach value to the breed of men, among whom we often see the qualities of the heart and head descending, by a law more sure than that of entail, from sire to son through succeeding generations. How much of their noble character the Rechabites owed to their noble descent, it were not easy to tell. But they were under the favourable influences which the connection with old and honourable families naturally exerts on the minds of their representatives. Such families are more than merely ornamental to a country, like the old and picturesque castles they inhabit. The deeds which won fame and fortune for the founder of the house, the hoary traditions of its past history, the memory of a long line of distinguished ancestors—famous in public annals for their patriotism, and in the country around for their generous and noble charities, the feeling of having to maintain the high character of an ancient house, these things do, and cannot fail to exert influences for good which are not felt by families that, growing and perhaps destined to decay like mushrooms, sprung up but yesterday, without any ancestral traditions to cherish or ancestral honours to maintain.

THE PECULIAR CUSTOMS WHICH THE RECHABITES PRACTISED.

For a long period after being adopted into the family of Israel, those descendants of Jethro who bore the name of Kenites achieved no distinction: but passed through life like the great mass who eat and drink, marry and give in marriage, get quietly, and many of them usefully, through their duties, and then die off; and, with their memories consigned to the same tomb as their bodies, find no place in story. There was, indeed, one remarkable exception to this, Jael the wife of Heber—she who slew Sisera, the leader of the hosts of Canaan, having enticed him into her tent, and when he slept, with a nail driven through his temples, pinned him dead to the ground. Approve or condemn the part this heroine played in that bloody drama—and for myself I am not prepared either wholly to applaud or wholly to censure her—Heber's wife did a deed that earned for her the thanks of a grateful country, and a place in immortal song. Long years after, on festive and solemn occasions, in cottages where women plied the distaff, and in camps where soldiers met, of her, the pride of her own sex and the envy of the other, they sung, "Blessed above women shall Jael the wife of Heber the Kenite be, blessed shall she be above women in the tent. He asked water, and she gave him milk; she brought forth butter in a lordly dish. She put her hand to the nail, and her right hand to the workmen's hammer; and with the hammer she smote Sisera, she smote off his head, when she had pierced and stricken through his temples. At her feet he bowed, he fell, he lay down: . . . . where he bowed, there he fell down dead."

Jael passes away; and long centuries thereafter another Kenite, equally distinguished for decision of character, steps on the stage. It is Jonadab the son of Rechab; and the star of the Kenite is once more in the ascendant. To such a height had his patriotism, and probably his piety, raised this man in public esteem, that Jehu, the executioner of God's wrath on the house of Ahab, courted his favour. Some men's favour is sunshine to a cause—their mere presence ensures success—and the highest testimony to Jonadab's influence is the anxiety Jehu shows to enlist him on his side, and to Jonadab's piety is the argument Jehu urges: "Come," he says, cloaking, as others have done, selfish ends under the appearance of religion, "Come, see my zeal for the Lord!"

There are some who, through the good influences they have exerted, live long after they are dead. It is said of those who die in the Lord that their works do follow them—but while their good works follow them to heaven, they also remain behind them on earth. Indeed, every one, though only within the walls of a humble cottage, or the narrow limits of a country village, has an influence for good or evil—pebbles as well as rocks, when they fall into a lake, raising circles on its glassy surface; and it is a solemn thing to think that no man lives, or can live to himself, without affecting some for weal or woe. But from time to time, once in a century or so—as might be expected in a world where Nature, though producing many mice, produces but one elephant, at a birth—great men arise to stamp their character on their age and nation,—by their thoughts, the principles they enunciate, the institutions they establish, forming the minds and ruling the destinies of generations that walk above their graves. Such men England had in Latimer and Ridley, in the Puritans of a succeeding age, and in those bold Barons of an earlier era who wrung her Magna Charta from tyrant hands. Such a man Scotland had in Knox, whose grave, like his who also led forth a nation from the House of Bondage, is known to none, but whose life is felt and whose memory is honoured by his countrymen—to whatever shores their energy and education have carried them. Among these moulders of men and makers of public opinion the son of Rechab holds no mean place. No man ever stamped his own features more deeply on the mind of others. With a more enduring impression than can be made on iron or on granite, his descendants took their cast and character from him; religiously observing for three hundred years at least, and for how many more I know not, the two customs he imposed on them—a nomade life and abstinence from all intoxicating drinks.

The instructions of Jonadab to his children, in conformity to which, since example is better than precept, he probably shaped his own practice, were these, as recorded in the thirty-fifth chapter of Jeremiah; "We will drink no wine," said his tribe, "for Jonadab the son of Rechab our father commanded us, saying, Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye, nor your sons, for ever: neither shall ye build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any: but all your days ye shall dwell in tents." Thus stedfastly adhering to a practice which the founder of their house had enjoined, and age had made venerable in their eyes, the Rechabites answered Jeremiah, pushing away the cup he offered. Though not without God's sanction, and indeed in obedience to his express directions, the prophet had put these stout men and their stern principles to no ordinary test. It was in the very temple and house of God the wine was offered. It was poured out by the hand of one of his most pious servants. He was a prophet of the Most High God who invited them to drink—what, apart from the prohibiton of Jonadab, they probably had no objection to use. How natural in these circumstances for them to say—That cannot be forbidden which is offered in holy vessels, nor wrong to which a prophet invites! Yet they put aside the cup, saying, "We have obeyed the voice of Jonadab the son of Rechab our father in all that he hath charged us, to drink no wine all our days, we, our wives, our sons, nor our daughters." Happy family!—of how few, if any, of ours could it be said?—in which for three hundred years there had never been a drunkard to break a mother's heart, to bring shame on those who loved him, to fill a dishonoured grave? Such was Jonadab's—and such how many sad mourners wish that theirs had been! However people may, or may not, think it duty to set the example, and rear their children up in the customs of the Rechabites, they cannot but admit and admire the wisdom of this man. Holding prevention to be better than cure, and that, as all experience proves, it is much easier to keep people out of temptation than save them in it, Jonadab while enjoining his descendants to drink no wine, seeks to protect them from temptation; forbidding them, though they might have used the fruit of the vine in many other ways than drink, to plant a vineyard. Following his example, and for the same end, not a few parents educate their families in habits of the strictest temperance, in the use of no cup stronger than that Which cheers, but not inebriates.

Christians may differ as to the path of duty in that matter. But the general lesson which Jonadab's injunction teaches is one, the truth and importance of which none will question. Peace of conscience and purity of life turn much more on our avoiding than resisting temptations. It is wiser, if it be possible, to flee than to fight them: a great truth taught us by a higher authority than Jonadab. It stands embodied in the Lord's Prayer, in that, not the least important of its petitions, Lead us not into temptation!

The second injunction of Jonadab was no less faithfully observed by his posterity. Types of man on this earth, and true representatives of Abraham—from whose loins they sprung, through Keturah, his second wife—they were strangers and sojourners in the land. Camping among the hills or grassy plains of Judah, they lived a wandering life: a shepherd race, who moved about from pasture to pasture with the flocks that formed their wealth; neither enervated by the luxuries, nor corrupted by the vices of cities. Virtuous in their habits, they were simple in their manners. Yet shrewd withal: quite able, which many are not, to hold fast their principles without riding them to the death. For example, notwithstanding their ancient customs, and the commandment of Jonadab, and their respect for his authority, they abandoned their tents; and fleeing the open country, took refuge within Jerusalem when the Chaldeans invaded the land. God's laws admit of no exceptions. But, neither bigots nor fanatics, the Rechabites rightly judged that man's do; and, as they were ready to dwell in houses when it would have been death to dwell in tents, they would have been equally ready, I have no doubt, to violate in the letter, though not in the spirit, the other law of Jonadab—to drink wine in a case of clear necessity, where its use was judged indispensable to the preservation of health or life.

As to the history of these two remarkable customs, it was probably the dissolute manners of his age which induced Jonadab to institute them. Considerations of expediency may make that a duty at one time which is not so at another. Medicine—to take an illustration from it—is not meat, yet the body is often in such an abnormal condition, so unhealthy, as to require its use; and, when the air is charged with the subtle poison of disease, precautions are necessary to fortify us against its attacks which were superfluous in happier times. Such were, perhaps, the grounds on which the son of Rechab acted. A sagacious and patriotic man, he probably instituted these customs to protect his family and their descendants from the general corruption of the age—the vices that reigned in cities, and the drunkenness that, prevailing everywhere, was undermining the prosperity and happiness, the health and lives of thousands. The principle on which he acted may be misapplied, yet the Bible sanctions and enforces it; saying, Go thou and do likewise. Looking to the good of others, the glory of God, and the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom, Paul says—and the apostle's is a statement that admits of a wide application—All things are lawful for me, but all things are not expedient.

THE BLESSING ENJOYED BY THE RECHABITES.

There are few, if any, estates in our country now in possession of the direct, lineal male descendants of those who owned them three hundred years ago. Old families die out; their properties pass into the hands of aliens, or of collateral heirs; and whether it is a royal palace, or a noble's castle, or a simple mansion-house, the place that once knew them knows them no more. But for three whole centuries Jonadab the son of Rechab never wanted a man to stand up before the Lord. His descendants had seen successive dynasties on the throne; ancient houses, crushed by misfortune, crumble into ruins; honourable families sink into mean obscurity; and many perish altogether in the course of time, and under the ravages of disease and wars. However, the changes that swept away these had but swept over them, as the waves over a rock which, so soon as they have burst, emerges firm and fixed from the cloud of spray. A remarkable result, certainly, and one which becomes remarkably instructive when we look to its causes. These belong both to Heaven and earth; in other words, this result is due both to the Divine blessing and to the action of certain natural agents.

First, their wandering habits, their life passed in the open country and in tents, was calculated to preserve and prolong the existence of this family. No mode of life is perhaps so accordant with our natural instincts as was theirs. It offered, as they roamed from pasture to pasture, constant change of scenery, and in that the greatest pleasure of travelling—a balm to grief, a perpetual feast to man's love of novelty, and an innocent stimulant of equal advantage to mind and body. How strong the attractions of such a life are admits of many illustrations. Let me adduce two—the one a curse, the other a fact. The curse is one employed by the Tartars, themselves nomades, a wandering shepherd race. The only one, indeed, they are accustomed to use, it proves how much people reared to a roaming life come to love it, and how miserable they think any other—the direst wish which a Tartar pronounces against his enemy being, May you live in one place, and work like a Russian! And the fact that proves the charms of such a life is the all but insuperable difficulty of weaning gipsies and other such wanderers from their old habits, notwithstanding the extreme hardships they entail in our uncertain climate. I knew a boy, for instance, belonging to this race, whom his parents had been induced to leave with a kind, Christian family, under whose roof he enjoyed many advantages—a comfortable home, good and regular meals, instruction in letters and in habits of honest industry. Yet, notwithstanding these, and after being to appearance tamed, so strong were the charms of his old life that he seized the first opportunity of returning to it, like the young chamois which a shepherd of the Alps caught, and, hanging a bell from its neck, reared with his goats. It seemed to be quite domesticated; going and returning with the herd, till a day when it happened to hear the cry of its own wild race amid the mountain rocks. The creature started, and listened. For some moments it stood in an attitude of eager attention, trembling with intense excitement; and then, all of a sudden bounding from the meadow, it sprung into the cliff, and leaping from crag to crag, vanished among the heights where it joined its kindred, and was never more seen; though for years thereafter its bell was often heard tinkling among the rocks, and the mists that shrouded them.

The most consonant, as it thus appears, a wandering life is to our natural instincts, it is on that and many other accounts the most conducive to good health, and long life, and the permanent existence of such families as practise it—at least in a climate so fine and under circumstances so favourable as those of the Rechabites were. Towns have many advantages; and who would find the highest types of man, intellectually, morally, or spiritually, must seek them among citizens. Yet through their luxurious and unnatural habits of life, the wear and tear and turmoil of business, their vitiated air, and especially their vices, towns are great devourers of human life. They waste it; nor, as statistics prove, could large cities increase, or even keep up their numbers, without a constant immigration from rural districts. Men get dwarfed, dwindle away, and die, more or less like many trees, amid the smoke of towns; and there can be no doubt that the tented life and roaming habits of the Rechabites under the genial skies and amid the pleasant scenes of Palestine materially contributed, under the blessing of God, to preserve their race.

But, secondly, there can be as little doubt that their habits of temperance, carried to the extent of what is called Total Abstinence, so far as natural causes were considered, contributed also, and still more, to the same result. It is certain that the strongest man the world has seen drank nothing stronger than water. His cup was filled at the crystal spring; and it was water, not wine, the bloody jaw-bone yielded to restore his strength. Though Samson's was undoubtedly a case out of the common course of nature, he may have owed his strength in some measure to his abstinence. It is a well-established fact, at any rate, that the ancient athletes, as do their modern successors who engage in pedestrian, wrestling, fighting feats, rigorously abstain from the use of stimulants; regarding them as not fitted to increase, but to impair their strength. And whatever reasons people may find for the use of these, there is no doubt that the simpler our fare, if nutritious, the better—those having most chance of enjoying robust health, long life, and a green old age who follow the habits of the Rechabites, and abjure all intoxicants. I could prove that; but that needs no proof which the highest medical authorities affirm, and no well-informed, impartial man attempts now-a-days to deny. Thus in those customs which distinguished the descendants of Rechab from others, we find two causes that help to account for the fact that while other families perished from the face of the earth, they endured—evergreen and immortal in their virtues; flourishing amid the nation's decay; defying alike all changes of fortune, the ravages of disease, and the arm of death to extirpate and extinguish them.

I see more, however, in the story of the Rechabites than a testimony to the advantages of simple manners and sober habits, in favour of what an eminent medical authority called the three great physicians, namely Air, Exercise, and Water. It was not the material or moral advantages which they found in these simple and temperate habits—though they might have urged these—which they gave to Jeremiah as their reasons for declining his invitation. "We will drink no wine," they said. And why? They did not say, Because we think it a sin; nor because we, who do not use it, enjoy robuster health, longer lives, clearer heads, lighter hearts, and heavier purses than those who do; nor because we stand in fear that our example might lead some to use wine who would not or could not do so without abusing it. The simple ground on which they placed their refusal was the respect they felt and the obedience they owed to parental authority. They say, "for Jonadab the son of Rechab our father commanded us;" and again, "Thus have we obeyed the voice of Jonadab the son of Rechab in all that he hath charged us." It was on this account that they, on the one hand, preserved the custom of their ancestors, and on this account also, on the other hand, that God preserved them—saying, by the mouth of Jeremiah, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, and kept all his precepts, and done according unto all that he hath commanded you: therefore thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man to stand before me for ever."

It is a dull ear which does not catch in these words an echo, as from the rocks of Sinai, of the commandment, "Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee." Eminent examples of filial piety, how might that law have been inscribed, as their appropriate motto, on the banners of the house of Rechab? Living in remarkable accordance with its precept, they were a remarkable monument to the truth of its promise. Distinguished from all around them by their superior respect for parental authority, they were equally distinguished by their happier fortune; while others perished, their days were long upon the land which the Lord their God had given them. That law is one of the Ten which, written by God's own finger, and spoken in thunder tones by his own awful voice, were separated and distinguished from those Mosaic ordinances, the shadows of good things to come, that were buried in the grave of Christ. Like the other nine it was fulfilled, not interred by the Redeemer. Like all other parts of the Decalogue, it is of permanent authority; and God is still making good its promise in the well-doing, the health and wealth, and prosperity of thousands who honoured their parents however humble they might be, cherished them, and yielded to father and mother the reverence that was their due.

"My son," says Solomon, "hear the instruction of thy father, and forsake not the law of thy mother, for they shall be an ornament of grace unto thy head, and chains about thy neck." No man ever found himself the worse for taking that advice, nor is there a circle however limited but can show cases illustrative of the blessing that follows honour paid to father and mother. But, leaving these, let me adduce an example of this on a scale of no ordinary grandeur. There is a nation which numbers both more people and more years than any other on earth, ancient or modern, dead or living. The Chinese—for of them I speak—can trace their national existence to a period not far removed from the days of Noah. They appear in the dawn of history and earliest ages of antiquity; cultivating the arts when our forefathers, and those of all other existing nations, were barbarians. Unchanged amid perpetual and universal change, they saw the Egyptian, Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, and Roman empires rise and fall, flourish and decay; and now, a teeming population, they this day cultivate the very fields their ancestors ploughed when the story of the flood was fresh, and men, who heard it from the lips of Noah or his sons, told how the windows of heaven and the fountains of the great deep were opened. Now, though Pagans, two peculiarities have distinguished the Chinese from other pagan nations. Unlike the Greeks, the natives of Hindoostan, the Romans, and other heathens, they, though practising vice, have never deified it; and, secondly, they have placed reverence for parents, and obedience to their authority, at the head of all the virtues. When parents die their children even worship them; and while they live, yield such blind submission to their will that there is hardly a crime a child will not commit at their bidding. Filial reverence, in fact, is the redeeming and prominent feature of their character—one that has distinguished them as much from the nations which they have seen grow up and perish, as the oval contour of their heads and oblique position of their eyes. The connection between a national virtue and a national vitality so remarkable, I cannot regard as altogether accidental—one of the curious coincidences that occasionally occur. Illustrating in their lives the precept, they also illustrate in their fortunes the promise of the Fifth Commandment; so that, from this nation, numerous above all others for its population, and venerable above all others for its hoar antiquity, I seem to hear the words God sounded forth from Sinai, "Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

As unquestionably illustrating and enforcing this commandment, the history of the Rechabites at any rate is at all times instructive, and in these times peculiarly seasonable. Our age has its peculiar features; but reverence for authority is certainly not one of them. Indeed it bodes ill for our country, and for the future fortunes of America especially, not that kings are no longer "hedged round with divinity," but that a father's word does not carry the weight, nor his presence command the respect, which once belonged to them. The age is out of joint. Children are little men and little women. Whether it be due to a system of education that, like a hot-house, unduly forces the growth of youth, or to that early independence which children attain through the manufactures and machinery that yield them wages sufficient for their support, or to the operation of political and ecclesiastical causes; whether it be due to one, or to another, or to all these influences combined, the tendency of this age is to throw off authority, Divine as well as human. The daring manner in which many treat sacred things—boldly intruding within the veil of the temple, sitting in presumptuous judgment on God's character, questioning his providence, setting limits to his authority, handling his inspired Word as they would the pages of a common history, and by their own little line measuring Him who hath measured out the heavens and laid the foundations of the earth, these are the developments of a spirit which begins by disowning the authority of man, and ends by disowning that of God. When filial reverence is lost, and, despising the judgment of the wise and venerable, men say, "Let us break their bonds, and cast their cords from us," it looks like the beginning of the end. The rent that goes through the hearth-stone has a tendency to extend itself into the foundations of all social order and true piety. Who does not reverence a father on earth is not likely to reverence our Father in heaven. Who does not love a mother will not love Jesus Christ. Let the subject be looked into, and I dare to say it will be found that there is a far closer connection than what lies in their being printed on the same page and embraced in the same verse between the two great clauses of this beautiful commandment, Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honour the face of an old man, and fear thy God. In the words of the hymn,

> A father's voice with reverence we
> On earth have often heard;
> The Father of our spirits now
> Demands the same regard.

BISHOP HALL AND HIS "CONTEMPLATIONS."

Cecil has mentioned somewhere, that he had a shelf in his library on which he placed books that were esteemed by him of highest merit, and which he had resolved to make his companions for life. He was very slow in elevating a book to this position, but when it had once obtained such select pre-eminence, he was still more slow in removing it. On this honourable elevation, we can scarcely doubt, he had placed the "Contemplations on Historical Passages of the Old and New Testament," by Bishop Hall. For we find him alluding to his writings with genial admiration; and this was emphatically a book not to be read once, and then handed over to cobwebs and dust, or turned by the help of the bookbinder into a mere library ornament, but to be chosen as a life associate, and to be laid open beside the sacred volume itself when its historical parts were studied, that it might help the reader, by its quaint originality and proverbial wisdom, in extracting the honey out of the inspired narrative. It was no rapid and unequal production, but the slow and careful growth of thirty years, the greater part of it having first been amplified into sermons; and then, as he informs the reader in one of his delightfully garrulous notices, he "gathered the quintessence of those larger discourses into these forms of meditation which he sees." It is gold not in the ore, but in the wedge.

But while his "Contemplations" are his magnum opus, and are as popular at this hour as they were two centuries ago, they are not the only writings of Bishop Hall which give him unquestioned right to take first rank among our English Christian classics. The latest edition of his collected works by Mr. Pratt, consists of ten goodly volumes in which there are many other compositions which neither the world nor the Church will soon willingly let die. In what circumstances, and under what influences, some of the chief of these were produced, will appear from a few short notices of his life.

Joseph Hall, the son of parents "honest and well-allowed," was born July 1, 1574, at Bristow Park, in the parish of Ashby-de-la-Zouch, Leicestershire. His father held such an office of trust and respectable emolument under the Earl of Huntingdon, as justified his honourable ambition to give to one of his children the advantage of a university education. His mother was one of those rare women who, by their wisdom and ungrudging assiduity in the training of their families, make the world their debtors. With a body that was always weak, and a mind inhabiting the frail tenement that was usually sorrowful, Winifred Bambridge, with her "looks serene and holy," produced lasting impressions on her son, that were prized more than all learning, and the boy did not shrink from the guidance of her gentle hand although, when he looked up, it was often into a pensive countenance. With the exception of Cowper's inimitable lines on receiving the portrait of his mother, there is nothing in our literature that contains a more beautiful testimony of filial admiration than that which was borne in after days by this grateful son to his sainted mother. "Were it not for my interest in nature, I durst say that neither Aleth, the mother of that just Honour of Clareval, nor Monica, nor any other of those pious matrons anciently famous for devotion, need to disdain her admittance to comparison. . . . So had she profited in the school of Christ, that it was hard for any friend to come from her discourse no whit holier. How often have I blessed the memory of those divine passages of experimental divinity which I have heard from her mouth. What day did she pass without a large task of private devotion, whence she would still come forth with a countenance of undissembled mortification. Never any lips have read to me such feeling lectures of piety; neither have I known any soul that more accurately practised them than her own. Shortly, for I can hardly take off my pen from so exemplary a subject, her life and death were saintlike."

He received his elementary education in the public school of his native town, where having spent some years "not altogether indiligently under the ferule of such masters as the place afforded," and having, by the age of fifteen, attained to some competent ripeness, it was not without much generous entreaty on the part of an elder brother, and considerable family pinchings, that he was entered as a student at Emanuel College, Cambridge. His mind was suited to the new atmosphere into which it was brought, so that it required no effort for him to appreciate the learned and tranquil leisure, the healthy discipline, the venerable structures, and the gathering renown of his university. But his first two years proving beyond the proportion of his father's means, "whose not very large cistern had to feed many pipes besides this," and this weariness of expense being acted on by the counsel of unwise friends, led to his withdrawal by his father from Cambridge, with a view to his becoming master in the school where he had formerly been a scholar. It was a heavy blow to the ardent student, like tearing him from the arms of a second mother. But his visible dejection and discovered gifts raised up for him in a distant relative an unhoped-for benefactor, who, accommodating his liberal help to his father's lessening means, soon reinstated him in that cherished seat of learning. These streams continued to flow steadily for four years to come; and by the time that they were exhausted, and he had begun to meditate a removal, another of those providences which his devout heart delighted to mark, unexpectedly opened his way to a fellowship, retained him within those walls on which his name was one day to shed an enduring lustre, and saved him from the great evil of a premature entrance on the Christian ministry. "Then was I with a cheerful unanimity chosen into that society, which, if it had any equals, I dare say had none beyond it for good order, studious carriage, strict government, austere piety,—in which I spent six or seven years more with such contentment as the rest of my life hath in vain striven to yield. Now was I called to public disputations often with no ill success; for never durst I appear in any of those exercises of scholarship, till I had from my knees looked up to heaven for a blessing, and renewed my actual dependence upon that Divine hand. In this while, two years together was I chosen to the rhetoric lectures in the public schools, where I was encouraged with a sufficient frequence of auditors; but finding that well-applauded work somewhat out of my way, not without a secret blame of myself for so much excursion, I fairly gave up that task in the midst of those acclamations, to a worthy successor, Dr. Dod, and betook myself to those serious studies which might fit me for that high calling whereunto I was destined. Wherein, after I had carefully bestowed myself for a time, I took the boldness to enter into sacred orders, the honour whereof having once attained, I was no niggard of that talent which my God had entrusted to me; preaching often, as occasion was offered, both in country villages abroad, and at home in the most awful auditory of the university."

It was during the later years of his Cambridge life that he produced his Satires, which were afterwards republished under the title of "Virgedemiarum, or Six Bundles of Rods," and were sufficient of themselves to secure him an honourable place on the roll of English poets. Their popularity has been marred by his imitating the obscurity and abruptness of the Latin models, as well as by his needless adoption of many of the obsolete words of Chaucer, for wit and satire lose much of their effect when they require a commentary. They are then like some explosive substance which has been exposed to damp. But the keen penetration of character which his Satires manifest, the lively and vigorous colouring with which he holds up to the age its form and pressure, exposing the inane frivolities of contemporary literature, and punishing contemporary vices, together with the point of his style, and the musical cadence of his numbers, were such as to make Pope wish that he had known his writings earlier, and to remind another equally competent judge of some of the best passages in Dryden. His own lines have well described the legitimate province of Moral Satire; and he exemplified his own ideal; for unlike the satirists of a later age, he never sought to gratify private resentment by personalities, or by the excessive glow of his pictures excited the very passions which he condemned.

> "The satire should be like the porcupine
> That shoots sharp quills out in each angry line,
> And wounds the blushing cheek and fiery eye
> Of him that heares and readeth guiltily."

At a considerably later period of his life, Mr. Hall attempted a "Metaphrase of certain of the Psalms." But his success was indifferent, and the public reception of his attempt chilling. It may have afforded some solace to his mortification at this failure, to know that even his great contemporary, Milton, found himself unequal to the task of transfusing into fitting English numbers the inspired odes of David. But the man has probably yet to be born who shall express in suitable metrical language the lyric energy and living fire of those Hebrew bards. It would require as rare a combination of native genius, acquired learning, and emotional piety to translate the Psalms as to interpret the Apocalypse. "The harp of David," it has been happily said, "still hangs upon the willows, and disdains the touch of any hand less skilful than its own."

And now he "did but wait where and how it would please his God to employ him." And having the rectory of Halsted in the "sweet and civil country of Suffolk," earnestly tendered him by Lady Drury, he entered, about the age of twenty-eight, upon the regular duties of a ministry, after which his heart had long yearned. After having almost rebuilt his house, which he found in a ruinous condition, "the uncouth solitariness of his life," he tells us with a quaint felicity which any other words would alter for the worse, "drew his thoughts, after two years, to condescend to the necessities of a married state. And being commended to a Miss Winniff, of Bretenham, and convinced of the many virtues that lodged in that seemly presence, he offered her his hand, and at last, upon due prosecution, happily prevailed, enjoying the comfortable society of that meet help for the space of forty-nine years."

After some years, his quiet and congenial labours at Halsted were not unpleasantly interrupted for a time, by an invitation from Sir Edmund Bacon to accompany him in his travels on the Continent to the Spa of Ardennes. The fascination of such a request was irresistible to a mind like his so capable of shrewd observation, of storing itself with undying pictures, and of turning facts into thoughts. In a letter of advices to the young Earl of Essex at a later period, he showed how well he understood the uses of foreign travel. "Think it not enough that you see, or can say you have seen, strange things of nature or event: it is a vain and dead travel that rests in the eye or the tongue. All is but lost, unless your busy mind shall from the body that it sees, draw forth some quintessence of observation wherewith to inform and enrich itself. There is nothing can quit the cost and labour of travel but the gain of wisdom."

Besides, he desired to look upon Popery, not as he had seen it in England, but in its true spirit and fully developed proportions where it reigned. We wish we had space to quote in full the letter in which he describes his gay silken disguise assumed to escape the serious inconvenience and hazard of being known as a Protestant divine,—his keen disputes with the famous Jesuit Costerus and others at Brussels, in which his learning and dialectic skill as well as his suspiciously good Latin almost made his lay-disguise too thin for him, and more than once awakened the alarm of his patron for his safety,—and his eager witnessing of a Romish procession in honour of John the Baptist at Antwerp, when his curiosity would have drawn him into danger "through his willing unreverence, had not the hulk of a tall Brabanter, behind whom he stood in the corner of the street, shadowed him from notice."

It was while wandering among the solitary hills of Ardennes, where other men of genius have since received inspiration, that Mr. Hall finished his "Three Centuries of Meditations;" a work which, while indicating the growth of his devotional spirit, revealed to the world his remarkable gifts of compact brevity and ethical eloquence. It was on account of this work that he began to be styled by his contemporaries the "English Seneca," a designation in which the compliment was fully as great to the Roman moralist as to the English divine. We are tempted to quote one of those golden sayings: "As there is a foolish wisdom so there is a wise ignorance, in not prying into God's ark, nor enquiring into things not revealed. I would fain know all that I need and all that I may: I leave God's secrets to himself. It is happy for me that God makes me of his Court, though not of his Council."

His labours at Halsted were soon found to be much more abundant than his remuneration, for he was "obliged to write books in order to buy books." His straitened circumstances, coupled with the knowledge that a portion of his rightful emoluments was annually appropriated by his patron, made him willing to accept the living of Waltham, which was pressed upon him by Lord Denny, and "whose conditions were, like the mover of them, free and bountiful." Upon this new sphere of his ministry, which he entered in 1612, and where he continued for two-and-twenty years, he concentrated all the strength of his now ripened powers and of his pastoral affection, so that even the repeated requests of the "sweet Prince Henry," then the pride and hope of the nation, to become his resident chaplain at Court, were not able to withdraw him from "his Waltham," —"where in a constant course I preached a long time, as I had done also at Halsted before, thrice in the week. Yet never durst I climb into the pulpit to preach any sermon, whereof I had not before, in my poor and plain fashion, penned every word in the same order wherein I hoped to deliver it, although in the expression I listed not to be a slave to syllables."

The picture which he has given in one of his letters, of his life of sacred study and quiet order in the arrangement and economy of his time, in which he could "all day make himself music (as ringers do), with the changes," has become one of the gems of epistolary literature, and presents a strange contrast to the life of many a minister in modern times, whose temper is so often fretted and his weeks consumed by the ceaseless worry of miscellaneous engagements and frivolous interruptions. It is curious to take a letter of Dr. Chalmers from Glasgow, in which he complains of a hundred calls in a week, and to mark what a difference there is between the pastoral experiences of the seventeenth century and ours. Can anything exceed in holy and tranquil beauty Mr. Hall's description of one of his Sundays at Waltham?

"Such are my common days; but God's day calls for another respect. The same sun arises on this day and enlightens it: yet because the Sun of righteousness arose upon it, and gave a new life to the world in it, and drew the strength of God's moral precept upon it, therefore justly do we sing with the Psalmist, 'This is the day which the Lord hath made.' Now I forget the world, and, in a sort, myself, and deal with my wonted thoughts as great men do who, at some times of their privacy, forbid the access of all suitors. Prayer, meditation, reading, hearing, preaching, singing, good conference, are the business of this day, which I dare not bestow on any work or pleasure but heavenly. I hate superstition on the one side, and looseness on the other; but I find it hard to offend in too much devotion, easy in profaneness. The whole week is sanctified by this day; and according to my care of this day, is my blessing on the rest."

It must have been during his long pastorate at Waltham that Mr. Hall prepared his "Explications of Hard Texts of the whole of Divine Scripture," a work which must have carried him over every sentence of the Bible. It gives results rather than the processes of learned and devout inquiry by which they have been reached; but there is always evidence of the previous mental toil, in the well-weighed words and the wonderful clearness and condensation of phrase in which the results are given. The book has the rare merit of offering help where it is really needed, unlike many commentaries which too often amplify what is plain, but desert you when their help would be most welcome, reminding us of a recent experience on a pass in the Alps, where the rope that had guided us when the path was easy, disappeared beneath the snow when we reached the most steep and slippery edge of the precipice.

On three occasions during his loved pastorate at Waltham, Mr. Hall was summoned to exchange his quiet labours for the discharge of high public duties. First, to accompany the Earl of Doncaster on an important embassy to France; next, to follow King James into Scotland, for the purpose of disposing her people to episcopacy—a reluctant service, in which, while winning the respect of her clergy for his moderation and wisdom, he did little to unsettle their Presbyterian preferences. And his third public commission was in 1618, to attend as a deputy from England, along with Davenant and others, at the famous Synod of Dort, in order to assist in adjusting the differences which had begun to rend the Church of the Netherlands on the "five busy Arminian points." His solid learning, Christian moderation, and perspicuous eloquence, drew around him the universal respect of that great ecclesiastical assembly, a respect which was formally and fitly conveyed to him by the scholarly Heinsius. But the humid atmosphere of Dort and the ceaseless noises of its garrison robbing him of his wonted sleep, drove him first to the Hague and then to England, where he soon found the controversy transferred to his own Church, and "scorched himself a little with the flame which he desired to quench." Next to the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, this Synod of Dort was perhaps the most important that had been held by Protestants since the age of the Reformation. Its history has never yet been written as it ought to be written. We have, indeed, respectable chronicles and dry narratives, but no such living picture as makes us see the men and watch their keen dialectics and clash of arms. Why should not some one yet do for this Synod what Bungêner has not unsuccessfully attempted for the Council of Trent?

Seven years after his return from the Netherlands, Dr. Hall was appointed Bishop of Exeter, and in 1641 he was translated to the See of Norwich. But the times of the Parliament and the Commonwealth had now come, when the vessel of the Church was exposed to a lengthened storm, and those who stood in its high places were sure to be the greatest sufferers by the tempest. In the very thick of the commotion he might have been seen measuring arms not ingloriously with Milton. His sufferings increased with the throes and shakings of the ecclesiastical structure which he defended. Having joined with the prelates who protested against the validity of all laws made during their forced absence from Parliament, he was committed to the Tower, where he remained a prisoner for five months. Immediately after his liberation he returned to Norwich, where, with scarcely an interval of rest, he was driven from his palace, and both his episcopal revenues and his personal property sequestrated. Retiring to Higham, a little village in the neighbourhood of Norwich, he leased a small farm, and lived on a pittance that was allowed him from his formerly princely income. On occasion of the death of his wife, the meet help of nearly half a century, he wrote his "Songs in the Night," which is indeed music out of the depths, and has revived the fainting spirit of many a mourner from that hour to the present. Suffering and increasing infirmity never deprived him of his cheerfulness, or of his charity. When disabled from preaching by age, or hindered by legal prohibitions, he was content to sit at the feet of the youngest of his disciples, as diligent a hearer as he had been a preacher. At length, at the venerable age of 82, on September 8, 1656, he fell asleep.

During more than one half of what may be termed the intellectual and active portion of his life, he had been engaged in slowly preparing and piling up his "Contemplations," which were to be the crown of his literary and theological toils, and to make his name precious and fragrant to the universal Church. Those who are most familiar with these remarkable compositions, will wonder least at their undiminished popularity alike with the learned and the unlearned. It is not one but many great qualities that account for this. There are pithy apophthegm and sententious proverb, vivid pictures of scenes, life-like delineations of character, frequent flashes of original thought, unexpected lessons drawn from apparently barren incidents, so that the seeming desert blossoms as the rose, a kind of intuitive penetration into the meaning of texts, as if he often knew of some secret and shorter path to it, and seer-like bursts of devotion. These are the qualities that render the work, in some respects, unique in our religious literature; while the skill with which he handles the English tongue, not simply as a master, but as a magician, makes us feel at times as if a style like his had become one of the lost arts. And yet even the "Contemplations" may be said to be an unfinished work, for it stops at the end of the Gospel history. One is apt to wish that he had continued his meditations through the "Acts of the Apostles," and to imagine how he would have mused on the scenes of Pentecost, or reflected the grandeur and the pathos of Stephen's martyrdom, or presented the varied and glowing lessons from the conscience-terrors of Felix, or the hesitancy of King Agrippa, or the shipwreck of Paul, or the incident with the viper on the shore of Melita. As it is, how few authors have left behind them to the Church of all times so rich and rare a legacy.

THE DRAUGHT OF FISHES.

"O WOE is me that, face to face,
The Lord of Hosts have seen!
How shall I stand in holy place
With heart and lips unclean?"

So oft of old cried out, afraid,
The chosen of His Word,
When bright before them shone display'd
The angel of the Lord.

And such, upon Capernaum's lake,
The fisher's first dismay,
Ere Jesus call'd him thence to take
Henceforth a nobler prey.

Amazed, that Holy One he own'd,
At whose mysterious will
The obedient shoals came crowding round,
His empty nets to fill.

And, as in that broad flood of light
Which leaves no nook conceal'd,
He sees in all its doleful plight
His own dark heart reveal'd;

All-prostrate, "Leave, O Lord," he cries
"A sinful soul like mine!"

Too vivid gleam'd for mortal eyes
The rays of light divine.

Yet, fear not—conscious what thou art;
No Sinai's awful blaze
Strikes terror through a hopeless heart
Beneath the Saviour's gaze.

Now art thou fittest to forsake
Thy long-plied earthly toil,
And in the nets of Christ to take
The Heaven-directed spoil.

For who shall make to hearts that melt
Their balm of healing known,
Like them whose souls have deepest felt
The evil of their own?

Or who, while others deem it vain,
Shall, patient, labour on,
And, cheerful, fling the net again,
When every hope seems gone

Like him who firmest holds the thought
That not by human skill
Souls to his outspread net are brought,
But by his Master's will?

CHASTISEMENT.

If it is possible in the twenty-third Psalm to trace the outlines of David's history, it is equally possible in the third verse to guess the workings of his mind. He had been exulting in his assurance of the good Shepherd's love. His lips were yet trembling with that exquisite chant of praise for pastures green and waters still, when suddenly (it may be) the thought flashed across him—"Has it been always so?" and while memory recalled the interruption of mercy, conscience betrayed the cause. "Were the pastures green and the waters still when Bathsheba's child died; or when Absalom drove me from my home and my kingdom, and I went up Olivet barefoot, weeping as I went up? when confusion covered my face, and reproach broke my heart, and all God's waves and billows went over me? No: yet it was through my own sin, not through the unfaithfulness of God. I had gone astray like a lost sheep, to slake my thirst with draughts of guilty pleasure in the way of my own heart; and the rough road by which He brought me back was his way of bringing me out of my sin. It was to restore my soul, and to lead me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake."

Nothing so much tests our knowledge of God, or our actual standing-place in his kingdom, as the way in which we interpret chastisement. Those who are altogether without God in the world are disposed to look on it as an unkind and unaccountable interference with their happiness; an evidence, indeed, of Divine power, but not of Divine goodness. They do not hear in it a kind voice saying to them, "Turn ye unto me." They do not bow humbly to the rod, which deals its stripes in this life, only that thereby they may be spared in the next. There is suffering, but no healing process afterwards; a sense of uneasiness, but no real sorrow for sin. Who can wonder then that affliction hardens instead of softening them; that, instead of coming out into the light of the reconciled face of God, in the spirit of a penitent child, they go back, like Pharaoh, into their Egyptian darkness with hearts of stone!

David, however, in a very different spirit accepts that chastisement of which, with all his prosperity, he had as large a share as most men. He connects it with the Providence of God, he beholds in it the purpose of God, he accepts it as the mercy of God, he recognises in it the character of God. And this, his explanation of it, teaches us that for Christians there are two aspects in which it may be profitably considered: the one, what God means in it with respect to us; the other, what He means in it with respect to Himself. With respect to us He means restoration and holiness; restoration in the case of our having gone back: "He restoreth my soul." Holiness, as the unvarying and ultimate end of all his dealings with us, whom He has from the beginning chosen "to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth:" "He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake."

The office of a shepherd is not only to guide and protect, and provide for the sheep, but also to go after them when they have strayed away. Our Lord, in the first of the three parables in the fifteenth chapter of St. Luke, appeals to this as to an universally recognised habit among men. "What man of you, having an hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it?" But Ezekiel assigns this office to Messiah. "For thus saith the Lord God; Behold I, even I, will both search my sheep, and seek them out. As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered; so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day" (xxxiv. 11, 12).

Restoration implies wandering or backsliding, and is applicable either to a case of lapse, where there has been a real, though not necessarily a visible falling away from God; or to a besetting sin, which is seriously affecting the spiritual state, and, like a rank and noxious weed, must instantly and at any cost be cut down to the roots. Of actual falls from God, open or secret, David himself is a memorable instance. When the man after God's own heart went astray, God indeed restored him, but it was with pangs and convulsions, as when a man all but drowned struggles back from suspended animation into life. The greater the height he had reached, the deeper his fall from it; the more marked his holiness, the more scandalous his sin. If ever man suffered in this life the temporal consequences of guilt, it was David. Yet there are other kinds of falling away than his. Many, whose hearts are as much estranged from God as the Psalmist's, are never surprised into an outburst of crime, simply because they are too cold or too cautious to commit themselves publicly. Nay, their secret sins may be of quite another kind to his; sins, it may be, for which they may even gain credit; "men will praise thee, when thou doest well unto thyself:" yet sins far more abhorred by Him who can weigh motives and pity weakness; and known only to Him to whom all hearts are open, and from whom no secrets are hid.

We have an instance of this kind in the Church of Sardis. "I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead." Stronger language than this could hardly be used of any within the kingdom. Yet it describes the actual condition of thousands upon thousands, who have lost their first love, and are fallen back from their early aspirations; who pray, and yet restrain prayer; who open their Bible, and sit with it before them, but in no sense love it as their necessary food; who give away, but never really deny themselves of anything for Christ's sake, and in whom a steadily lessening zeal for God, and a wofully diminished anxiety for the welfare of others, indicate but too surely the ebb of their inner life.

Human judgment, indeed, must not presume to penetrate either into the recesses of a fellow-sinner's conscience, or into the possible meaning of the righteous chastisements of God. Yet, perhaps, these are cases which more than any require the knife and the cautery of severe affliction; and when such a soul, writhing in its misery, bitterly complains that its punishment is more than it can bear, the not yet drugged conscience finds a ready answer. "Is there not a cause?" For when sin comes to a head, and discharges itself from the system in a complete though in a virulent outbreak, the scandal to the Church may be greater, but the peril to the sinner is less. Fever is often preferable to paralysis. The loss of a limb may be a less severe shock in the end than the gradual corruption of the blood or the steady enfeebling of the vital powers. When a soul is asleep, yet dreams that it is awake; when the discharge of religious duties, the use of religious privileges, the companionship of religious people, and the uttering of religious phrases condone to the self-complacent soul for chilled love to men and suspended intercourse with God, it is not a soft and gentle voice that will whisper it out of its death sleep: maybe only a life-long sorrow will bring it back to the Shepherd's arms.

But over and above the instances of a public fall or a secret decay, there is the yet more frequent instance of special acts of sin visited with special acts of punishment; the act indicating the habit; the punishment not only suited to the sin, but in proportion to it; the purpose of God being, not to cast off and destroy, but to admonish and restore. Rebekah, Jacob, Moses, Josiah, Elijah, are each of them instances of special sins and imperfections meeting with special chastisement; "and these are written for our admonition, on whom the ends of the world are come."

Rebekah's sin was that of favouritism. Through her scheming partiality Jacob was successfully urged to supplant Esau; but her heart's desire, when it came, was as an apple of Sodom. Both mother and son were punished; but the mother's penalty is most significant. Thinking to send her son away for a few days till Esau's anger was abated, unwittingly she dismissed him for ever; and she herself found the worm that was to gnaw at the root of her gourd. Jacob's characteristic sin was deceit, the flaw that runs through his whole life, and robs his character of strength and dignity. But as he sinned in deceit, so was he punished by it; as he conspired to deceive his own parent, his sons conspired to deceive him. The heartless falsehood of Joseph's pretended death, which withered the patriarch's very soul, must also have smitten him with a bitter remorse for the fraud he had practised on his blind father. His sin found him out, and pursued him, and would not leave him, till he laid him down in his grave.

If we pass from sins to faults, from what is perverse and deliberate to what is simply infirm and imperfect (a subject for reflection, quite as useful and quite as necessary), we shall see how, in the case even of the most eminent of God's servants, impatience and self-will and unbelief cause us to wander from the path of duty, and compel for us the firm, though tender, admonition of God.

Moses thought to serve God when he went to visit his Hebrew kinsmen, and when he desired, though at his own risk, to assert their cause. But, so far as we can see, he was not justified in taking the law into his own hands, and slaying that Egyptian. It was not trusting God, who knew his people's sorrows as well as he did, nor was it really aiding his friends. The result of it was that, unable to vindicate himself, he had to flee; and though in the Epistle to the Hebrews we read God's own approval of his final choice between the reproach of Christ and the treasures in Egypt, there is not a word to defend that hasty homicide. For all that we know to the contrary he paid as his penalty an exile of forty years in the wilderness; and though we can well understand how that time was blessed to him and used by him, but for that characteristic impatience Israel might not have had to wait so long for their freedom; he, at least, might have passed more happily that third of his noble life.

Josiah is a signal instance of the fatal errors into which self-will may sometimes lead a good man, and of the severity with which God must visit it. The Chronicles, which give a fuller account than the Kings (2 Chron. xxxv. 20—24), make it sufficiently clear, not only that King Necho had no personal design against Judah at that time, but that he conceived himself to be actually carrying out the designs of Divine Providence, and did his utmost to dissuade Josiah from hindering them. Josiah, however, for reasons which it is unnecessary to examine, obstinately persisted in his purpose. Bent on his own way, he had it, but it cost him his life and his crown; and that disastrous end to such a promising beginning is both a terrible proof that we may and must go wrong, if we are resolved on it, in spite of all warning to the contrary; and that God will not interfere to preserve his own saints from the consequences of a headstrong folly.

Elijah, strange as it may sound, is an instance of despondency and unbelief, which God could not altogether pass over. After the slaughter of the priests on Carmel, we should have thought him capable of any daring; and had that great blow at idolatry been instantly followed up by decided action, the worship of Jehovah might have been restored in Samaria. But a message came from Jezebel, and a great panic smote the prophet with sudden helplessness, and he who had defied a whole priesthood, with a king at their head, fled away in fear at the threat of a vindictive woman, and going a day's journey into the wilderness, that no one might trace him in his flight, at length asked to die. Bent on even a longer flight, he was graciously strengthened by God for so great fatigue; yet we must not interpret that as a proof that God's Providence in the first instance pointed him to Horeb. It merely implies that, since he was resolved on going, God would enable him to reach his journey's end, that there He might meet him and ask him about his fear. But, surely, had he trusted in God that He would deliver him and yet further use him, he would never have fled there at all. In one point of view it was so much lost time, and the throwing away of an opportunity, which was never repeated. The question asked of him is significant enough of God's interpretation of his conduct. Though his chastisement was confined to reproof, even to be reproved was a fall for a saint like him. "What doest thou here, Elijah?" this was his Lord's expostulation with him for his sudden giving way to that utter despondency. He was at once sent back across the whole extent of the land, and on an errand of as great peril as that from which he had so lately escaped.

Yes, let us remember, that even our faults grieve the good Spirit of God; and our infirmities and imperfections, if not watched against by us, must be chastened by Him. Though God is not extreme to mark what is done amiss, faults may grow into sins, sins may harden into habits. "Without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it should be holy and without blemish"—this is the description of the glorious Church which, in the day of his return, shall be worthy to be the Lamb's wife; here, too, is the key to the discipline, the secret of the purpose, which is in Christ's heart about us now.

Possibly, indeed, if we had the same opportunity for analysis and induction in the moral government of God that we possess in his natural government, we might come to see that every moral act inevitably brings about sooner or later its own result, as any other effect follows any other cause in the other departments of his Providential kingdom; that, in this respect, we are still under a system of present rewards and punishments, the form somewhat changed, but not the essence; the principle being everlasting, though the manner of its manifestation transitory. Thus, in this court of law there is no appeal, and for these offences (in the sense of a present chastisement) no atonement. Christ died, not to save us from the inevitable consequences of our actions here (which would simply be impunity in sin), but from the deserved penalty of our actions hereafter. To spare us the needful pain of chastisement would be to deprive us of the only medicine which can remove the cause, as well as heal the sorrow. It would not only frustrate the purpose of Christ's death, "who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works," it would also contradict the prophet's explanation of chastisement, given through the Spirit of God. "Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? Let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the Lord. Let us lift up our heart with our hands unto God in the heavens."

But chastisement is sent not only to recall the backslider, or to set the mark of God's displeasure on some act or habit of sin; it is to sanctify us, to add to our positive and personal holiness, to edify us higher into the image of Christ. "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit He taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, He purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit."

And here let it be observed what sanctification really means; what is possible and what impossible in the way of growth in grace, and in putting on the Lord Jesus Christ. It is not mending the old nature, which we inherit from Adam; it is cultivating and developing the new nature which we receive from Christ. The old nature cannot be improved; it is under a ban and a curse; it is to be crucified with its affections and lusts, and mortified in its members; we are to put it off, as we put off a worn-out and defiled garment; nay, we are to count ourselves dead to it, as if it had no more relation to us, since we are alive to God through Jesus Christ our Lord. The soul is like a house of which strangers have taken possession, and lord it cruelly over the owner. What shall you do for your liberty? Can you change their hearts and make them other men, so that you would be content or even glad they should remain? That is impossible. Pride will never be humble, lust will never be pure, selfishness will never think of a neighbour's interests, envy will never exult in a neighbour's joy. The only thing to be done is to turn them out by bringing in others stronger than they, who will, little by little, get the mastery over them. Thus the way to conquer pride is to cultivate humility; if we would be gentle, let us practise self-control; if we would think of others and help them, we must bear their burdens. The old affections must be expelled by new; the invading tyrants must be besieged and cast out by legitimate owners; and though we shall carry with us to our grave the roots of our old nature, though not till we have cast off the garment of our corruptible flesh shall we have our full liberty as sons of God, it is of infinite moment to us to ascertain that the only way of holiness is to overcome evil with good; and that there is no limit to the power of the grace of God save that which is imposed by ourselves.

In the light of these remarks the necessity and the purpose of chastisement will be seen more clearly. "Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O Lord, and teachest him out of thy law." Chastisement instructs us, softens us, educates us, elevates us. There are many lessons it teaches us of God, and the world, and ourselves; but the one thing we have first to learn, and the lesson it imparts to us more distinctly, more continually than any other, is the nature, and the depth, and the complicatedness, and the deceitfulness of sin. Then we see how sin, like a foreign poison in the blood, affects and corrupts our entire nature, tainting innocent affections, perverting harmless dispositions, and, like the roots of a noxious weed, spreading itself secretly over the whole surface of our being. Affliction detects our secret, and perhaps unsuspected faults, much in the same way that acid acts on litmus paper. It also decomposes our complex character into all its multitudinous and varied elements, laying bare, to our surprise and sorrow, deformities of which we never dreamed. We discover (and any child of God can testify to the bitterness of such discovery) what unbelief lurks in us, what unthankfulness, what desperate selfishness, what numbness of heart both towards God and man, what petulance and waywardness, what obstinacy and self-will, what real shrinking from close intercourse with God. Then if we, tainted and cheated by sin as we all are, come in any degree to hate and fear it, it is only a step further to regard it as God regards it: and to see how it is not his hatred of us, nor his desire to destroy us, but his hatred of sin and his purpose to save us from it, that brings down his rod. There are three distinct proofs of God's abhorrence of sin: Christ's cross, the whole creation groaning and travailing together in pain, and hell. Pain, whether of body or mind, is the visible mark of God's displeasure at sin; and, as conscience is the witness of God within us, sorrow is the witness of God without us, that He hates it with a perfect hatred, and would have us hate it too. The fifty-first Psalm brings this out in a remarkable light. If ever one man in this world was cruelly wronged by another, Uriah was wronged by David. Yet his sin against man, in that hour of his overwhelming remorse, seemed nothing when compared with his sin against God. "Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight: that thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest." O let us see that there can be no real beginning in holiness, much less no true growth in it, no adequate and absorbing appreciation of Christ's atoning sacrifice, no crying out for pardon through his precious blood, and no living gladness in it when it is found: no honest wrestling with wickedness in our own hearts, and no determined battling with it in the world around us, without deep and abiding convictions of its abominableness before God—in other words, without that chastisement through which those convictions come.

But there is another result purposed for us in chastisement, which affects not merely the apprehension of truth, but the moulding of character; which, besides enlarging our knowledge, fertilises our heart. Sorrow, as a discipline for the soul, subdues the will, softens the temper, curbs the passions, pulverises, so to speak, the rough excrescences of character, which, like lumps of hard clay on the surface of a tilled field, turn the edge of the plough and baulk the skill of the sower. It is not that we are to lose our will; that would be to lose our individuality; but that we are to retain it, that we may offer it up daily as a living sacrifice to God. "I have surely heard Ephraim bemoaning himself thus: Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised, as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke: turn thou me, and I shall be turned; for thou art the Lord my God. Surely after that I was turned, I repented; and after that I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh." (Jeremiah xxxi. 18, 19.) Oh! there are thousands upon thousands much chastened because much loved; because much loved, taken such pains with that they might grow like God. In a little while, instead of murmuring at it, we shall exult over it in a hymn of praise which angels might envy. Till then, let us glory in tribulation also, for "tribulation worketh patience."

Another end of chastisement is to educate and prepare us for life. He who knows what is coming on us would help us to meet it; not only does He offer us blessing, but (what is much more) He would make us capable of receiving it, and enjoying it, and retaining it, though by a process of trial which, at the moment of its coming, may make us stagger through unbelief. So, where life is to be busy, or prosperous, or brilliant, or much encumbered with temptation, affliction acts through the memory, like ballast on a vessel, to keep us steady, and sober, and humble. Joseph is an instance in point. For him the prison was the only safe approach to the throne. No one can govern who has not first learned to obey. He had to learn within the prison-walls lessons of human nature, his own as well as other men's, which he could not have learned before, which it would have been too late for him to have learned afterwards; he was also to be instructed how to suffer patiently, how to be silent under calumny, how to requite with justice, how to recompense with mercy. "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." If only we could believe this, how plain, how bright, how happy our life would be!

But there is one other result which chastisement aims at producing in us—greater nearness to God, and so greater meetness for heaven. As it is impossible to overstate the desire of God's heart, that we would receive his love, and walk in fellowship with Him, and consult Him in our difficulties, and worship Him with our entire souls, so is it needful to confess, humbling and saddening as the confession must be, that we do not do this willingly, nor heartily, nor entirely, though, so far as we go, it may be deliberately and sincerely; we give self and the world as much as we can, Him as little. For, though we can trust God for our salvation, we distrust Him for our happiness. We look to Him to bless us in the world to come, we look elsewhere to be blessed in the present world. Health, money, friends, advancement, society, knowledge, business—these are the gods that we worship, on these we rely; and we do not discover that they are but broken cisterns which hold no water, until God shatters them at a blow, and so we fall back on Him as our only abiding portion, in whom alone are the fresh springs of our life. Yes, let us confess that God desires us, and we do not desire Him; He is ever turning towards us to bless us, and we—we are ever turning away. His hands are filled with gifts for which we do not care. His heart is overflowing with love, which does not content or gladden us, unless it flows in the channels we ourselves choose for it. Idolatry is still the characteristic sin of men: love of this present evil world has far more power over the best of us than we think it has; and only when health is impaired, or money is lost, or friends die, or occupation is suspended, are our eyes fully opened to discern good from evil, and we made willing to say, "Take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously, so will we render the calves of our lips."

And thus,—for no one can be spiritually minded without being heavenly minded as well,—as earth attracts us less heaven attracts us more; we confess that we are strangers and pilgrims, we seek a city yet to come. For life with all its burdens and anxieties is yet such a blessed thing, this earth with its ties and pursuits and objects and possessions has so much in it to occupy and fascinate and gladden; friends are so kind, home is so happy, knowledge is so noble, nature is so fair, that, say as we will, think as we may that heaven is our home and this world a wilderness, were our health unbroken, and our tasks unfinished, and our energies fresh, and our homes full, we should follow with somewhat reluctant steps and moistened eyes, and a heart looking behind us, the messenger that takes us away. We are meant to love life; nay, we are made to love it. Love of life is no sin, it is merely a lower kind of love than a desire for the fruition of life eternal in the presence of the Lamb; and the Divine way of lifting us up from the lower level to the higher, without contradicting on the one hand God's purposes for our earthly service, or, on the other hand, crushing the beautiful human affections, which are the features of God's own image in ruined yet not quite defaced souls, is by gradually weaning us from earthly things, rather than by violently alienating us from them, by correcting and elevating, rather than by destroying our natural instincts and capacities, through the blessed prospect of the inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away. For what is true heavenly-mindedness? Surely not a cowardly, feeble, sickly craving to get rid of life because it is full of risks and toil and change. If we wish for heaven only because we are tired of earth, we shall soon want to leave it, and be back here. Heavenly-mindedness, such as God would work in us, is a weariness of sin, not of duty; a desire to see God, not to leave men. To be with Him for whom we have been waiting; to behold Him in whom we have been believing; and to adore Him whom we have tried and wished to love, yet never with the same kind of devoted love which we gave to husband or wife, or child, or friend; this is the desire for heaven which God would ripen in us by his dispensations of sorrow, a desire which is perfectly compatible with the manful and entire and cheerful and patient discharge of all our duties here.

Such, then, are at least some of the purposes which God would accomplish towards his people in chastening them. But the verse also teaches us that He has purposes with respect to Himself: "FOR HIS NAME'S SAKE." He is holy, and therefore He chastens us, that no one may accuse Him of countenancing sin. For his sake as well as ours, and for the world as well as for the Church, He must show Himself to be a holy God, loving righteousness, and hating iniquity. There have been three distinct periods in his providential government of the Church in its features of blessing and chastisement. The first was under the Theocracy, when the plagues on Egypt and the destruction of the wicked Canaanites marked the period when Jehovah himself was Lord and King of his people and made the rod of his power to be known. The second dates from the Kings to the Incarnation, when God was gradually withdrawing Himself from visible and supra-natural interference, and teaching his people to walk by faith and not by sight. And this being a time when men, whose forefathers had seen the very footsteps and hand-prints of God, began to doubt—since these had disappeared—if there was a God at all, the Psalms abound in petitions, not so much for a personal vengeance on personal enemies, as for a public and righteous retribution on the enemies of God. "Let God show Himself to be a living and holy God by punishing the wicked and rewarding the good," this is the one thought that runs through those Scriptures, the tone and spirit of which, when not precisely understood, shock and perplex us now. Such, for instance, is the meaning of the prayer, "Arise, thou Judge of the earth, and reward the proud after their deserving." Such the gist of the complaint, "Why do the ungodly triumph, and the wicked make such proud boasting?" Such the essence of the question, "Where is the God of judgment?" Such the substance of the exhortation, "Fret not thyself because of evil-doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity." Such the spirit of the thanksgiving, "The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance; he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked, so that a man shall say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous, verily He is a God that judgeth the earth." The third period is the present, in which we look for a judgment to come, and are persuaded that whatever may seem to be imperfect or unjust now, will be explained and vindicated, and set right by the Son of Man on the throne of his glory. We do not therefore expect to see sin visibly punished, and we are expressly forbidden by our Lord himself to pass hasty or severe judgments on others. Yet this does not repeal God's law of personal chastisement, nor does it forbid our asking Him, when his rod visits us, "Lord, wherefore is it come?" A holy God hates sin, and must punish it wherever He finds it; He can have no truce with it, no forbearance towards it, no halting of purpose, no slackness of hand. If God did not visit sin at all, men would instantly say, He careth not for it. But when we see that He hates it all, hates it always, hates it everywhere, then his name is consistent with his government, and his character with his acts; and if we really desire for ourselves to be holy as He is holy, though we shall smart under his rod, we shall not wonder at it, nor resist it, for He will be seen to be doing the very thing for us that we have asked Him to do, and that we cannot do for ourselves.

But He is also righteous. This is their song who stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God, and sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb:—"Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of Saints." Sometimes, no doubt, we are tempted to think that this is not so. When the punishment seems out of proportion to the offence, or when it is "sorrow upon sorrow;" or when it goes on year by year; or when it is final, in the sense that there is no hope of ever escaping from it, we hardly know how to reconcile it with our ideas of God's justice, the punishment is greater than we can bear when it is heavier than we have deserved. How severe, for instance, was the doom on Moses that shut him out of the land of promise, and which included him in the same sentence with those whose carcasses fell in the wilderness, because they thought scorn of that pleasant land, and gave no credence to God's word! Is there a more touching prayer in all the Old Testament than that of the prophet's, "O Lord God, thou hast begun to show thy servant thy greatness and thy mighty hand. I pray thee let me go over and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain and Lebanon. But the Lord was wroth with me for your sakes, and would not hear me, and the Lord said unto me, Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter." To glance at one more instance: the faithful but disobedient prophet paid a very terrible penalty for being the victim of a wicked fraud. The same kind of thing, though in a different form, continually happens now. Imprudence or impatience are sometimes as severely visited as perverseness or malice. A mistake in youth stalks after us through life with the gloomy shadow of a crime. Cæsar crossed but one Rubicon: but there are countless Rubicons in daily life of rash words, hasty impulses, unwise plans, which are but the work of a moment, yet cut our lives in two, and make a wide gulf between a happy past and a clouded future. The loss of a limb is irremediable. The death of a friend is irremediable. We cannot live our life over again: regret may prevent future mistakes; it cannot repair the past. Well, the one thing to do is to fall back on the righteousness of God, and to say to ourselves, "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him." We cannot be fair judges of the equity of punishment without knowing accurately the nature and extent of the sin. It was a severe punishment on Moses; but, be it said with all dutiful and loyal respect to that grandest of men, it was for a great offence; and had God passed it over, it never could have been said of Him, "He will by no means clear the guilty." As to the disobedient prophet, he was deceived, no doubt; but that was his fault, not his excuse. To be deceived by others may sometimes mean to deceive ourselves: and though the punishment was final in this world—though the true prophet suffered and the false prophet escaped,—in the next world we may believe they will change places; and the verdict pronounced by the instinct of human justice will be ratified by the sentence of God.

O, let us believe that God is never hard—never afflicts willingly or grieves the children of men, never deals with us after our sins, nor rewards us according to our iniquities. Does not our own experience tell us this? Heavy as may be our trials, do not we secretly feel to want them all, and that less would not do; our sorrow is not to atone for sin, but to help to deliver us from it: yet it must be sufficient to effect this; and therefore to touch the edge of the wound instead of probing it, would be but to trifle with our disease and prolong our pain?

For, once more, "God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it." When it is "sorrow upon sorrow," it is "strength upon strength;" and those who know most about affliction will be the readiest to confess what lessons it has taught them of the tenderness and faithfulness of God. He knows exactly how far it is safe to go with us: and He watches over us in the furnace, waiting for the moment when He may bring us out. Our powers are never really over-tasked, for they that wait on the Lord shall renew their strength. Our patience need never be exhausted, if we remember in whose hand our times are. Our resources are never dried up, for the fulness of God is at our disposal. Our faith cannot fail while we look up at Christ. "My grace is sufficient for thee:" this is a promise for us, as well as for the apostle. And if we ask, as many ask with Job every day, "What is my strength that I should hope, and what is mine end that I should prolong my life?" let us lay hold of the blessed assurance, not only to Israel after the flesh, but to Israel after the spirit: "I will not contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth, lest the spirit should fail before Me, and the souls which I have made."

In conclusion, to repeat a thought, which has already been dwelt upon in former expositions, the individuality of Divine chastisements, or the fitness of each man's sorrow for his own condition, is strikingly indicated in the words, "He restoreth me, He leadeth me." Life would be intolerable, could we not trace in it the plan of a Divine Providence watching over us and guiding us; sorrow would be overwhelming, had we to look on it as a chance arrow shot against us at a venture, and not aimed by the hand of one whom we can trust and love. When God sends chastisement, He knows to whom He sends it, and why He sends it, and what He sends. His treatment of us is infinitely wise in its precise adaptation to the circumstances under which it is applied, and to the result which it is intended to accomplish, and to the character which it is sent to sanctify. If anything, so to speak, is providential, affliction is. If in anything whatever we are bound to trust God with all the completeness of our judgment, with all the strength of our understanding, with all the adoration of our heart, it is when He is taking us apart to make us perfect through suffering. Thus it is that God sends sorrow to one man, and not to another; at one time in this way, at another time in that. The sorrow that might cure us to-day might not cure us to-morrow; the sorrow that might be good for me, might not be good for you. Each man has his own sorrows, different from any one else's in all the world, since he himself is different from any one else. Each individual believer is led his own way into the wilderness, each has Jesus with him there.

And having Jesus with us is the key to that secret, which we all find so hard, keeping the blessing of the sorrow, when the sorrow itself is passed. In one sense it is impossible that the freshness of our first impressions should never fade, or that in the heat and burden of the day the flower should be as bright and as fragrant as when it dropped with dew in the first blush of morning. But it is not the feeling of the blessing that is so important, as the blessing itself; not the echo of the Saviour's voice, but the Saviour himself that we should really desire to retain. And our Lord will not leave us, unless we bid Him. The believer's heart is far more precious to Him than the material glories of a visible Paradise with its walls of jasper and its gates of pearl. Yet we shall retain Him in proportion as we have clung to Him, and laid hold of the hem of his garment, and said, "Abide with us," "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me," when his hand was heavy on us, and the dews of suffering moistened our brow, and we had not strength for words; only the soul turned towards Him as flowers to the sun. Ours be the Psalmist's prayer: "O when wilt thou come unto me? I will walk in my house with a perfect heart." Ours be the prophet's complaint: "O the hope of Israel, the Saviour thereof in the time of trouble, why shouldest thou be a stranger in the land, and as a wayfaring man that turneth aside to tarry for a night?" Then ours shall be the apostle's thanksgiving: "Most gladly, therefore, will I rather glory in my infirmities, that the power of Christ may rest upon me."

This once more leads on to another thought of great consolation, bearing on our supposed uselessness under certain visitations of God. For some are disposed to say that their time of affliction is all lost time, and it bitterly aggravates the chastisement, already severe enough, to feel that we are but cumberers of the ground. When we discover how lightly we valued our former opportunities, we wish for them back; yet wishing does not bring them back; we long, but long in vain, once more to be permitted to give a cup of cold water to one for whom Christ died. Well, it is something to be humbled for past remissness, and to discover mercy which we have not valued as it deserved. Yet inaction need not be uselessness. The land that lies fallow under the winter frost is mellowing for the spring sowing. It is very possible to be useless amid a great deal of fussy and showy activity, and to be seeking the praise of men, not of God. We cannot be useless while we are doing and suffering God's will, whatever it may be found to be. And we can always do that. If we are bringing forth the fruits of the Spirit, we are not useless. And we can always do that. If we are increasing in the knowledge of God's will in all wisdom and spiritual understanding, we are not useless. And we can always do that. While we pray we cannot be useless. And we can always do that. God will always find us a work to do, a niche to fill, a place to serve, nay, even a soul to save, when it is his will, and not ours, that we desire to do; and if it should please Him that we should sit still for the rest of our lives, doing nothing else but waiting on Him, and waiting for Him, why should we complain? "Here is the faith and patience of the saints."

So, when sorrow comes to you, or to those you love, do not shrink away from it, as from some cruel torturer, but welcome in it an angel to bring you near to God. Do not fear, do not fear, do not fear. "This light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Our God is enough for every one of us, and when we pass behind the cloud, it is that we may see his face, and our joy be full. I would not indeed say, Envy those in sorrow. That would be aiming too high for human nature. But I may say, Bless God for his gracious purpose towards them, and let your prayer for them rather be, that they may be able to receive and retain all He offers them, than that they may be at once delivered from their pain. It is natural to pity them, yet if we could look into the invisible world we should see that they who are pitied by the angels, and whom, therefore, we ought to pity, are those who are left alone to be filled with their own devices, whom an unbroken prosperity is hardening against God.

Soon, very soon, the good Shepherd will no longer be restoring our souls, or leading us painfully in the paths of righteousness; for sin will be a thing of the past, and we shall be walking together on the everlasting hills. Yet, if our glory depends on our service, it also depends on our sanctity. In heaven we shall still serve Him; but only while on earth can we be purified with the baptism of pain.

A. W. Thorold.

A SUNDAY AFTERNOON IN A LONDON COURT.

We crossed a few streets and reached a narrow lane, that led into a close dirty court. Abel walked ahead, of course. He seemed quite proud of his leadership.

By we, I mean my friend Mr. Scott and myself. Mr. Scott is a clerk in a bank. He is a tall powerful-looking man of thirty, with a certain dignity in his appearance, which commands respect as much as his kind, benevolent countenance inspires confidence. Being possessed of a powerful voice, and having the knack of expressing himself in an easy popular way, he commenced open-air services in the neighbourhood of Clerkenwell upwards of a year ago. His preaching has been attended with much success. On the Sunday of which I am now speaking, I found myself among his hearers. I went there, not only to witness the work he was carrying on, but also to hear him myself; for I knew that a half hour spent under his preaching was, to an attentive listener, a step onward in the way of salvation. Not that Mr. Scott told his hearers much that was new. I saw many passers-by stop a few minutes and then walk off again, with an expression that seemed to say, "Ah! the old story over again." But I also saw many who stood as though spell-bound by some mysterious power. They seemed riveted to the spot, and apparently forgot all about their business, so absorbed were they in the subject which the preacher, in his simple eloquence, put so forcibly before their minds. The fact is, "new" and "old" are words of very relative meaning. They denote attributes no object possesses by itself; they are rather imported into it by those who look at it. That which makes a thing new or old to you, is not in the thing, but in yourself. So that what was old to you yesterday may become quite new to-day. For instance, you have known for years that there is a certain remedy for a certain complaint, and whenever you see it advertised in the papers you at once dismiss it from your mind, because you know that you can obtain nothing from it in the way of information. But suppose that the symptoms of the disease begin to manifest themselves in your system, the advertisement soon acquires freshness and interest to you. The old importunate beggar suddenly becomes a new friend, and you find yourself performing a deed which hitherto you deemed yourself incapable of: you attentively read that "hackneyed" advertisement, and even commit to memory the particulars which it gives. Now, in the very same way, many a one who for years and years had known the Saviour, but did not care about Him, upon falling in with Mr. Scott's preaching, listened with great attention to the proclamation of the old truth. And it was not because the preacher put something new into it, for no preacher, however learned or eloquent, can do that; but because the Holy Spirit put something new into the hearer's heart, something in the shape of an awakened conscience, of a feeling of uneasiness and anxiety concerning the state of his soul; in a word, a discovery of an inward malady, which no one can cure except that Physician whose medicine stands proof even against death.

The service over, a young man of about twenty-five advanced to Mr. Scott. He evidently belonged to the artisan class. His shabby dress seemed to indicate that he was connected with a family which had very little to do with the needle and the brush. His face, however, was pleasant to look at, and you could not help believing that its owner was a true and honest fellow.

"Would you like to go and visit a poor invalid with me?" said Mr. Scott.

"Oh, yes," I replied.

"Very well, Abel," he said, addressing the young man; "we'll go."

"Who is that young man?" I inquired, while Abel stepped on a few paces before us.

"He is one of my most regular hearers," said Mr. Scott. "He came to my preaching some six or eight weeks ago, and has attended steadily ever since. I was much pleased with the fellow's frank, good-looking face, which, like a mirror, gave back the expression my words must have called forth upon my own face. It greatly assisted me in my preaching, for nothing inspires a speaker more than the knowledge that his words are producing an impression on the hearts of his hearers. It may be a weakness in me, but I must confess that my liveliness greatly depends upon the effect which I witness upon the faces of the people. If neither smile nor frown, neither sign of consent nor of disapproval, be noticeable, and the people stare at me like so many wax figures, or look about them with an air of listless indifference, it is hard work for me to go on preaching, however precious the truth may be I am expounding. My spirit sinks with every sentence, as if from each of those inexpressive faces a cold chilly blast came upon my heart, blowing out the flame that warmed my soul when I began, and sometimes actually freezing me. But Abel's face has often made the light flare up again. From a short conversation I had with him one day I learnt that his parents are old and unable to support themselves, and are entirely dependent upon him and his sister. He has never learnt any trade, and earns a little money by carrying parcels and running errands. He is generally to be seen loitering about the railway stations, trying to pick up a job from the passengers. He said the things he heard me preach about were quite new to him; that he liked them very much, and wished they were also preached in the place where he lives, as he expected much that was bad might be done away with in consequence. This morning he requested me to visit a sick man, a neighbour of his, whom he had told about my preaching, and who had expressed a strong desire to see me. I felt that I must go with him at once, the more so as I was anxious to know a little more about his family and way of living."

Mr. Scott had just done saying this when we reached the court in which Abel lived. It was like most of its kind, dark, dirty, and almost suffocatingly close. It contained about ten or twelve four-storied dilapidated houses, and teemed with little children, who ran about at play. Men and women were standing in the doorways, the men smoking, and the women, some of whom were very gaudily dressed and others in rags, were picking fish or peeling oranges, and chatting with their neighbours. Some kept up conversations with others from the windows of the first and second stories. The whole made upon my tympanum the impression of an enormous beehive, the buzz of which was uninterrupted.

Abel proceeded to the doorway of one of the houses, where an elderly woman was standing with a fat healthy-looking baby in her arms. There was a sudden pause in the buzz, as the appearance of two gentlemen evidently attracted great notice.

"I say, Lizzy," cried a voice from a window, "it's for the Jew. He must die a Christian, and no help for him."

"Moses and Aaron!" was the answer.

A burst of uproarious laughter made the court resound. Abel pushed us rather hurriedly into the house.

"What is the meaning of all this?" asked Mr. Scott, who found himself in the dark passage sooner than its odour would have made him wish.

"Please step in, sir," answered Abel, opening the door of the front room. "I will tell you."

The room in which we found ourselves presented such a spectacle of confusion as I never saw before. Elegance and sordidness were here wrestling for the supremacy. There was a round walnut table and a stuffed easy chair, which might have figured in any gentleman's drawing-room. But the table was covered with a dirty rag, and in the easy chair sat a grey-headed man, of whose dress there was not one piece that was not torn. A fine bird's cage hung on the wall, and near to it a decayed Dutch clock, without hands, and completely covered with dust. A guitar of Italian make stood in a corner, surrounded with pots and pans, both dirty and broken. The elderly woman who followed us into the room had on an old torn cotton gown, but a splendid silk dress and a gorgeously coloured shawl were noticeable, suspended on a nail close by the fire-place. The old grey-headed man had something venerable in his appearance, in spite of his ragged coat. It was easy to see that the owner of that good-natured face was Abel's father.

"Please, sir," said Abel to Mr. Scott, "the sick man lives up-stairs on the second floor. I believe he is a Jew; at least, he is believed to be one by every body in the court. The people don't like him, but I think he is a good fellow."

"No, he is not," said the old woman; "he is a fool, sir, if not worse."

"Now, mother, be quiet," said Abel; "you cannot prove a single thing against Benjamins."

"Can't I?" answered the woman, contemptuously. "Does he not call the police into the court for every trifle? He is a low spy. He is paid for it, depend upon it."

"Ah well, Sarah, you had better not say that," said the old man. "You're wrong in this matter, I suspect. At any rate, allow the gentlemen to see poor Benjamins, as they want to speak a word to him."

"Well, that's all right," replied the woman, lowering her voice to a tone of compassion. "God forbid that I should prevent a man's good, especially when dying, as perhaps is the case with Benjamins. We are all of us poor sinners, and in need of God's mercy."

"Do you believe that?" asked Mr. Scott, agreeably surprised by this confession of the woman.

"Of course I do, sir," answered she. "I always say, that but for God's mercy I should be lying at the bottom of hell. Even the best of us deserve nothing less than that."

"Then have you a well-founded hope that you will not be found lying there one day?" asked Mr. Scott, in a grave tone.

"I hope I have, sir. I pray every day, 'Lord have mercy upon me.'"

"Of course you do," quoth the old man, with a sour smile.

His wife cast a grim look at him.

"I always say, sir," continued she, "a man who has no religion is worse than a brute."

She then told us that from her childhood she had been used to attend public worship regularly, but that of late she had been prevented by infirmity and by many engagements at home.

"I see you have a baby to care for," said Mr. Scott, taking the child's hand. "Is it your daughter's?"

"Yes, sir."

"Does she live with you?"

"She does, sir."

"So her husband is dead?"

"He is not, sir. He is a sailor, and is from home just now."

"Ah, Sarah, you know better," muttered the old man, sufficiently loud to be heard.

"I think we will just go and see the sick man," said Mr. Scott, who did not feel much pleasure in carrying on this conversation. "Abel, go ahead, if you please, and show us the room where the sick man is."

Some forty wooden steps, up which we had to grope our way in Egyptian darkness, took us to the back room of the second story. We found ourselves in a tolerably large apartment, indifferently furnished, but clean and tidy. There was a bed opposite the windows, upon which a sick man was lying, and another bed opposite the fire-place, which was unoccupied. An old woman who was sitting at the table near the window, dropped a lowly curtsey and left the place when we entered. Abel, after having introduced us to the sick man and given us seats, followed her example, and walked down-stairs. The invalid appeared to be about thirty. There could be no doubt that he was a Jew, or at any rate of Jewish extraction, for his black hair and beard, his aquiline nose, and his strongly-protruding jaw-bones stamped his face of that peculiar type which so certainly distinguishes the children of Abraham from all other nations. After a few words about his illness, which, though painful and chronic, yet proved not to be of a very serious nature, he expressed his gratitude for the visit with which we had favoured him.

"Abel told me of your preaching," he said to Mr. Scott, "and I often said I wish I could speak to that gentleman; but I never could expect, sir, that you would trouble yourself to come all the way to see me. It is too much, indeed."

"And what made you wish to speak to me?" asked Mr. Scott.

"Why, sir," answered he, with a smile, "there is a bit of a controversy between my friend Abel and myself about religion. I am an Israelite, as perhaps you may be aware. Now, I have been thinking much about religious matters of late, as I have been struck by the fact that Christians and Jews can never agree, though Christians believe and read our Bible."

"So you read your Bible?" asked Mr. Scott.

"Certainly I do," answered he, producing an Old Testament, with the Hebrew and English text in parallel columns, from underneath his pillow. "I am not a very great Hebrew scholar, but with the aid of the translation I can make it out pretty well. Now, I have read Moses and the Prophets over and over again, and I have found that it was wrong in our rabbis to impose upon us a great many things of which not a word is to be found in the law of God. I often quarrelled with them about this, which ended in my leaving the synagogue, lest I should be turned out. They follow absurd traditions for which there is no Divine authority whatever; and as I want to serve God, and not man, I threw all those human inventions overboard. But, on the other hand, I found that the Christian religion is not true either. I have often had conversations about it with Abel's mother, who would sometimes say to me that I would go to hell if I did not turn a Christian. But I found that her religion does away with the law of God altogether. For God in the law most decidedly declares that it is our duty to do his commandments, and that those who do them shall live, and have a great reward. But Mrs. Harris—that's the name of Abel's mother—always speaks of God's mercy, and that we are great sinners, and can only be saved by grace. But under the cover of these words she commits the greatest iniquities, and lives as if there were no God nor eternity at all. Her daughter leads a life of sin. She is out at present with the orange-basket, as usual, but I am certain she will come home to-night with some sailor whom she has entrapped in her snares, and whom she will keep in her power till she has robbed him of everything. Her mother encourages her in her infamous way of living, and, in fact, the whole family live upon the earnings of that unhappy girl. If you saw into their back-parlour you would find it stuffed with articles which they have bought with the wages of iniquity, or have got as presents from their wretched victims. This state of things is a real eye-sore to the old man, who is good and honest; but he is weak, and must submit. As for Abel, he was always disgusted with it, and constantly quarrelled with his mother and sister. From the day he first heard you preach, however, he found he could not with a good conscience continue a member of a family which lived in such immorality, and, as we had often conversed about the matter, he resolved to take up his abode with me. That is his bed there. We live together like brothers, having everything in common, as we are both of us poor. I am in the service of Mr. Solomon Rahab, who deals in old clothes, and whatever I bring home in the way of wages I put into that box on the mantelpiece, and so does Abel, and we take from it what we are in need of. For Abel is an out-and-out honest fellow, and I could trust him with anything. Now, the fact that your preaching caused him to break with his mother's household, and, like Moses, to prefer the desert with a good conscience to his mother's Egyptian flesh-pots, made me think that your Christianity at any rate must be something better than Mrs. Harris's. Abel also told me that you always spoke highly of the commandments of God, and that you had said that Christ had not come to do away with the law, but to fulfil it. But how that could be he could not tell. Abel is a good fellow, but dreadfully ignorant. He can neither read nor write. I have just begun to teach him a little reading, but he is not a very quick scholar. His heart is better than his head. So, upon finding that he could not give me an explanation, I often expressed the wish that I could have a conversation with the preacher himself. I am very thankful, sir, for the kindness with which you have gratified my desire."

"I shall be very happy to answer any question you wish to put to me, as far as it is in my power," replied Mr. Scott. "If I am right, your chief difficulty is as to the relation in which God's law stands to his mercy. Now, as to God's commandments, we both agree that they are holy and good, and that it is our duty to keep them. But I hope you will also agree with me when I say that there is not one among the children of Adam who perfectly keeps God's commandments, and that we are all transgressors."

"I admit that," answered Benjamins; "but that's exactly what perplexes me. When Mrs. Harris said that we are all sinners, I could not help owning that she spoke the truth, neither could I help admitting her conclusion that we consequently can only live and be saved by the mercy of God. But then, I thought, if we are to live through grace, what is the use of the law?"

"Why, of course," said I, thinking that I saw clearly through the whole matter, "the law is necessary to regulate our life, and to keep us in the right way. But then, if we should unfortunately trespass against one of the commandments, grace steps in to make up for it. Else there would be no hope for us. Don't you see?"

"I beg your pardon," replied the Jew. "I cannot see how your theory solves my difficulty. Will grace make up for the transgression of only one commandment?"

"More, of course."

"Then of two?"

"Of more."

"Suppose there are one hundred commandments which it is our duty to obey, and suppose I can only obey a portion of them, can you tell me the minimum which I must perform, to have a claim upon grace? Where is the line at which grace begins? Suppose, after having done my utmost all my life long, I find at the end that my righteousness amounts only to thirty per cent., may I rest assured that grace will make up for the remaining seventy?"

"There is no such line drawn," said I, a little put out by this arithmetical way of treating morals.

"So it does not matter how much righteousness we bring in?" he asked, in a tone of disappointment. "We may have transgressed one commandment, or fifty, or ninety-nine, or even the whole of them: it is all the same? In the measure in which our righteousness shrinks back, grace steps forward. Is that the true religion? Then Mrs. Harris is right, and there is no harm in her immoral conduct. Mercy will be sure to put it all right for her. But then, permit me to ask again: what is the use of the Divine commandments, if that is God's way?"

I looked at Mr. Scott, who, with a smile on his face, listened to our discussion in silence.

"Now, Mr. Scott, what do you say?" I asked.

"Why, Mr. Benjamins," said Mr. Scott, "I want you to answer your questions yourself. You are putting a serious difficulty before our mind. On one side there is the law of God, holy and good. On the other side there is the fact that we all transgress that law, and consequently deserve punishment. The question here rises: how are we to escape that punishment? The theory of God's mercy stepping in to make up for the deficit was proposed. But you have rejected that theory, on the ground of its making the law useless. Now, do you know any other theory that will satisfy an alarmed conscience? As for me, if a man has violated a law, I cannot see how he can escape the penalty unless mercy interpose. But perhaps you know another way?"

"I will by no means deny that mercy is required," replied the invalid. "On the contrary, both the Law and the Prophets declare, 'If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, who shall stand? But there is forgiveness with thee that thou mayest be feared.' But what perplexes my mind is the impossibility of finding out the condition upon which only mercy can be granted."

"If we repent and confess our sins, the Lord will forgive us," observed I.

"Yes, so our Bible tells us. When David said to Nathan, 'I have sinned against the Lord,' the prophet answered immediately, 'The Lord also hath put away thy sin: thou shalt not die.' But I cannot see how repentance can be a solid ground for the granting of mercy, unless that repentance be perfect and complete in every respect. But here again the question arises: where is the man who always manifests a perfect repentance? David may have shown such complete repentance in the case which I have just referred to. But was he always such a perfect penitent? If he was, he must have been a man of a different stamp from myself. I feel that I cannot always show such repentance as I suppose a holy and perfect God must require. I can understand how through the mercy of God repentance may make up for the transgression of the law in one or two cases; but how it can be a permanent ground for acquittal, I cannot make out."

"You are quite right," said Mr. Scott. "Mercy can never be the rule; it can only be the exception. Any state, kingdom, or society would be sure to break down if mercy and not justice were the foundation of its organisation. A king who in all cases allowed repentance to make up for the transgression of his law, would soon lose all his authority, because he would reduce his law to a mere nonentity, and himself to an object of derision. But I cannot see how God could allow repentance to make up for transgression even in one single case. I can understand how an earthly king can allow such a thing, because every earthly king is a trespasser himself, and not only a trespasser against the law of God, but against his own law. But God is a perfectly just king, and perfect justice excludes every idea of connivance at the transgression of the law. If such a connivance is once allowed, justice is violated, and it would make no alteration in the case, whether that connivance were repented of or not."

"Just so," exclaimed the Jew. "That's exactly what I always perceived. Justice and mercy may go together in man, because in man both justice and mercy are imperfect. But how in God mercy can be compatible with justice is a mystery to me. The one requires punishment, and the other requires acquittal, and both being perfect, the one cannot allow itself to be made imperfect by giving up a part of its claim in favour of the other.

"Still, it appears to me," said Mr. Scott, "that there is a way in which both may obtain their respective claims, and yet remain perfectly free from violation. Suppose a man is by the law sentenced to imprisonment till his debt is paid, and suppose the king, desiring to deliver him from that sentence, pays his debt. Will not both justice and mercy be satisfied in that case? We call such a proceeding substitution. Have you ever thought of that?"

"I have," replied the Jew. "You know our law is full of it. The whole system of sacrifices is based upon that principle. But I never could see how it could solve the difficulty we are speaking of at present. Can perfect justice permit the transgression of God's holy law to be made up for by the killing of an innocent unconscious animal in place of the transgressor?"

"I think not," replied Mr. Scott; "but suppose God himself came down on earth to be put to death instead of the guilty creatures whom He desired to save. Could justice object to such a solution of the difficulty?"

"God be put to death!" exclaimed the Jew, with an expression of utter amazement. He cast a grave inquisitive look at Mr. Scott, as if to ascertain whether he was in earnest.

"Of course it could only be possible if God became man," continued Mr. Scott. "I dare say you have often noticed, when reading Moses and the Prophets, that they point at that great unfathomable mystery which was one day to be realised, viz., the incarnation of God in the person of Israel's Messiah, David's great son."

The conversation now assumed the form of a sharp argument. The idea of such a thing as an incarnation of Jehovah appeared not only to be new to Benjamins' mind, but he even rejected it with signs of horror. He kept, however, within the boundaries of a regular and polite discussion, and allowed Mr. Scott full scope to state the doctrine of the Gospel on this fundamental point, and to show its congruity with the teaching of Moses and the Prophets. This was in so far blessed with success as it contributed much towards clearing away many erroneous opinions which Benjamins had picked up in his childhood about the "abominable idolatry of the Christians," and towards exciting his desire to become acquainted with the contents of the New Testament, of which I gave him a copy.

Before we left, Mr. Scott promised to repeat his visit, and Benjamins requested us, if possible, to do something for Abel.

"He is a good, honest, and diligent fellow," said he; "but the pity is, he has no regular employment, and this makes his mind unsettled. He wishes to marry a decent girl who lives here in the court, but I have hitherto been able to keep him from that, as I am sure it would only make another poor starving family. Besides, I wish he could return to his parents; but that cannot be, so long as his sister Dora is in the house. Dora is not what is called a 'bad woman.' She is young, and exceedingly light-minded; but if she were under good control, I believe she would not prove refractory. I have often spoken to her about her present conduct, and pointed her to the frightful consequences which must one day follow it in this life and in the life to come. Her eyes often fill with tears, and sometimes she sighs, 'I wish I were out of this house!' She fears, however, lest her parents should starve if she were to leave them. Besides, she does not know where to go, as she has learnt nothing except rambling about with the orange basket, and she has a baby to take care of, which she is much attached to. Her mother, too, lying, hypocritical, and flaunting as she is, has yet a few features in her character which give me ground to hope that she is not an irrecoverably wicked woman. I believe if Abel could be placed in such a position as to be able to support his parents, matters would greatly improve in that house, and I dare say in the whole of this court. For this family exercises a bad influence upon the inhabitants, owing to the sailors and soldiers, and loose lads whom the girl brings into the court."

Having safely groped our way down again, we were met by Abel, who asked us if we would mind visiting another invalid in the court. As we had still some time to spare, we followed him to a house on the opposite side, the ground-floor of which appeared to be a rag-store. The door was strongly barred inside, for locks were turned and chains unfastened before we could enter. Abel did not go in with us, but a tall stout man, who opened the door, guided us to the place we sought. We had to wind our way through heaps of articles of every possible description lying scattered about in strange confusion. At one glance I noticed watches, and spoons, and musical instruments, sailors' clothes and military uniforms, swords and rifles, compasses and chronometers, and—Bibles. The odious smell which pervaded the place was almost insupportable. We were glad to reach the stairs, which led us up to the back room of the first floor.

"Get out of the way," snarled our guide to two little children who, in their innocent play, blocked up the landing-place. The poor things pressed themselves to the wall in a fright. Our guide then ushered us into the back room, while he himself turned into the front one. We afterwards learnt that he was the landlord of the house, and the owner of the rag-store. The family whom we were going to visit were his tenants.

The room in which we now found ourselves presented an aspect of poverty, combined, however, with cleanliness and order. It scarcely contained any furniture, save a little table, a couple of wooden chairs, and a wooden bench. At the window sat a good-looking girl, about twenty, engaged in sewing. Two little boys, apparently about five or six, were rolling a ball across the floor. In a bed lay a sick woman of between forty and fifty. Her flushed face indicated that she was in a fever. Her pillow and blanket seemed quite new, and contrasted strangely with the poor aspect of the room. On a little stool before her bed were a few oranges, a pot with jelly, a paper bag apparently containing sugar, and a small decanter filled with a yellowish liquor, which looked like sherry or brandy. Poor as the place was, it contained nothing indicative of neglect. The floor was clean, and so was the furniture, and the dresses of the girl and the boys, though showing the effects of frequent use and mending, were yet without rents and stains.

"Hush! be quiet now," said the girl to the boys when we entered. She dropped a curtsey, and placing two chairs near the bed, invited us to be seated.

We soon got into conversation with the invalid, who proved an intelligent woman. She was a widow, who had lost her husband four years ago. The family had lived in Cheltenham, where her husband had been employed at the baths, and had been able to maintain his wife and children in pretty comfortable circumstances. At his death, being deprived of every means of subsistence, she had removed to London by the advice of their present landlord, Mr. Groves, who was a cousin of her late husband's, and an old bachelor. He had given her ten shillings a-week and the use of the room, for which she had to clean his room and cook his meals. Mary, her eldest daughter, also received from him twelve shillings a week for assisting him in the rag store. She had thus been able to keep herself and her five children in comparative comfort. But soon some disagreement had arisen between Mr. Groves and herself, owing to which Mary had withdrawn from the store. She was consequently thrown wholly upon her own ten shillings for support, to which, however, Mary added a few shillings, which she earned by sewing for the people in the court.

While she was telling this story, the merry noise of the two little girls playing on the landing-place was heard now and again.

"Mary, go and tell the girls not to make such a noise," she said to her daughter; "give them this orange, and let the boys have the other one."

"No, no, that shan't be," said Mary, proceeding to the door; "Mrs. Harris would scold me if she heard of it. She said decidedly that the oranges were all for you; she left a bag with dates for the children."

"Does Mrs. Harris visit you occasionally?" asked I.

"Very often, sir, and she always brings something in the shape of refreshment. She is a very kind-hearted person. Whatever may be said of her, there can be no doubt that she is the most compassionate person in the court. She cannot bear to see people in distress. She would give her last penny to help them. The other day, when she noticed the condition of my bed, she sent me her own pillow and blanket."

"How very strange!" said I, casting a look at Mr. Scott.

"I am afraid," replied Mr. Scott, "the poor woman fearfully misinterprets the text that 'Charity shall cover a multitude of sins.'"

"Why, if that is a text of the Bible," said the woman; "she will have a large cover for her sins, indeed."

"I am afraid that cover will not avail her much in the great day," said Mr. Scott; "since, in my opinion, the text means nothing else than this, that a person who is animated by the spirit of love, will not bring his neighbour's sins to light, but cover them up with the cloak of charity. The gospel teaches me that, with reference to our own sins, there is but one covering given that will stand the eternal judgment, viz., the atoning blood of Christ. I hope, my good woman, you are not ignorant of that great truth."

From the conversation that now ensued it appeared that Mrs. Jeffreys—that was the woman's name——knew very little of the way of salvation. Though she was the daughter of respectable parents belonging to the trading class, her religious training had been very defective, and her family life, though a pattern of order and decency, had, at the same time, been a very ignorant one as to things spiritual. She appeared remarkably well educated for a woman in her position, in so far as regarded the forms and fashions of social life; she was not unskilled in female handiwork, and could read and write perfectly well, while the way in which she expressed herself showed that the immense quantity of novels she had devoured from her youth upwards, had at least had a purifying influence upon her language and style.

"I am ashamed to confess that I have hitherto cared very little about religion," she said; "and perhaps I should not care about it even now, had not Abel spoken to me of your preaching, and told us you had said that we were lost for ever if we did not repent and turn to God. Now I felt that this was a grave saying, which set me thinking seriously, especially as the Jew Benjamins at the same time put some questions and made some observations which caused me to think very anxiously. For he said that God was a just and holy God, who was one day to call us to account for all our words and deeds, and he showed that we were not living up to his commandments."

"Certainly you are not," I said; "I noticed it directly on entering your room, for I saw your daughter engaged in sewing on the Lord's Day."

"Why, that's exactly one of the things which the Jew also spoke about. 'Look here,' he said, 'you, as a Christian woman, believe that the first day of the week is the Sabbath instituted by God, and yet you allow yourself to desecrate it by working just the same as on any other day of the week. How will you answer to God for that?' he asked. Now I could not say much to that; but, on the other hand, I answered that I hoped our Father in heaven would show us mercy, taking into account our position, as we must mend our own clothes and those of the children on Sunday, since we must sew for other people during the week. But he shook his head, and said, 'Mercy, mercy! you are just talking like Mrs. Harris. You Christian people seem to think that our good Lord will allow you to come before Him with divers weights as you use them in your shops, and that if you make up for Him the full weight by your works, you may throw as much of mercy into the scale as will put the balance right.' But, sir, what are we to do? If the Lord has no mercy upon us, we are lost, all of us, ain't we?"

"Certainly," replied I; "every morsel of bread which we eat is a gift of God, which we have not deserved. But since God is so merciful towards us, we ought to serve Him all the more faithfully, and avoid everything that gives Him cause of discontent."

"Yes, so we should," answered Mrs. Jeffreys, "but circumstances are so trying in this world, sir, that we are often compelled to do what we feel we ought not."

"But if we do good only when it is easy, we are bad Christians," said I. "True religion consists in suffering and making sacrifices, rather than acting against our consciences."

"That's exactly like the Jew again, isn't it, Mary?" said the invalid, turning her head towards her daughter.

"Just like him," answered Mary; "I believe he is a better Christian than we are, though he is a Jew."

"Why, sir," continued the mother, "I will tell you what the matter is. Mary, as I told you, was engaged by my cousin, Mr. Groves, for the rag-store, but it was soon evident that he wanted her more especially to attract the sailors and soldiers to his shop. Her position became very dangerous, but I did not know what to do, as our livelihood depended chiefly upon her earnings, and Mrs. Harris said I should not be too particular about what young people were about, since we ourselves had once been young and merry. Still, Mary was quite wretched and miserable; but she submitted, poor thing, as she knew that there was no help for it. But one day Mr. Benjamins came up and spoke to me; nay, he remonstrated with me, and said that I must break it off at once, if I did not want to get God's wrath poured out upon my head, and that it was better even to starve with a good conscience, than to sin and to grow rich by it. And he came again and again, and left us no rest, till we yielded, and Mary gave up her situation, which she was but too happy to do. He also spoke to Mr. Groves, and showed him that the way in which he conducted his trade was unjust and ruinous to the young people, but Mr. Groves got angry and turned him out of the house, and from that time Benjamins has not been allowed to step over our threshold. Unfortunately, a few days after that occurrence the police came into the shop seeking after some stolen property which my cousin had bought,—not knowing, however, that it was stolen. The whole store was carefully searched in consequence, and my cousin has had many a visit of the police since. He believes that Benjamins played him that trick for vengeance, and so does the whole court. The people are exasperated against the Jew, though I am assured he is as innocent as a new-born baby."

"Your cousin seems to be a hard man," said Mr. Scott.

"Why, sir, he is not so bad as many take him for. His besetting sin is greed. He must be a wealthy man from all I can gather, but he lives like a poor beggar. On the other hand he is not altogether void of humanity, else he would have turned us out as well as Benjamins. He even said to me the other day, 'Why, Mrs. Jeffreys, I believe that after all you were right in taking Mary away from the store. She is better where she is now.' 'Thank you, Mr. Groves,' said I, 'but it is a hard thing for us to have lost her earnings, and I wish you would think of raising my allowance instead.' 'Oh, no,' said he, 'I cannot think of that, but I will remember Mary in my will.'"

"What is his age?" asked I.

"Between sixty and seventy, and he is not very strong. Still, he may live many a year yet; cracked china lasts longest, the proverb says."

"And who has taken Mary's place in the shop?"

"Nobody. He has an old servant, who lives in the room over this, a cripple, who lost his leg in India, and has a small pension. I am afraid, however, that the poor fellow has spent his last day in the shop, for he fell sick a week ago, and the doctor has given up all hope. This puts my cousin out very much, as he must now do all the work alone, and it will knock him up altogether, unless he engages an assistant. But he will not easily come to do that, as he trusts nobody, and suspects every one who enters his shop."

"Ah, he couldn't do better than take Abel," quoth Mary; "but he is too stingy to be willing to pay his wages. He could not have a more honest servant than him."

"Of course not," said Mrs. Jeffreys.

"Did you ever suggest the thing to Mr. Groves?" asked Mr. Scott.

"I did, sir, but he would not listen to it. He thinks it is an invention of Mary's to get married to Abel."

"Oh, mother!" cried Mary; "you shouldn't tell such things. It's all nonsense."

"Why, child, nonsense or no, it is a fact that he thinks so; and perhaps he is not so far from the mark as you would make us believe he is."

Mary's face turned crimson all over. She left the room to look after the children on the landing.

"She is such a good girl," said Mrs. Jeffreys, while her eyes brightened up with enthusiasm. "But for her, sir, we should have been in the workhouse long since. She works day and night for us, and at the same time teaches the children. Will you believe, sir, that that little boy, the oldest of the two, who is only seven, can already read a page? Johnny, take your book, and read a few lines to the gentleman."

Johnny disappeared behind a curtain which concealed a corner of the room, where, as I understood, the children's beds were placed. He soon re-appeared with a New Testament, similar to those of which I had noticed a dozen on a shelf in the rag store.

"Come," said his mother, kindly beckoning to him. He overcame his bashfulness, and taking his stand by the bed, turned up a page, and read with considerable fluency a few verses of the Gospel of St. John.

"Ah, but you can read much better," said his mother proudly, stroking his hair; "only he is rather shy, sir. He never read anything to anybody else but ourselves. Now Johnny, take this orange, you have done very well, and give the half of it to your brother."

"No, I'd rather not," said Johnny, shaking his head in a determined way. "It isn't for us; we've got our dates."

"Ay, sir, they are just like their sister," said Mrs. Jeffreys. "It is wonderful how she manages to keep them in order. And they are so fond of her! You have no conception of it."

"There is a great power in love," said Mr. Scott, in a voice indicative of deep emotion. "You see, Mrs. Jeffreys, your children obey your daughter in everything because they love her. This is the key to the riddle which perplexes Mr. Benjamins and so many others. If we love God truly, we shall with pleasure keep His commandments. Love, Scripture says, is the fulfilling of the law. The great question only is: how to come to such a state of mind that we can love God with all our heart and with all our strength."

"It would be a grand thing," said Mary, who had re-entered the room; "wouldn't it, mother?"

"I think I could love God with all my heart, child," replied Mrs. Jeffreys; "but you know there are so many distractions and trials in this life."

"Please tell me why you think you could love God?" asked Mr. Scott.

"Why, sir, because He is our Creator and Benefactor. He sends us his blessings every day, doesn't He?"

"Yes; and so He has been doing all your life long, from the moment you were born up to the present day. And yet, as I may gather from what you told me about your own history, you have cared very little about Him, and lived as if He did not exist."

"True," said she, with a scarcely audible voice.

"I think something more than merely temporal blessings is required to make us truly love God," observed I. "It is a sad fact, but a fact it is, that the longer we enjoy God's perishable benefits, the more we get into the habit of forgetting our benefactor, unless a desire for better than earthly gifts drive us towards Him."

"We shall never come to love God with all our heart," said Mr. Scott, "until we come to look upon Him as our Saviour from everlasting perdition. I remember having once spent an evening with a friend of mine, a wealthy merchant, at his place in Herts. The subject of our conversation was what we are speaking about just now. 'Nothing is able to enkindle such cordial love as salvation,' said my friend. 'I saw that truth confirmed the other day in the conduct of my gardener. Though he earned high wages and I gave him many a present, yet he always continued a selfish, cold-hearted fellow. He did just his duty, but nothing more, and never showed me any sign of personal attachment. But one day I happened to be walking alongside the pond, when he had taken a boat to recover a ball which his little boy while playing had thrown into it. Unfortunately he overbalanced himself, and fell into the middle of the pond, where it is very deep. Of course, I flung off my coat, jumped in, and, though with considerable difficulty, succeeded in bringing him safe ashore. From that day he is quite a changed man to me. He is the best, the most willing and faithful, of all my servants. He does not know what to do to please me, and if he can only guess some desire which I cherish, he is sure to have it fulfilled long before I think of telling him of it. Formerly he often grumbled when I required him to do anything beyond the usual course of labour; but I do not believe that I could now bid him do anything, however out of the way, which it would not be a pleasure for him to do.' I have often since then thought of that story of my friend. It so clearly illustrates the effect of God's saving love in Christ upon our hearts. He sent his only begotten Son into the world to suffer and to die for us on the cross. He thus rescued us from the everlasting misery which we had brought upon ourselves through our sins. If we believe that with our heart, we cannot but love Him with all the affections of our soul. We become changed men. We begin to adore and to rejoice in Him, because we were lost and He saved us even at the cost of his blood."

"That's just what Abel said to us the other day, do you remember, mother?" said Mary. "If Christ had not suffered and died on the cross," he said, "we should be hanging there now and for ever."

"Yes, he said so, child; but you recollect what Benjamins said. 'That could not be,' said he, 'for it would be a gross injustice to allow an innocent man to be hung instead of the guilty one.' And Abel could not answer him there. Oh, he is sharp, the Jew is."

"But I think I can solve that difficulty," said Mr. Scott. "If Jesus were only a common man like us, Mr. Benjamins would be right; but Jesus is God himself, the Creator of all of us, the eternal Lawgiver and Judge, and He became man for the express purpose of bearing the sentence of his own law in our stead. He did not lay that sentence upon another man, but He took it upon Himself. Now, had He not a right to do so? Was there any injustice in that? Was it not all boundless love and mercy?"

Mrs. Jeffreys appeared quite struck with that explanation. "Oh! I see, I see it now," she said, clasping her hands in wonder and delight. Mr. Scott then added a few observations, which he corroborated by reading a portion of the fifth chapter of the Romans.

"Sir," whispered Mary to Mr. Scott, as we went out, "I am so glad you spoke to my mother. I hope you will come back soon; we are so ignorant, you know."

* * * * *

About twelve months after my visit to the court I was sitting one day on the platform of the Crystal Palace line, and who should sit opposite to me but Mr. Benjamins. I scarcely recognised him, so different was he from the pale-faced invalid I had seen in the court. He looked quite a gentleman, and was buoyant with health.

"And how are matters going on in the court?" I inquired.

"Oh, we left it three months ago," he answered. "Didn't Mr. Scott tell you?"

"I haven't seen Mr. Scott since I was with him in the court that Sunday."

"Well, then, I must tell you what has happened. Great changes have taken place since you saw us. First, Mr. Groves died, and, picture to yourself the amazement of the court people when it was known that he had bequeathed all his property to Mary. She married Abel, and the rag-store was transplanted to Shoreditch. Abel insisted upon my becoming his partner, as I am well acquainted with the old clothes trade, and we there carry on a thriving business under the firm of Harris & Co. Of course, Mrs. Jeffreys and the children live with them."

"And Abel's parents, what has become of them?" asked I.

"They live in the country, where Abel supports them. His sister Dora married a sailor, and emigrated with him to Australia.

"And you yourself," asked I, "what are you—a Jew or a Christian?"

But here the train came up, and I had to get in. While I was standing ready to enter he whispered into my ear,—

"I hope to meet you when we see Him whom we have pierced."

MARY OF MAGDALA.

It is by a singular fate that of the few women mentioned in the Gospels, two of the most famous should have become blended into one. The woman of artless purity has been merged in the fallen woman of shame; and the sinner at a passing feast has borrowed a history from the tried disciple of Jesus. She who first wept for the dead upon the Cross, has been held one with her whose tears were open penitence for public guilt; and she whose name was mercifully spared, has borrowed a name that is emblazoned in the saddest and noblest charities of Christendom. And yet, at first sight, nothing would seem easier than to separate them. The one is of no certain city, the other of Magdala: the one is a nameless and sudden apparition, "a moment seen, then gone for ever," the other is always mentioned by name, and becomes a constant follower of the Lord: the one is pure, the other impure: the one is healed of a mental disease, the other is cleansed from moral taint: the one is the companion of honourable and pious women, and assumes a public place beside the Saviour; the other shrinks into a privacy that shuns the public gaze. Not only are there these well-marked distinctions, but each has a sufficient history of her own. There was no need to find a preface for the Magdalen's, nor a close for the sinner's: each is rounded off and complete. For the poor woman that wept at Simon's, that story is all we care to know. She had sinned, and was forgiven. Let the happy life pass into friendly obscurity, let her go in peace, and let the music of that peaceful heart steal out, like the nightingale's song in the twilight and from the shade. And for the brave and tender woman that watched the sepulchre, her life does not commence for us till Christ has swept the chords of it with his wonderful words, and the devil has left her free to minister to Him who is the devil's Lord. But somehow the two have grown together into one, and art and legend have helped in the confusion, and century has passed down the tradition to century till it has entered into the very heart of the Church. It may have been from the feeling, true in the main, that where the devil holds the heart the life itself will be devilish—that she, from whom seven devils were cast out, must have been a greater sinner than others. It may have been that history must fain attach itself to a name; that the nameless ones die and make no sign; that as the story seized hold of men, the woman of the one chapter became the Mary of the other. It may have been from the deep, passionate love common to them both. However it has happened, associations have gathered round the union too deep to be altogether displaced. Hospitals will still be raised for the worst of human maladies, and bear the Magdalen's name; Correggios and Titians of the future will paint the Magdalen's penitence; a Magdalen will still stand for the most pathetic type of a woman's travail and sorrow; and frailty and shame and dishonour will still fling their shadow on the Magdalen's life. If we are to conceive her as she appears in the Scriptures, we must release our minds from these powerful associations of centuries. We shall find that though the real features of her life are cast into shadow by the unreal, yet they are vividly and touchingly pourtrayed; that while history may break down a romance, or sweep away a legend, its office is to rescue character and restore it, to set it in its true and natural lights. The sinner that crept into the Pharisee's house loses nothing by being detached from the Magdalen, but rather gains; for there is a painful inconsistency—a want of feminine and delicate feeling—in setting one like her to the prominent part the other plays. And if the Magdalen loses the pathos and tragic interest of the prodigal's return, her life is beautiful and sufficient in itself. Her character is not painted with the tone and fidelity of a portrait. It is etched in a few clear and well-cut lines. It is with her as with many who were grouped about Christ. When the sunbeams march through a wood, a leaf here, and there a blade of grass, leap out and sparkle in the light; and, as Christ passed among men, the light from Him was ever bringing out some characters into a moment's clearness. We know nothing of them till at his passage they start upon our sight: when He has passed, they disappear. In such brief illumination Mary stood more than once.

I.

Of all the towns that lay thick about the Sea of Galilee, there is only one that presents any considerable remains. A ruined tower not far from the lake, a limestone cliff close by, a solitary thorn and beneath it a rush of limpid water—this is Magdala, the village of the tower, the Castletown as we would call it now. Jesus once disembarked near it on his way from Cesarea Philippi, and his foot may have often wandered through the quiet village street, for it lay close by his favourite shore and a few miles from his favourite city, and in a region of which we read more than once that Jesus went through it, teaching and healing. And here there lived a certain Mary, called in the Gospels Mary Magdalen, or Mary of Magdala, to distinguish her from other Marys there recorded—chief among them the Lord's mother, the mother of James, and the sister of Lazarus. We may conjecture that her social position was good. She is associated with a lady of the court, and her means enabled her to minister out of her substance to Jesus when living, and to purchase the costly spices for his embalming when dead. Her very freedom to follow Him implies a position of some independence. But the Scripture fixes our attention upon her unhappy sufferings. She was possessed with seven devils. We may but faintly picture the misery of this mysterious disease. Some of the possessed behaved like violent maniacs; some were seized at intervals with fits like epilepsy; moody silences alternated with loud menaces and blasphemy; sometimes mere boys were afflicted, sometimes delicate women. There was in all a mental confusion, a divided consciousness, a sense, possibly acute, of being in the thraldom of an evil spirit. Madness might produce the same mental wreck, epilepsy might be as painful to witness; but there was added here the horror of an actual Satanic agency. Nor was there any disease so inveterate, if not incurable. When the disciples returned from their mission, they singled out with wonder that even the devils were subject unto them. And Mary's case was aggravated: she was held, not by one devil but by many. It was so unusual that she became known as the woman out of whom the Lord had cast seven devils; for Jesus had healed her. Whether it was on some visit to Magdala, or at Capernaum, a few miles off, is but conjecture. Somewhere His eye had rested on her; in the skirt of a crowd, or in the sad home where she lived, or passing up the little village. Somewhere his word had reached her heart, and the devils had fled at his bidding, and the balance had returned to her mind, and the mad, unsteady fires were quenched in her eye, and the delicate womanly feeling had come back. It was a great epoch in her life, a recovery of herself beyond all hope.

Nor was it for herself alone. Distinct from all the cries of physical pain, there is a sad and bitter cry of mental anguish that rises over the restless tides of life. The strain of nerve and intellect demanded in these latter days is often greater than can be borne. There are minds overtaxed with thought, hearts overburthened with care, weary spirits crushed and wounded in the crowd. Before the silver cord is loosed, or the golden bowl is broken, the brain may have ceased to work, and the will may have lost its power. We carry on life at a pressure that is just a little on the side of safety, when a little extra speed will end in ruin. There are also temperaments that will be always exposed to more anxiety and haste than others, that exist in a world of care of their own creating, quick to catch the faintest alarm, pained, harassed, and wearing themselves swiftly out. And if bodily suffering, or over-effort, or the troubles of life, threaten, as we sometimes say, to drive men mad; there is a disease, only less awful than Mary's, that preys as hers did, not upon the strength, but the reason; there are those melancholy wrecks of souls, our idiots and our lunatics, whose affliction is so terrible that even if we could always discover, we scarce care to ask by what cause it came. It is for all these that Christ in this miracle vindicates his supremacy as the Healer, not of the body only, but of the mind and spirit. He, whose words had power over the Magdalene, lives still among men in the labours and triumphs of his people, in that kindlier and truer treatment of the insane, and those methods of skilful, patient, and unselfish Christian charity which draw their suggestion, impulse, and faith from Him, and by which these, apparently as good as dead, are often brought back to life. It is still his voice that will first call order out of their confusion; it is round his love that their first clear thoughts will rally ;* it is by faithful bringing of them to Him that we may still hope for their healing ;

"Till by such chords as rule the choirs above,
Their lawless cries are tuned to hymns of perfect love."

It is He, too, who must cool the fever of the aching restless heart. He is ever passing through the surging crowd of men, to heal them of their smitten haggard life. Cumbered and oppressed with many things, their faculties and strength at the extremest tension, their brain vexed and unsettled by the never-ending whirl, a pressure put upon them that they were not meant to bear, in Him they may have rest, and at his word and fixed look some one is ever stepping out of the worry and fret of earthly things into the calm of heaven. Or when, under sudden and overwhelming calamity, or the utter blight of hope, the reason has been felt to totter, it is they that trust in the Lord that find in quietness and confidence their strength. He who owns the grace to help holds also the power. Mental maladies may be the more subtle, mental suffering more acute, and the mind that preys morbidly upon itself may despair of relief. Yet this whole inner kingdom of the man is as much under the control of Christ as the outer, either to deliver it from the grasp of Satan, or to build up in it peace, faith, and joy.

II.

When we next see Mary she is with Jesus. Joanna, the wife of one of Herod's officers, some unknown Susanna, and other women minister to Him ; and Mary of Magdala is among them, and occupies a prominent place. It was not a new thing when they followed Him, for Jewish women had already followed their favourite teachers. There was nothing unwomanly in it, no sin against the custom of society, no singularity. If ever there was a plea for singularity, it was the presence of Jesus. If He was teaching, what was to hinder any one from listening to his words? A passing show will draw the woman from her wheel, the workman from his bench, the housewife to her door ; and when this heavenly show appears, when Jesus, from the bosom of Infinite God speaks audibly upon the earth, for short space of three years, who would bar the hearing of Him by some conventionalism of society? Yet these women need no plea. Even when He was among men, it was true that "The trivial round, the common task,

Would furnish all we ought to ask."

He could be served and followed without violating one social rule. Nor is it till we have exhausted every open and permitted service that we can plead entire excuse for disregarding current social restraints. The Christian life that shows eccentricity and defies public opinion, does not draw its inspiration so direct from Christ as that which hallows every simple duty and glows under every restriction. Jesus was not ambitious to be followed by a crowd. Those who claimed a place by his side He mostly sent back to the homelier work of their calling and neighbourhood. Mary of Bethany may well have loved as deep as Mary of Magdala, but she abode in her own house. There must have been a freedom from home ties that allowed the Magdalen to choose this blessed part. For it was not a mere following of Jesus, an overmastering curiosity, a restlessness for "fresh fields and pastures new," an eager hanging on his lips, but a quiet loving ministry ; not only to receive but to give. On no other condition does it seem that it would have been accepted. The follower of Jesus is always his minister.

Gratitude had bound this band of women together. They had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities. Jesus had ministered to them of that wealth of infinite love and power which no gold or silver could purchase, and they in turn ministered to Him of that substance which was necessary for his wants. It was with them that Mary fitly took her place. As the blessed company went throughout every city and village, preaching and showing the glad tidings of the kingdom of God, she was ever by his side. We cannot distinctly trace her steps ; but we are left to imagine her where the Scripture places her, watching and hearing whatever was done or said. And, no doubt it was thus out of personal intercourse that her love gained the strength that has made her eminent above all women but one.

This life, briefly passed over, is the first glimpse we have into the service of women in the Church. An apostle is sent to preach, a woman follows to minister. There must be many who, like the Magdalen, have no pressing duties at home, whose life is free, whose gratitude to their Saviour is deep, who, in this, may take her for their pattern. There is open to them a more direct service of Him, a following and ministry as peculiar and no less rich in blessing. His wants on earth were few, and it needed few to supply them ; nor could his higher wants be met by human service. For sympathy, strength, and consolation He fell back on One only, the Father. For there was a profound sense in which He above all came not to be ministered unto but to minister. It is otherwise with his brethren. They are dependent upon earthly help as well as heavenly, and for the very offices that could not be paid to Him. They can not only be clothed, fed, and visited, but comforted, cheered, and quickened, and with the same certainty that inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these My brethren, ye have done it unto Me. While one or two sufficed for Him, they are so many that no one can stand idle. There is here a door flung open, a way of blessing cleft through toil and pain and sorrow, a path that Dorcas trod, and Phœbe, the servant of the Church at Cenchrea, and many a godly woman since. It is not for the few who have substance, but for the many who have only love. It is the woman's place and privilege, meet for her modesty and self-sacrifice, requiring her tenderness and delicate intuitive perception, service more of personal affection than of duty or abstract right, and in which, by a thousand nameless offices, she may show herself a follower of the Lord without violating one instinct of feminine reserve.

* "The same children who do not know whether a shoe ought to be on the foot or on the head, or who, if not prevented, would, like animals, walk on all fours and lick the dust, may yet sometimes be heard ejaculating, Mon Dieu ! Prends pitié de moi ! J'en ai bien besoin." See Mr. de Liefde's Visit to Laforce in his "Charities of Europe," vol. ii., p. 451.

III.

From Galilee Jesus had gone up for the last time to Jerusalem. The events of the last days crowded rapidly one upon the other—addresses to the people, quiet evenings at Bethany, sad prophecy from the brow of Olivet, and farewell words of consolation to his disciples. There was the supper with its acts of solemn import; the night at Gethsemane, with the prayer, and the awful agony, and the drops of blood, and above, the silent watching stars; there was the hasty tramp of the mob over the grass, there were the lanterns flashing upon the traitor's ken, the wild scene of tumult at the judgment hall, and the meek and royal Saviour buffeted, scourged, mocked, the butt of rude soldiers' jests, crowned with thorns, sentenced amid thirsty cries for blood, and then toiling up his Via dolorosa, bent beneath the cross and faint and bleeding. And the crosses were raised upon the low hill, and Jesus and the thieves hung there all the long Friday—and the disciples had fled. No bands of children sung Hosannas; no multitude did Him reverence; apostles denied Him. But Mary of Magdala stood beside the cross. The woman's terror vanished before the woman's strength of love; the gibes of the rough men, the arms of the soldiers, the fury of the mob, were nothing to her then compared with Him. The three Marys clustered round the spot where He was dying. One of them was losing her mysterious Son, the others their Friend, Teacher, Saviour; their Hope and very Life was bleeding there to death on that accursed tree, and they could not stay his death by an hour. But they clung to Him in mute, affectionate defiance. The day darkens over with portentous eclipse; the very sun will not witness innocent blood like this; shadows and portents gather round the cross; the heat of a brooding earthquake fills the air. On the cross all is silent. Mary, the Virgin Mother, has been led away by the tender eagerness of John. The other women have moved off and form a group apart, of which Mary of Magdala is still the chief; and as the sun breaks out on the hushed crowd, and shoots his level rays through the red air, Jesus breaks the silence with his last psalm. Even He in dying will draw his words and consolation from the book where it is written. Emboldened by the light the mockers renew their torture, till a cry more terrible pierces the very heavens, and Jesus gave up the ghost. The earthquake heaves and rumbles, and rends the soil in chasms, and opens the yawning graves; the veil of the temple is rent from top to bottom; the pagan soldiers bow before these visible signs of awe and majesty. And Mary is still beholding, now afar off. Her figure is the last we see. Every incident of that terrible agony has been scarred upon her heart. Earthquake, and portent, and sultry ominous air are nothing to her who has lost her all in Him. She stands there against the sky, a weird and spectral figure, immobile as stone.

She had followed Jesus to the last. She cannot have been unfamiliar with the hopes of his disciples, the longings of his nation. She most probably had witnessed that triumphant progress by which He entered Jerusalem, like a king, although but a Nazarene and a carpenter's son. If the disciples already strove about their dignity in the new Messianic kingdom; if Salome, her companion, had made bold to ask high places for her sons, she, too, must have had brilliant dreams, in which the stately pictures of the prophets blended with the actual facts, and that impression that Jesus left on them that loved Him. She had seen these visions melt away: whatever hope had sustained her when she heard of the arrest, the trial, and the sentence, had ebbed as she watched the cross. It was now a double trial of faith and love. Her mind might well be bewildered, for He that should be the Messiah, the Prince, had succumbed to wicked men, and no miracle had been wrought for his deliverance; while her heart was wrung by witnessing his anguish, and then by knowing He was dead. She had nothing to rest on but her love. It was her great strength now. Her soul grew filled with the one image of Him. His death could make no difference in her affection, and if prophecies and hopes grew indistinct and confused, He was clear. She might say, like the blind man, One thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see. The kingdom, the future, the glory faded out as the sun went down; but nothing could rob her of her knowledge of Him whose words had brought her peace, whose steps she had watched, up to whom her love had daily passed, till now, in his death, it was the one precious treasure she had left.

What Mary learned at the cross, we may have to learn. Those who seek Christ, are sure to find also Calvary. Whether by his purity of character, graciousness of teaching, his self-sacrifice, or the just reverence of centuries men are drawn to Him, they cannot know Him till they see Him on the cross, the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. It is not to his life, but to his death, the thoughts of men must gravitate. He has said Himself, I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto Me. It does not lie in the power of his example to do that. The higher an example rises, it rises into solitude; and simply to follow Christ would reveal such incapacity of ours, such successive failure, increasing not diminishing in degree, such difficulty steadily augmenting in proportion as his character grew upon the soul in all its simple, faultless grandeur, that men would retire, awed, hopeless, and repelled. The very power to follow would be denied them, for that power lies in being justified by faith, by his blood. United to Him by faith, they are not copyists of outward acts that must always and infinitely transcend the best of theirs, but out of their living union a life is fashioned that, short as it falls of his in details, is like his in kind, in impulse and character and aim. And by that sacrificial death that secures their pardon and peace, and the washing away of their sins, the burden of their failures and shortcomings is removed before it crushes them into despair. It is thus at the cross and by faithful daily looking to Him who hung there, that we learn to say for ourselves, or can point others and say, Ecce Homo. Nor can Christ be followed without the cross at the end of it. At some point the way will lead us there; and we must then take up the cross and follow further. It may even be that, like Mary, we fall into darkness, our hopes disappointed, our services unrewarded by the visions we expected, and we stand baffled, all that was so plain grown mysterious, the very doctrines we have built on looking uncertain and almost shadowy. Well for us, then, if, like Mary, we can claim at least our love of Him, and fall upon our personal knowledge, and go back tenderly, even with tears, over the way the Lord hath led us till He has altogether filled our heart with Himself.

IV.

We left Mary watching the cross—when we see her again she is watching the sepulchre. The body has been taken down and wrapped in linen. Joseph and Nicodemus, the two timid and secret disciples, have begged it of Pilate. John is tending the stricken mother, through whose soul the sword has pierced at last. Peter may be weeping in shame over his sins, and downcast, as is the case with impulsive men in moments of reaction. Judas has gone out in moody isolation, the prey of a remorse more bitter than Cain's. The rest are still scattered like sheep without a shepherd. But the women are true. Spices have been hurriedly bought and laid in the grave with the poor dead body. And when the men have done their best, and the hasty funeral is over, and the great stone is rolled to the door of the sepulchre, the two Marys sit over against it watching. A stone had been rolled against their hearts, heavy and immovable as the stone that sealed the grave. He lay buried there, with the rich in his death. The Magdalen would never hear his voice again. The echoes it had woke, the music it had stirred, were dumb. She had followed Him to the last: brave, true woman in her utter forgetfulness of self. But she would follow Him no longer. The hands that she had seen laid on the sick and lifted up in blessing, the feet that she had followed through many a thankless village and over many a weary road, the eyes that had searched into the hidden depth of her soul, the lips that had uttered such gracious and pitiful and blessed words, all, all were still! She sat and brooded, lost in thought,—lost to the setting sun and the coming Sabbath, to the loneliness of the garden, to all but the dead that lay behind the stone. Her hopes, her brightened life, her happiness, her spiritual sunshine were buried with Him there.

In all this we seem to understand Mary of ourselves. There are curious identities with these experiences of hers. There are days when Christ seems to have been buried out of sight. His power, that might have rescued us, seems asleep. His words, that might have comforted us, seem unspoken. The world seems to have lost his guiding, our life to have lost his presence. We see the point at which He left us; and we sit and watch there as by a sepulchre. There is nothing so natural. Yet even thus we may have that love, gained from knowledge, that prevents us losing hold of everything: that keeps us still attached to Him: that preserves us from that utter shipwreck when hope and faith and love are lost together. We, indeed, know what had not yet been revealed to Mary, that this disappearance of the Lord can be only for a season; that He is risen; that when the sun sets and disappears it is no more dead and vanished from the sky than Christ when He set in the darkness of the grave. She had but her love, and with that she strengthened her heart. Of itself, it is much. It takes us beyond the aspect of visible things, and out of the play of circumstance and the desolations of life; it makes us for the moment feel as if they were not. And, as we retrace each step and recal each word, the love that blessed us then blesses us still, deathless and ever-present. If He has been withdrawn or hidden, it may sometimes be wisest to let love lead us back, to remember what He has been, to let each incident burn slowly by this fire of sorrow into our soul. At least, we may gain strength for the time of darkness and a light to lighten it. We may gather up reverently the fragments of that great feast of love whereof we have already been partakers; or as gleaners search over the field to gather a single ear, where in reaping we had gathered sheaves. These solemn, brooding moments at the breaks of life are not profitless; it may be that sometimes a break is suffered to induce them; that we have been in danger of thinking, or loving, or depending too little; or that our love needs be tested and purged. The more Mary loved, though her love seemed so suddenly thrust into the past, her loss grew the less bitter, and she addressed herself to the duties of the present; nor will it be different with us. Yet we have other strength and consolation than she could claim. Whatever life may say, Christ is not dead out of it. We have but to wait for his reappearing. No helplessness of ours, no chain of sorrow narrowing in upon us like a fate, no unanswered prayers, no delays, no feeling of utter solitude can prove that He is not living, that He will not come. They may come to try, but not to destroy our faith. If we sometimes sit, gazing at the tomb, a brief night may alter all; and, be the night short or long, we know there is a morning.

V.

Mary sitting at the grave is the very type and embodiment of woe; the last time we meet her she is the very type and beauty of a holy joy.

There are duties that must needs be done in the very midst of sorrow, that, however we recoil from them at the time, are a merciful relief. Mere brooding grief is not healthy; it approaches too near self-indulgence. We would fain let sorrow crush us down, let the hand drop, and the heart pine undisturbed. And by the round of life God is calling us away, breaking the force of the blow, teaching us to remember that if we suffer, we must also live and do; that action—resolute, gentle, and composed, is the noblest attitude of grief. Mary might have sat far into the night but that the dead required other memory than tears and stillness and thought. Spices had still to be bought against the first day of the week, for those that had been used were only enough for the time, too hurriedly procured to be complete; they had to be bought before the sun set and the Sabbath commenced. The Sabbath followed; and the Pharisees went to the Temple; the soldiers lounged about the streets; the mob that cried Crucify Him yesterday, sang the Psalms to-day; but up on Calvary, the grass was still soaking with the innocent blood.

In the early morning of the first day Mary was by the sepulchre again. The women were to meet and perform the last sacred offices; to anoint Him with sweet spices before his burial. As the sun rose an angel descended from Heaven, with a countenance like lightning, and raiment white as snow. He rolled away the stone from the empty tomb, and the guards became as dead men. Little wonder that when they recovered from their terror, they fled into the city from the awful place. But, as they rushed away in fear, the women were approaching by another path, terrified neither by the hour, nor by their errand, only sadly wondering, Who will roll away the stone? Mary, who was with them, seems to have reached the first; for no haste could keep pace with the eagerness of her love. The angel was by the grave, and splendours of Heaven were there about him; but the dead face hung before her mind; she had eyes for nothing else; she could only see that the body was not there. Coarse hands might have been laid upon Him: malice and persecution might have followed Him even to the tomb; He might have been conveyed to some public and dishonoured sepulture. Panic-stricken, she hurried back to seek help from Peter and John. Of the angel, of the stone rolled away, she could tell nothing. But her sharp, hasty cry was enough: They have taken away the Lord. The two fiery, impetuous apostles were the last men to loiter. A few minutes brought them to the spot, John's love outstripping Peter's ardour. A few glances satisfied them of the facts, Peter's ardour leading him to an inspection from which John's love shrunk. It was plain that something extraordinary had happened, that the worst was true, and the grave actually rifled; yet with circumstances puzzling and unaccountable. Like men, they went to seek help and counsel, to put their puzzled thoughts together. Like a woman, Mary, however, hovered round the spot. The profound, hungry love that drew her there when it was yet dark, kept her there now. The other women had gone, and the sun was up, and shining on Jerusalem. In the quiet garden nook the fresh, crisp morning air whispered through the olives, and the peace of the day-break was unbroken. In the grave itself there was no sign of haste or struggle, but order and repose, from the linen cloths and the napkins to the sitting angels. Nothing broke the calm but Mary's weeping. There was the very spot where she had sat and watched; there the head was laid, and there the feet. Could it be an illusion, a wild, feverish dream? And she stooped down and looked in; and it was all true. Though she saw the angels she expressed no surprise; when they spoke to her she replied with the transparent simplicity of a child. Love had lifted her above the sense of loneliness, the repulsion of the grave, and even the natural awe of the supernatural. The empty space, the vanished body, were uppermost in her thoughts. Jesus was her Lord still, and she could not rest till she found Him. In all the range of human love there is surely nothing more irresistibly pathetic than the wail of the sad woman for the dead body of her Saviour. It was at this moment that Jesus revealed Himself; and it is true to the absorbing power of her grief that, as with the angels, so in Him she saw only some possible clue to her loss. He might be the gardener; the very man by whose order the removal had been made. She could almost forgive him if he would tell her where the body was laid; she makes the passionate offer, far beyond a woman's strength, that if it was not worthy to rest there, she would bear it herself to some modest and undesecrated resting-place. And all the while her tears were falling like the rain, till through the wailing sobs she heard a sudden sound, a tone, a word, that brought up all the past; there was a flash of memory that revealed Magdala and the blue sea of Galilee, and the day when He passed by and healed with a word the poor demoniac; and, looking up, she saw Him in that one gentle word He spoke, that old familiar Mary, to which, in answer, sprang unbidden to her lips the quick Rabboni.

> "My Master!
> As ambergris leaves a rich scent unto the taster,
> So do these words a sweet content,
> An Oriental fragrancy."

The interview was brief. She would have detained and clung to Him, followed and clove to Him as before. Gently and with solemn loving words, He set before her that his stay on earth was short, that its conditions were changed, that He could no longer be ministered unto. Gently, with delicate compensation for her disappointment, He showed her that her ministry must be for Him to others. She was to be the first to carry tidings of his resurrection: Go to my brethren and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and to my God and your God. We dare not follow her as she went and told them. Her joy is too solemn for intrusion. Alone, with that blessed mystery of a living Jesus, she must have hasted on her errand scarce knowing herself for joy. Had she not been so eager, she might have grieved less, for the angel's words would have saved her the agony of suspense: had she not loved with that passionate strength she might have missed her reward. We can watch her to the upper room, we may fancy we see her radiant face, fancy we hear the words that pour through her trembling lips, the incredulity, the questioning of the rapid statement, the suspicion that it was a phantom of her own excited brain. We can go no further. The veil is never lifted off again. With this one unrivalled sermon she passed into the body of the disciples; and neither the Ascension nor the Pentecost threw her out into any relief. The light of the Person of Christ, in which alone she was visible, had been withdrawn into the kingdom of the Father, but not without revealing a character which could ill be spared among women, which carries to its highest pitch the singleness and sacrifice of a woman's love. No other can receive the singular honour with which the Lord in grace crowned her devotion; it could only fall to one to be the first to see the Lord after his resurrection, the first to say to the rest, The Lord is risen indeed. But others can follow her in silent, modest, gentle ministry, and can take courage as they read of her simple bravery and sublime faith.

Part III.

Miss Palmer and I turned again and walked towards the entrance of the shrubbery, and it was not till she said, "You have never taken any part against me, Miss West; you have never looked unkindly at me," that I became aware how completely she had known the nature of our feelings towards her; it also flashed into my mind, what a strange thing it was that my own should so entirely have changed towards her without any particular cause, and I hung my head, and could not make any answer. I now thought her innocent; but I did not know how to tell her that hitherto I had thought as badly of her as any of my companions.

While I hesitated, the school-room maid came up, and told Miss Palmer that Madame would take her out for a drive. She had complained of headache; and Madame, always considerate, thought the air would relieve it.

Nannette had been unwell during the last two days, and had been excused from the school-room; as Miss Palmer and I hastened towards the house we saw Massey carrying her down-stairs well wrapped up, and I was surprised to see how ill she appeared.

"Poor lamb," said Massey when I spoke to my little schoolfellow, and she peevishly turned away her face; "don't take any notice of her, Miss West; it only teases her."

The little girl was carefully placed in the pony carriage, and Madame and Miss Palmer presently appeared. I thought Madame seemed depressed; and Massey, as she looked after them when they drove away observed, that she was sure her mistress thought the child very unwell, though she would not allow that there was much the matter.

"Why does she not send, then, for Dr. G——?" I inquired.

"He is sent for, Miss," said Massey, "but he cannot come till this evening."

The drive was not a long one; and when Nannette was lifted out of the carriage and carried up-stairs again, she was so much worse that Madame did not leave her all the evening, and after the physician's visit significant looks passed between the teachers which made us all feel extremely grave, for we perceived that the poor child was seriously unwell.

Madame did not come down the next morning, but sent a message to us, expressive of her hope that we would go on with our studies precisely as usual, and be very quiet in the house. We all tried to do our best, but not very successfully. Miss Palmer had a headache, and the teachers were scarcely equal to their duties, for both had been up nearly all night. Nannette had been attacked with croup, and for some hours had been in great danger.

After dinner it was a half holiday, and as it rained we were sitting drearily in the school-room, working and reading, when Miss Massey came in and said that a gentleman had called to see Miss Palmer.

Madame was in the drawing-room talking to Dr. G——, the two teachers were asleep on the dining-room sofas. "There is no place but the school-room for him to be shown into," said Miss L'Estrange; "we can go into our own rooms."

"No, ma'am," said Massey, addressing Miss L'Estrange as our head and leader, "the dear child has just dropped asleep, and Madame has given orders that no one is to come up-stairs."

"Then show the gentleman in," said Miss L'Estrange, "and we must stay."

Accordingly he was shown in, and we rose for the moment and then returned to our occupations, endeavouring to abstract our attention from him that Miss Palmer might talk to him more at her ease.

He was exactly what Massey had said—a roughish spoken gentleman in a light grey coat, stout, hearty, and farmer-like; he walked into the room, and after giving his niece two or three kisses which resounded through the room, he exclaimed, "Well, Hester, how are you, child? What! pale? I never saw you pale before."

"I've got a bad headache, uncle."

"Bad headache," he repeated as he walked up the room with her; "what business have girls like you with headaches? I say, young ladies, what business have girls like Hester with headaches?"

We looked up and smiled; some of us said we hoped it would shortly be better; and he walked up cheerfully to our table, laid his whip upon it, and sat down.

"Well, Hessie, I'm glad to see that you can hold yourself more upright now," he observed, and he looked at her with evident satisfaction, and then turned to us, and presently a broad smile came over his frank features, and rubbing his hands upon his knees he exclaimed, "Well, now, this is what I call a pretty sight; I'm glad my Hester's here; I knew she would be happy; such a number of young ladies, how pretty it is to see them! amusing themselves so sociably, and looking so good humoured."

He continued to look at us with that kind of admiring satisfaction which elderly people often feel for youth; his last words had called up a blush into the cheeks of several.

"Well, Hessie, child," he next said, still looking at us, "didn't I always say you would be happy here? Eh? Didn't I?"

"Yes, uncle," she replied.

On hearing the tone in which she said this, he glanced at us with surprise, as if inquiring what it might mean; then, perhaps, observing some confusion in our faces, a sudden thought seemed to strike him, and he turned sharply round to his niece, and perceived at once that something was wrong. She was standing behind him, no longer pale, but agitated, and pressing her hands together as she often did when ill at ease.

"Where were you sitting, Hester," he said, "when I came in?"

"In a window-seat, uncle."

"Which?"

She indicated the one which was farthest from us, and again he looked round at us, but with a very different expression; he had turned upon his chair and was holding it by the back; she still stood, and looked as if she longed to speak but did not dare.

"Well, Hessie," he presently said, in a tone as anxious as his first had been cheerful, "Well, I hope you are happy."

She made no answer, and the gloom deepened on his brow; he repeated his question, but she held down her head and said nothing, till in the most compassionate manner he said, "I hope you have considered, my dear child, what a chance this is for you?" Then she murmured, "Yes, uncle." The uncle heaved a deep irrepressible sigh, his bitter disappointment was most evident, but he said firmly. "I say, child, look up, look at me." Miss Palmer obeyed him, and he again repeated, "Are you happy here?"

Most of us I believe would have given anything to have left the room then, but we could not do it; we were compelled to hear her answer, given in a gentle voice, but as firmly as the question had been asked her, "No." It would have been utterly impossible to mistake the meaning of her face, even if she had not answered at all.

"My dear child," he presently said very kindly, "if you cannot stay here, what can I do with you but send you out to your grandmother; and what do you expect to be then better than a servant, and a very hard-worked servant, too? There will be few comforts, no books—think of that."

"I do think," answered Miss Palmer.

"And," he continued, "I could not have afforded, my dear, as you know, to place you here but for the kindness of Madame, who receives you much under her usual charge for old acquaintance' sake."

She interrupted him hastily—"But I was promised——"

"Yes, you were promised; but, my dear, I thought, so kind as it was of Madame, that if I could get a good education for you——"

"Oh! but I was promised——"

"Yes, your grandmother promised that you should have your choice, and I never doubted that you would stay; what can I do better for you, my dear, always travelling about as I am? If you go to your grandmother you need not expect that it will be like living at a farmhouse here; it would be rough work and rough fare; and your grandmother told me herself that she could not afford to keep a servant, and thought it hard that I should wish to keep and educate you when she might have the benefit of your work." He said this with great earnestness, and as if he had entirely forgotten our presence. I cannot describe the pain it gave us to hear it, and to feel that her extreme desire to leave the school was in consequence of our unfriendly behaviour. I call it simply unfriendly, because at that time we were far from feeling it to be unjust.

"I was to stay here till you came back," said Miss Palmer, in a faint voice; "and I have kept hoping and hoping that you would soon come, uncle. Madame is very kind, but I am miserable. How can I stay here four years longer? Oh! pray take me away with you, as you promised."

"What! and send you to your grandmother Wilson?"

"Send me anywhere," she replied with a sigh.

We were all distressed and surprised at the hopeless tone in which she spoke, still more at the energy with which her uncle instantly replied, "I'll take you back with me this very day, Hester, if you can give me a good reason for your being miserable."

"Now, uncle!" she exclaimed, as if aghast.

"Come," cried Miss L'Estrange, starting up with glowing cheeks, "suppose we all go and stand in the hall for a few minutes."

We were all eager to follow her lead, but before we could move a step from our places, the rough-spoken gentleman exclaimed in such very resolute manner that he could not possibly think of our turning out of our room on his account, that after a little faint resistance we were reluctantly compelled to remain and listen with shame and contrition to what followed.

"Come with me, Hester," said her uncle, "to your own place where you were sitting before I came in."

She followed him to the remote window-seat, and they talked in lower tones than before; but, excited as our nerves were, it was impossible not to hear every word, and we were far too ill at ease to be able to keep up any conversation among ourselves.

First came various questions about Madame, and to these she answered that Madame was always kind.

He next inquired about her lessons, and she admitted that they were neither too long nor too difficult; that she liked the teachers, and she thought they liked her.

Her uncle appeared to be in such a restless state that he could not remain still for an instant. He pulled the working materials out of Hester's little basket, which stood on the table beside him. He changed his attitude. He got up and sat down again, scarcely taking his anxious eye off his niece, while all the time she stood before him, her head drooping, her eyes fixed on the ground, quite patient and quiet.

"All hitherto sounds as if you should be happy," said her uncle in a lower tone, though one which was still audible to us; "but if it is not so, Hester, tell me the reason."

She still said nothing. "Unless I have the reason, and the true one," he repeated firmly, "you must stay. Give it me at once. Have you felt ill since you have been here?"

"No, uncle; only the last two days."

"Then, once for all," and then he paused, and again lowered his voice, yet it reached our silent party, and we all heard—"tell me, are the young ladies kind to you?"

He paused for an answer, and no one breathed till it came. It was given as if reluctantly, and in a very low and gentle tone, scarcely above a whisper, and we all felt rather than heard that it was "No."

Our suspense was breathless. As for me, confusion took away my powers of observation. What, I thought, should we do? Should we call Madame;—should we promise to be more kind in future;—and what would this uncle do? Would he take her away directly, or accuse us to Madame? I was one of the little girls; it did not devolve on me to act, but I wished some one would do or say something. I wished, however, in vain, for before any of the elder girls could recover from their consternation to speak or stir, the door was opened by Massey, who said to Miss Palmer's uncle, that Madame was now disengaged, and wished to see him; and he got up instantly and followed her, leading his niece by the hand.

Then followed a scene that I shall not easily forget. The dignified Miss Ward shed tears; Miss L'Estrange and Belle cried and sobbed with that heartiness which characterised all their actions; Miss Ashley blamed herself; Miss Morton blamed Madame for not having told us these circumstances beforehand; Juliet declared she had always expected some unpleasant end to Miss Palmer's affair; and Miss L'Estrange sobbed out that she would rather have borne twice as much that was disagreeable than have said a word, if she had known how much depended on Miss Palmer's staying; "and now," she continued, "to think of our knowing that we are making her be a servant."

As for me, I had felt since the morning a curious sensation which, I believe, is sometimes the precursor of illness. I was very cold, and kept from time to time entertaining doubts as to the reality of what was going on around me. Every fresh thing that happened, I said to myself,—"I wonder whether this is real; and if it is, I wonder why I care so little about it. I wonder whether I should care if a very long lesson was set me, or be very much pleased even if I saw mamma walking in at the door. I don't think I care about anything."

Miss Morton was the first to recall the girls to themselves by reminding them that it was most absurd to be so sorry at Miss Palmer's departure, when we had found her presence so unwelcome, and when she had done so much to make herself disagreeable; besides, she said, "You know we did not adopt that cold manner which she had called unkind, till we felt quite sure that she more than deserved it."

"That does not signify at all," said Miss L'Estrange, sobbing; "it has ruined her prospects for life. Oh, I am so sorry! Oh, poor thing—poor thing!"

"Mary," said Miss Morton, giving her a slight push, "how can you give way so before these children! Pray be reasonable."

"And all about my rubbishing polyanthus," sobbed Belle, half resentfully; "I'll never be unkind to any one again, however much she deserves it!"

"I am sure she deserves it, and a great deal more," said Miss Morton, quite calmly, "her suffering for this fault does not make her innocent of it."

I believe this kind of conversation went on for more than an hour, and we had begun to wonder whether Miss Palmer's uncle might not be relating what had passed to Madame, and considering what we should say in our own defence, when Massey came in again, and said to me, "Miss West, you are wanted, if you please."

I went into the hall with the same dreary sense of unreality upon me, and there I saw Miss Palmer, her boxes, her music-books, her parrot in his cage, and all her possessions, standing at the street door. There was a chaise outside, and her uncle stood by it, giving some directions.

"Going! Miss Palmer?" I exclaimed, in consternation.

"I have taken leave of Madame," she answered; and pale as she still was, there was a peaceful kind of happiness in her face which went to my heart, for I felt how more than glad, how thankful she was, to be away from us. The parrot, as usual, was making a great noise—screaming, fluttering, and climbing about with his beak and claws—"Here's a state of things," he screamed out, as I went up to its mistress, "ha! ha! ha!" It was astonishing how often this sentence of his seemed appropriate to the matter in hand.

"Dear," said Miss Palmer, "I thought I should like to kiss you and wish you good-bye."

"Are you really going then?" I inquired. "Oh then, let me tell the girls, they are some of them very sorry, particularly Miss L'Estrange."

She hesitated, and then answered with that same look of serenity, "I could not expect that they should like to see me after I have said that about them to my uncle; but I will send a message. I am going with my dear uncle, and I believe I shall be very happy. I shall never think that they meant me to know that they disliked me. They were not aware, I believe, how much they showed it. I was not brought up to be such a lady as they are, and they must see the difference, I know. I am so grieved that I spoke unkindly of them, now that I am going such a long, long journey. It seems as if what I said could not be true. When they know that I am never coming back any more, I am sure they will excuse whatever it was that they disliked."

She paused so long, that I said to her, "Is that the message, Miss Palmer."

"O, no," she replied, "I wish I could make a good message."

"It would be much better just to come and take leave of them," I pleaded; "and I will tell them about the message too."

She still hesitated; but as I took her hand, and drew her towards the school-room door, she gave way, and suffered me to usher her in and explain her errand.

As she advanced into the room all her composure left her, and she burst into tears; the girls crowded about her, and all kissed her—some, perhaps, because they felt compunction, some because they wished to be magnanimous at the last, and some because the others did.

She seemed struggling to speak, and said in broken sentences that she should always think affectionately of them, and that she hoped they would forgive her for going in this way; but the old shyness so much overcame her that she could scarcely make herself intelligible, and her uncle calling her from without, she drew down her veil, and after kissing me, hastily withdrew.

We followed her into the hall; her baggage was put into the chaise; and Madame took leave of her; Miss Palmer was lifted in, and the little chaise drove off.

Madame seemed depressed, and remarked that Miss Palmer's uncle had appeared rather in a hurry to take his niece away, and had said that as he should not be passing that way again for a long time, he hoped she would excuse it.

It was evident from her manner to us, which was not at all different from usual, that no other reason had been given.

The rain was over, and the wet flowers were bright in the sunshine; it was very warm, and I remember that there was so little wind that the fallen petals of the peonies lay in heaps under them, and were not blown away, and on the grass beneath the two hawthorn trees there were patches as white as snow.

Madame soon withdrew to her sick child, who was now awake; therefore, we four of the second class went up to our own room.

I remember seeing Massey there, already beginning to take down the little blue bed that had been Miss Palmer's; my schoolfellows began to question her, but the curious sensation had so much increased in my head that I only wished she would make haste and finish her operations, that I might lie down on my own bed and rest.

I was soon able to do this, and Massey, looking very much surprised, inquired if I felt unwell.

"Oh no," I replied, but I was very tired, and I had a curious feeling in my head. Massey observed that it was a strange thing, and she thought we were all going to be ill together, for when Miss Palmer came up-stairs she was so giddy that she was obliged to take sal volatile, and thought she should have fainted.

Never had a bed been such a luxury before. I drew the quilt over my shoulders and lay quietly listening to the conversation going on around me, till Massey recurred to the subject of Miss Palmer's departure. "She seemed very much pleased to be going away, poor dear," said Massey, sagely shaking her head, "not that she said a word to me like that, but I know, I know."

"What do you know, Massey?" asked Belle.

Massey was counting the curtain rings, and did not answer till she had run them all on to a tape, and tied them up; then, with that unexcited quietude of manner which sometimes gained unusual attention for what she said, she observed—

"If anybody had told me beforehand that you young ladies were so proud I wouldn't have believed it."

"Proud!" repeated Belle, with genuine surprise.

"I am sure I've been very sorry ever since," continued Massey, "that I told you about her uncle not being such a gentleman as your papas. That was just what Madame wished you not to know."

"What has that to do with our being proud?" asked Juliet.

"Well, miss," replied Massey, "if you are not proud, why did you always make Miss Palmer keep her distance, and always speak so coldly to her?"

"Massey, you are quite wrong—quite mistaken," cried Belle, whose blood boiled at the hint that we had ill-used Miss Palmer because she was in an inferior position.

Massey smiled with a tranquillity much more aggravating than direct denial would have been, and continued, "But I will say for Miss Palmer, that never was a young lady that gave me so little trouble, and always kept her drawers so neat."

"I say you are quite mistaken," repeated Belle.

"In thinking you and Miss Palmer were not comfortable together, did you mean, miss?" asked Massey, as quietly as before, and without looking off her work.

"Massey, you don't understand," said Juliet; "it was not because we are proud that we were unfriendly with Miss Palmer."

"Miss Palmer was never obliging to us," added Margaret.

"We were always uncomfortable from the very day she came," continued Belle.

"Indeed, miss," replied Massey, with respectful attention, but not as if she took any particular interest in the matter; "well, it's no business of mine, but I thought she seemed very obliging at first, young ladies."

"She never was," said Juliet, "never."

"Well, miss," said Massey, "excuse me, but I think you forget about those flowers that she bought for you; that was obliging, I think, for you never could have had them if it hadn't been for her."

"Bought them for us," cried Margaret, laughing scornfully, "for us, indeed! Why, Massey, she bought them for herself, and planted them in her own garden."

"I mean," said Massey, "those flowers that she bought of that man—you know, young ladies, the man that was going away before you came in from your walk."

"Well," said Belle, "so do we mean those flowers."

"But she didn't buy those for herself," said Massey, "because I helped her to choose them, and she asked me how much I thought you would like to give for them." Then looking up and observing our breathless attention, she continued, "Miss Palmer came to me as I was ironing in the laundry, and told me that the man she had heard talked of was come, and that you would be so disappointed, and hadn't she better venture to choose out the best for you. So I said, 'Yes, to be sure, miss;' and she asked me to come and help her to make a bargain, and she gave four shillings and sixpence for them, and after that I helped her to carry them to the gravel walk against you came home."

Belle drew a long breath, and stood gazing at Massey mute and motionless, while Juliet and Margaret began to cross-question Massey, which only made her more positive in her narrative. Miss Palmer had never hinted at meaning to keep the flowers herself, she said; and if she had not given them to us, it must have been because she was too shy.

Thus the ground on which we had founded all our prejudice against Miss Palmer was pushed from under our feet, and all her subsequent conduct seemed to change. We acknowledged that it was kind in her to have purchased the plants for us; but when Massey remarked that she wondered why she had not given them to us, we could not reply, for we felt that our behaviour and our offended pride had so checked and embarrassed her, that she could not do it at the time; and, afterwards, they were so much broken and spoilt, that they were not worth giving.

My school-fellows sat a while deep in thought; then they said they should go and tell all this to Miss L'Estrange, and I was left on my bed, where I presently fell into a sound sleep, and did not awake till the tea-bell rang.

That evening we were not left without the presence of the teachers; little, therefore, could be said about Miss Palmer, but it was evident that Massey's story had made a deep impression in the school, and Miss L'Estrange particularly declared that she would never rest till she had made some reparation.

The next morning Nannette was extremely ill, and Madame sent down to request that the lessons might go on as usual; but I felt scarcely able to do mine, and longed to lie down on my bed and rest.

I did not know that I was ill, but thought it strange that I should shiver when the sun was shining so brightly; afterwards I thought it equally strange that I should be so hot, and feel so cross and irritable with everything and everybody.

The lessons appeared to go on in a dream that had many changes, and yet, when at length Dr. G—— came in, and after speaking to the teachers, said cheerfully, "Are there any young ladies here that have never had the measles?" and I answered, "Yes, I have not," I had no intention of deceiving him when I replied to his further questions that I felt quite well.

He informed us that Nannette had got the measles. Juliet and I were the only pupils that had not had this complaint. Juliet's parents were in India, but Miss Quain said she supposed that I should immediately be sent home.

"I must not have her sent home," said Dr. G——. "She is not in a fit state for it. Would you like to go and lie on the drawing-room sofa, my dear?"

"Oh yes, very much," I replied, and Miss Quain made no objection; so he led me to the sofa in the drawing-room, where there was a delightful scent of geraniums, and where, the green blinds being let down, there was a soft, cool shade.

I laid my head on the pillow; all those miserable feelings vanished, and I fell fast asleep.

When at length I awoke, Miss L'Estrange was standing by me, and I saw Massey coming into the room with a tray and some plates upon it.

"How are you now, my pet?" said Miss L'Estrange, kneeling down by me, and kissing me.

I answered as before that I was very well, and was very glad to find that now I was neither hot nor cross.

"Dr. G—— says you may have your dinner if you like," she then said; "and after that you may go for half an hour into the sunshine."

I opened my eyes and repeated, "If I like I may have my dinner?—oh yes, I like, of course."

Massey accordingly put the tray before me, and I sat up and enjoyed my dinner; but after this I was by no means able to go out, and was very glad to let Massey carry me upstairs and put me to bed.

There I lay very quietly watching Miss L'Estrange, whom Madame, at her own request, had constituted my nurse. She sat at work, and now and then spoke to me very affectionately and properly, telling me that I was going to be ill; that I must try to be patient, and pray that if it was the will of God I might shortly get well again.

I assented, and liked to hear her talk; but, in my childish heart, I felt all the importance of being ill, and having other people anxious about me, especially when the girls came in one by one on tiptoe to ask how I was, and to condole with me. At five o'clock the second class came upstairs, and having dressed themselves, very quietly went into the garden. Between sleeping, and talking, and watching my kind nurse, a long time seemed to pass, till suddenly some very quick, and not at all cautious, footsteps came rushing up the stairs, and, to my very great terror, Belle darted into the room, crying and sobbing as if her heart would break.

It was in vain that her sister alternately questioned and soothed her; she could neither speak nor control herself, and the room was half full of girls, some amazed, some crying, some arguing, before a single coherent sentence was uttered that could throw any light on this strange proceeding.

Miss L'Estrange looked from one to the other, quite bewildered. At length I distinguished Margaret's voice—"It was the rabbit," she exclaimed; "it was Speck."

"Well, what of the rabbit?"

Several voices answered, some lamenting, some contradicting; till suddenly remembering me, and that she should have kept me quiet, Miss L'Estrange sent them all away excepting Belle, and used what means she could to calm and pacify her. Belle, however, could not attend to her entreaties; but throwing herself on her knees before her sister, she hid her face in her lap, and declared that she should never be happy again, and that the rabbit had done it all.

"What can this mean?" said Miss L'Estrange.

"Prosper," sobbed Belle, "Prosper said last night that he'd seen him."

"Well, my dear," asked her sister, "what then?"

"We went—we went between the rows of hops to look for him."

"And you found him, I suppose," suggested her sister, looking more and more surprised.

"And we peeped between," proceeded Belle, "and he was sitting—sitting up and eating; and Prosper said"—here a fresh burst of tears, and it was some moments before she went on. "But we startled him away, and he left his leaves and things lying on the ground; and Prosper said——"

"Well, what did Prosper say?" exclaimed her sister, getting out of patience.

There were more sobs, then Belle went on—"And Prosper said he had cut off the parsley stalks as clean as if he had done it with a knife; and so—and so he had."

I shall never forget the sudden change of countenance with which Miss L'Estrange heard these words. "As clean as a knife," she murmured to herself, with a sort of consternation; and then I remembered when and where I had heard this said before.

"Could a rabbit have done that?" said Miss L'Estrange, apparently quite shocked.

"He did those in the hop ground," said Belle, crying piteously; "and when he saw us, he left them lying round just like the leaves of my black polyanthus. Oh, Mary, what are we to do to make amends to Miss Palmer?"

Before her sister could answer, Miss Ashley came in, and quietly shutting the door, sat down on my bed and said, "Is not this a terrible business, Mary?—what is to be done?"

"I suppose there can be no mistake?" said her friend.

"Impossible," was the reply. "If you had seen the leaves and stalks, you would have known at once that that was how the polyanthus was cut; and here have we absolutely hunted an innocent girl out of the school for want of knowing this before. Mary, why don't you speak?—what shall we do?"

"I'm sure I don't know," said Miss L'Estrange, in a desponding tone of voice.

"It was a most cruel, unwarrantable prejudice from beginning to end; and oh, how I wish she was in the house to hear me say so! Oh, Mary, how could we give into it?"

"I'm sure I don't know," repeated Miss L'Estrange, more sadly still.

I listened with great interest; but the feeling of unreality was stronger than ever, and as my head ached, I was not very sorry when Madame, reappearing with Dr. G——, sent them all out of the room, and set Massey in their place; and now followed such confusion, as I remember to this day. There was nothing but seemed to change as I looked at it: white rabbits were running over the coverlet, but I could not reach to stroke them; amber necklaces were under the pillows, but I vainly tried to find them; curious plants were growing all over the floor, and curious birds were walking about among them; papa and mamma were looking at me through the window, but they never came in, nor spoke to me; and I was always doing multiplication sums, that got longer and longer, and never came right.

The time did not appear to be long. Sometimes I saw a lamp in the room; then again the sun would be shining in; after that I saw three stars glittering in the cool summer sky, and watched them as they seemed to get entangled among the walnut boughs before they set.

At last I woke, and found that I could not lift up my head. It was morning; I thought what a long dream I had had, and felt very weak; but Massey was sitting by me, so I asked her why she had not put out my clean frock, as it was Wednesday.

"Wednesday," said Massey, very gently; "no Miss, this is Thursday."

I was very much surprised, but thought I knew better than she did; and when I had drank some tea, I remarked, that if this was next Thursday, I wondered where Wednesday was gone to.

"This is not next Thursday," said Massey; "this is the Thursday after." So I thought it was of no use arguing with such a person, and asked her how far Miss Palmer had got by this time.

"What made you think of her, Miss?" said Massey. "Well, be she far, or be she near, I'll answer for it she has had the measles, for she was taken before she left just as you were."

Just then I heard footsteps in the passage, for my door was ajar; I thought to myself, "That is exactly how papa walks." The footsteps came on nearer, some one entered, I opened my eyes and saw that it was my papa, and that he was standing looking at me; I could not speak for joy, but Massey said, "Miss West is wonderfully better this morning, sir."

Presently, the rustle of a silk dress swept softly across the floor, and my contentment was complete. I was sure it was my mother's dress, and so it proved to be.

In the afternoon of that quiet day, I was so much better that I could talk to my parents; I asked after Nannette, and was told that she had been very dangerously ill, and was recovering, but slowly; I then inquired about Miss Palmer, but my mother had never heard her name, so I was obliged to be contented for the present with my ignorance.

Very quietly, and as it seemed, quickly, the time passed; and sometime during the afternoon of the next day I awoke, and found Miss L'Estrange sitting by me; I heard mamma tell her that I was not to be fatigued, but that if she could say what she wished me to hear in few words, I might listen to it.

Almost as shortly, therefore, as I now relate the circumstance, Miss L'Estrange told me how anxious they had all been to write to Miss Palmer, and acknowledge their error; to tell her what they had discovered about the black polyanthus, and what Massey had told us of her buying the flowers for us. "But we did not know her uncle's address," she continued; "and it was only two days ago that we happened to hear it, through a farmer, who knows him. So we have written a long letter to her;" she said, "asking her forgiveness, and begging her to persuade her uncle, that we shall be extremely friendly and affectionate to her if she may come back again; and that we shall try to make up to her for our past unkindness; we have made up a little parcel, in which we have each sent her something to keep for our sakes, and we thought you would like also to send her something."

I said I should, and chose a little locket out of my stores to be sent. The letter was then read, and all the pretty little presents were shown to me.

The parcel, she told me, was to go by railway; and then she left me to enjoy all the peace and rest of convalescence, doubly pleasant to me, because my parents were so constantly with me.

The next day I was so much better that I was allowed to enjoy the little consequence of seeing all the girls, as they came in with my mother's consent to speak to me.

I shall not soon forget that morning; I was beginning to understand that I had been extremely ill, and I saw in the faces of my father and mother something of that rest and peace seldom felt but after anxiety. My mother was reclining on a couch where I could see her, my father sitting by me; he had been reading, and an open Bible was still in his hand. I reflected on what he had said, and was grateful for them, that God had spared their only child; and for myself that I might yet live to be useful and thankful.

Miss L'Estrange was sitting at the foot of my little bed. I had nothing to do but to lie still and rest; the flies were humming in the sunny windows, the birds were singing outside, the shadows of the trees were rocking across the white blinds; everything about me was orderly, cheerful and quiet.

My thoughts naturally recurred to Miss Palmer; I wondered whether she would return to school, and began to consider what I could do to show my sorrow for the past.

Just then, Massey came in, and said to Miss L'Estrange, "There is a parcel for you, Miss, from the railway."

My father, thinking perhaps that she would like to open it in my room, left us to ourselves and went out.

I could not help noticing that this was precisely like what we had sent to Miss Palmer. Miss L'Estrange hastily untied the string, and out came our own packet, precisely as we had sent it, excepting that the seals were broken.

She looked at first astonished, and then inexpressibly hurt. "Is it possible," she said, quite pale with the pain this prompt return of her own presents had given her—"Is it possible that she refuses to be reconciled, and declines to accept our keepsakes, or even to read our letter?"

My story is nearly concluded; I will not detail how we turned over the contents of the parcel, how we examined the seals of our letter, and saw that she had opened them, how we questioned with one another as to why she had returned them so quickly.

We were not to be allowed to make any reparation. I looked up during the examination, and saw my mother's eyes fixed on a little note which had dropped from the parcel upon the bed.

At the same instant, Miss L'Estrange snatched it up, shivered as she opened it, and closed her eyes as if she did not dare to read it. I took it from her, for a terrible dread of what might be its contents struck through my heart. Our apologies and reparation had come too late. The writer said, she had been requested to return this parcel and its contents to the young ladies, for that Miss Palmer had died that morning at seven o'clock.

PATIENCE.

When my heart is sore within,
Through a hope of joy deferred;
When I cannot conquer sin,
Or my heart with pride is stirred;
Mix for me the needful cup,
Watch me till I drink it up.

If this stubborn will of mine
Will not bow itself to Thee;
And I struggle and repine
At the yoke imposed on me;
Do not let me have my way,
Kindly, firmly, say me nay.

And if patience may not come,
But through pain, and toil, and strife;
If it be denied to some
Till the evening of their life,
Let me suffer what I may,
Still for patience will I pray.

Patience, Lord, is all I ask,
Only give me rest in Thee!
Here is strength for every task,
This the life of liberty!
As we trust Thee here below,
Will our weight of glory grow.

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

VIII.—MAN'S INABILITY.

ARISTOTLE—says South in one of his brilliant sermons—Aristotle is but the ruins of an Adam. This being the view of man which the Bible presents, and the Fall accounts for, those who receive it in its integrity have been charged with holding low, mean, degrading views of the nature and of the dignity of man. In one sense this is true; in another nothing is more false. It is true in so far as the Bible teaches us to believe that all men, in consequence of sin, are criminals in the sight of God and lie under sentence of death; that all are dead in trespasses and sins; that there is none that doeth good, no, not one; and that, presenting sin in a totally different aspect from that in which it is regarded by many as a light and little thing, sin is exceeding sinful. Hence, brought by grace to see its vileness, and to feel its exceeding evil, the holiest men have always been the humblest, the strongest have felt the weakest, the best have thought the worst of themselves—David, the man after God's own heart, saying, I was as a beast before thee; Job, the most remarkable character of his own or any age for piety and uprightness, saying, as he shrank from his own image, I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes; and Paul, though the greatest of all the apostles, much too great as well as honest to fish for compliments and depreciate himself that others might praise him, speaking of himself not as the least, but as less than the least, of all saints. If these are the terms in which men of the purest minds and holiest characters have felt constrained to speak of themselves, how is it possible to entertain too low views of human nature? What terms can express its degradation other than those of Scripture—our righteousnesses are as filthy rags; or, in figures borrowed from the loathsome leprosy, the whole head is sick, the whole heart is faint, and there is no soundness in us, but wounds, and bruises, and putrifying sores. We do entertain low views of human nature; and so, however loudly they assert its dignity, do others—all who put locks on their doors and a witness on his oath, build prisons and support police.

Yet to allege that those who believe in the fall and corruption of human nature, cherish only low, mean, degrading views of man, is in another sense, quite wide of the truth. If the value of anything is to be estimated by its price, to what an immeasurable height of worth does it exalt man that God gave his Son to redeem him?—redeeming him not with corruptible things such as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ as of a lamb without spot or blemish. So far from cherishing low views of man, I believe that a gem of inestimable value lies concealed beneath the beggar's rags. A soul is there of divine-like faculties and of priceless worth: and a body also, which, though the seat of appetites that man shares with brutes, and of passions, perhaps, such as burn in the breasts of fiends, may become more sacred than any fane built by human hands—a temple of the Holy Ghost. There is a worth in man no meanness of circumstances, no degradation of character can altogether conceal. He is a jewel though buried in a heap of corruption; the vilest outcast, possessing powers and affections that need only to be sanctified to ally him with angels, and make publicans and harlots fit for heaven. Fallen though he be, man is capable of undergoing, and, created anew in Jesus Christ, born of the Spirit, brought from nature into grace, undergoes a more wondrous change than the insect when, no longer a worm, no longer crawling on the ground, no longer feeding on garbage, it leaves its shell to spend its happy days in sport, flitting from flower to flower; its food their juices and its bed their leaves. We thus assert the dignity of man. Only that his greatest, purest dignity is seen, not in what he does, but in what has been done for him; not in what poets or philosophers have written, but the Bible has revealed of him as redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, as a living temple of the Holy Spirit, a son of God, and an heir of glory. Yet I remark, notwithstanding—

Man can neither convert nor sanctify himself. Endowed with an intellect which, though defaced, has survived the Fall, his capacities and capabilities are great. As if he were a God, he measures the heavens, weighs the hills in scales, and the mountains in a balance. He subdues the elements, rides on the wind, rides on the waves; makes the lightning his swift messenger; and yoking fire and water to his chariot wheels, compels them to serve him. Prolific in invention and skilful in arts, as if he were a creator, he can make the elements he subdues. Image of him who giveth rain, whose voice is heard thundering in many waters, who casteth out his ice in morsels, and scattereth his hoar frost like ashes—man makes snow, and ice, and rain, and dew, and lightning; and, falling on the strange discovery that the brilliant diamond is formed of the very same matter as coal, he has boldly pressed on his Maker's steps, and all but succeeded in rivalling nature's gems. But though it were hard to say—such is the progress of arts and science—what human skill may not accomplish, it has its bounds. There is a line across which it has never passed, and cannot pass; where a voice is heard, saying to the boldest adventurer, Hither shalt thou come, but no further. By no skill or combinations of matter can man give being to the lowest living thing. Master of the elements, by their help he travels the earth with an eagle's speed; wingless, he ascends into the air and traverses its pathless fields; he makes the sea his high road—skims along its surface or descends to bring up the treasures that with the skeletons of men and wrecks of navies lie on its oozy bed. Yet there is not a living thing, the meanest that lives in earth, or air, or ocean, but it baffles his power to make. It were easier for him to make a planet than a plant. It were at least as easy to kindle a sun, or send a world spinning through the realms of space, as to make the lowest living thing—a worm; the green mould of decay; the humblest moss that clothes or lichen that colours a stone; one of those creatures, thousands of which find a sea to swim in in a drop of water. However the vivifying elements, as they are called, of light, and air, and heat, and moisture, may act as auxiliaries to the development of life, all that lives both in the vegetable and animal kingdoms had a parent like itself—from which it sprung by seed, or egg, or germ, or spore; and every attempt which science has made to produce a living creature through the action of dead elements and the combinations of dead matter, has produced nothing but a failure—every such failure proving that the stream of natural life has its spring in the Creator, its fount nowhere but in God.

Hear, O Israel, the Lord thy God is one Lord! is the testimony borne to the divine unity by all the kingdoms over which he sways his sceptre.—There are innumerable analogies between nature and grace; and the correspondence between God's works in both kingdoms only grows more manifest the more carefully they are studied. The discoveries of science are shedding a clearer and clearer light on the Word of God: and in the matter of spiritual life the study of nature prepares us to receive the revelations of the Bible. It is with the one as with the other life. As unable to awake the sinner as to awake the dead, man cannot give it. Our life is hid with Christ in God. Nor will any who sees how no combination of means and circumstances, though important as auxiliaries to its development, can create life, changing dead into living matter, be astonished that Jesus, turning all eyes and hopes on himself, said, "I am the way, the truth, the life." Therefore, he says, because I live, ye shall live also; and thus it is true both of conversion and sanctification, "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh in vain."

It follows, from the foregoing, that we owe our success in spiritual matters not to ourselves, but to God. In temporal things, his hand is always as present, and sometimes almost as visible, as when it appeared to Belshazzar's eyes writing his doom on the plaster of his palace wall. It may be said, indeed, that manifest interpositions of Providence are rare; and that for every ten persons in whose fortunes they appear in the shape of remarkable prosperity, relief from troubles, escape from danger or from imminent death, there are ten thousand who earn their bread, and bring up their families, and win their way in life entirely, so far as appearances go, by their own exertions. Another King of Babylon—uncrowned, dethroned, bereft of reason, driven out to herd with cattle, the greatest, saddest spectacle of earthly vanity the world has seen—presents a monument of the unsoundness and danger of such views. He was taught to feel in his fall the hand he denied in his elevation. And since the heart may swell as proudly under frieze as imperial purple, and God be as little recognised amid the few comforts of a cottage as amid the luxuries of a palace, let us beware. Many have been guilty of Nebuchadnezzar's crime, who neither wore his crown nor bore his punishment.

What though our lives have been distinguished by no remarkable providences—does that prove that their success and our thanks are not due to God? Tell me not that the hand of the diligent maketh rich. Will it do so unless He pleases? If he sees meet that men shall be poor, in vain they rise up early and lie down late, and eat the bread of sorrow. If he sends rain to drown our fields, can we shut up the windows of heaven? If he raises a storm to sink our merchantmen, can we walk the sea with the foot of Jesus, or rise with him to bid the waves be still? If he roll a tide of bankruptcy over the affrighted land, can we arrest its progress, and say, ere it break on our house and beat it down, Hither shalt thou come, but no further? In other words, hast thou an arm like God, or canst thou thunder with a voice like him? The means we use to preserve life and health, acquire wealth, honour, or any other earthly blessings, are nothing more than the levers, cranks, shafts, and rolling wheels, of a machine, of which God is the moving power. It is his will, not ours, that makes our hearts to beat and the blood in our veins to circulate; that makes food nourish and sweet sleep refresh us; that makes our business yield its profits and our fields their harvests; that sustains our efforts and crowns them with success. When our mountain standeth strong, let him hide his face, and we are troubled. "Therefore," says the psalmist, in a burst of adoration, "thine, O Lord, is the greatness, and the power, and the glory, and the victory, and the majesty; for all that is in the heaven and the earth is thine: thine is the kingdom; and both riches and honour come from thee; and thou reignest over all."

For all spiritual blessings we equally depend on God. How does the state of heathen countries prove that except he build the house, they labour in vain that build it? In their case the experiment has been tried: and the result, to keep up the figure, is a house indeed, but one based on sand; daubed with untempered mortar; and ready, so soon as the floods rise, and the winds blow, and the rains descend, to bury its miserable owner in its ruins. What man, independently of his word, can know of God, and do for himself, is not proved, as some allege, by the correct principles of morality and conceptions of the Divine Being to be found in the writings of infidels. They parade the world in borrowed feathers, and shine in stolen gems. Whatever is high in their morality, or correct in their notions of God, I trace to the very book they profess to despise and reject. Would we see what man can know of God, or be without him and his word, turn to those lands where no ray of gospel truth has ever shone; and where, by the lurid light of altars red with blood, we see man kneeling to a beast, to a stock, to a stone; practising cruelties and crimes he vainly seeks to expiate by offering the fruit of his body for the sins of his soul. Darkness covereth the earth, and gross darkness the people.

And when we open the Bible it is to see, in whatever aspect our salvation is regarded, that the pivot on which it turns is not the power or will of man, but the mercy and the might of God. Whose was the love salvation sprang from? whose the Eden promise that begat hope in the bosom of despair? whose the finger that wrote the holy law? whose the prophets that heralded the Saviour? whose the Son that was cradled in Bethlehem and crucified on Calvary? whose the Spirit that, taking of the things of Christ, applies them—turning the sinner into a saint, a child of the devil into a son of God and an heir of glory? These questions admit of but one answer. That love, that promise, that finger, that Son, that Spirit is God's. In him all our well springs are; nor by any hand but his was forged one single link of the golden chain that binds believers to the skies: "Whom he did foreknow them he did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son; and whom he did predestinate, them he also called; and whom he called, them he also justified; and whom he justified, them he also glorified.

What the Bible in these words, elsewhere, and everywhere indeed, teaches, daily experience proves. Thousands possess the means of salvation, and might be saved, who are not. They starve by a table loaded with bread; die beside a fountain into which they have only to descend to be healed: with Christ within their sight, within their cry, opening heaven to others, they perish with the thief who perished at his bleeding side. Two men are in one bed, one is taken, and the other left: two women are grinding at the mill, one is taken, and the other left—a circumstance painfully illustrated in the spiritual history of many a family and many a church. Of two children reared under the same roof, taught the same truths, guarded with the same holy care, one is taken, and the other left—of two members of the same church, sitting in the same pew, hearing the same sermons, baptised in the same font, and drinking of the same cup, how dissimilar their fates!—one is taken, and the other left. Mysteries these that nothing can unlock but this, that salvation is not of flesh or blood, or of the will of man, but of God—that it is not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of Hosts.

For the purpose of teaching a truth that should inspire and animate our prayers, God has often wrought out his ends by the most unlikely means. There are objects in nature not less astonishing for the smallness of the worker than the greatness of the work. Such are the coral walls around those lovely isles that, carpeted with flowers, clothed with palms, and enjoying an everlasting summer, lie scattered like gems on the bosom of the Pacific. These, with the ocean roaring in its fury before them, and behind them the lagoon lying like a molten mirror broken only by the dash of a sea bird or the dip of passing oar, are stupendous ramparts. Compared to them our greatest breakwaters dwindle into insignificance. One of these reefs off the coast of New Holland is a thousand miles in length, and how many hundred feet in depth, I know not. Yet the masons that build these are creatures so small as to be almost invisible. Such mighty works does God accomplish by instruments so mean! a sight that helps a believer—though he has to say with Nehemiah, I have a great work to do—to take heart and hope, and say with Paul, I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me.

But we have not to go to nature to see God accomplishing great purposes by unlikely means. The Bible is full of such examples. We should have committed the treasures of divine truth to the charge of some mighty monarch, and called the Saviour of the world from the loins of a Cyrus or a Cæsar—of one whose weakness should not tempt him to seek safety in a lie, and whose family should have been in no danger of dying through famine. My ways are not as your ways, says God, neither are my thoughts as your thoughts. In Abraham, an obscure Chaldean, an exile, a wanderer without any home but a tent or property in the soil but a grave, God puts the dearest interests of mankind into the weakest hands. In that patriarch the hopes of the world hang on a man around whose head swords are flashing, and into whose breast—but that his steward perhaps in the battle he fought to rescue Lot thrusts it aside—the robber buries his spear. In him and Sarah the hopes of the world are hung on a pair whose bed is childless, and on whose heads time has shed its snows. And again, when a child is born to them in Isaac, the salvation of a lost world hangs by a single strand: and again in Jacob's family, it turns on a dream and fortunes as unlikely as any that fill the pages of a romance. With Abraham in the battle; with Isaac on the altar; with Joseph in the dungeon; with Moses cast on the water; with Rahab in the beleagured city; on yon field, where, with two armies looking on, a stripling goes out to meet the giant; on yon plain, where, through the midnight gloom, we see a mother hurrying with her babe from the swords of Herod and the massacre of Bethlehem, how often was the light of truth nearly extinguished, the ark that carried the hopes of the world all but wrecked? Never to human sight was good ship more nearly wrecked!

Nothing is more remarkable in the Bible than to see how God, as if to teach us to trust in nothing and in none but Himself, selects means that seem the worst fitted to accomplish his end. Does he choose an ambassador to Pharaoh?—it is a man of stammering tongue. Are the streams of Jericho to be sweetened?—salt is cast into the spring. Are the eyes of the blind to be opened?—they are rubbed with clay. Are the battlements of a city to be thrown down?—the means employed is, not the blast of a mine, but the breath of an empty trumpet. Is a rock to be riven?—the lightning is left to sleep above and the earthquake with its throes to sleep below, and the instrument is one, a rod, much more likely to be shivered on the rock than to shiver it. Is the world to be converted by preaching, and won from sensual delights to a faith whose symbol is a cross and whose crown is to be won among the fires of martyrdom?—leaving schools, and halls, and colleges, God summons his preachers from the shores of Galilee. The helm of the church is entrusted to hands that had never steered aught but a fishing-boat; and by the mouth of one who had been its bloodiest persecutor, Christ pleads his cause before the philosophers of Athens and in the palaces of Rome. And when he chose the weak things of the world to confound the strong, and the foolish to confound the wise, what did God mean to teach us but that we are to look above the instruments to the great hand that moves them; and that, whether it was a giant or a devil that was to be conquered, the eyes of the body or of the soul that were to be opened, walls of stone, or, what are stronger, walls of ignorance and sin that were to be overthrown, men are but instruments in his hand,—the meanest mighty with Him, the mightiest mean without him.

This inability forms no reason why a sinner seeking to be saved, or a saint to be sanctified, should not use means—giving all diligence, indeed, to lay hold on eternal life, to grow in grace, to make their calling and election sure. Well and justly is God's service called reasonable. All that it requires is that men bring the same good common sense to their spiritual interests which they employ in conducting their ordinary affairs. Give us day by day our daily bread does not imply that we expect to be fed like Israel with manna, or like Elijah by ravens. While by such a prayer acknowledging himself a pensioner on God's bounty, man sows his fields; waits on his business and on his God; prays and ploughs together. Even so in all, likewise, that concerns our highest interests, we are, to use the words of Scripture, to be "fellow-labourers," co-operating, working together with God; doing on our part what we can do, and God on his part doing what, though indispensable, we cannot do. These two cases, taken from Christ's history, happily illustrate this.

It is a Sabbath morning; and its doors thrown open as the hour of worship approaches, the synagogue begins to fill. Among those who enter is a man with a withered hand; and however others come, there is haste in his step and high expectation seated on his brow. Blessed day, now is his chance to be healed. Jesus is in the neighbourhood, and is sure to be at worship. Early there, likely the first, this crippled man, heeding nothing else, looking at none, talking with none, keeps his eye on the door—keenly observing all who enter, and often, as it opens and Christ appears not, disappointed. At length the feet of a group are heard; again the door opens; and the colour that flushes his face tells that the person has now come whom he has come to meet. Nor is this all he can do, and does. Observing where Jesus, attended by his disciples, sits, he rises, and, elbowing the crowd aside without regard to their challenge or murmurs, pushes on to place himself before the Saviour,—right in his eye. All this he can do, and does, and more. Ordinarily concealing a deformity he was ashamed of, he now drops his robe, and, exposing the poor unsightly hand in the hope that it may catch Christ's eye and move his pity, sits with looks fixed imploringly on our Lord. There was no need for him to speak. His eager looks and the poor, bared, withered hand were touching prayers. Nor did these prayers wait long for an answer. The eye that never saw misery but to pity it is at length turned on him; and Jesus says, Stretch out thine hand! Strange command to others, perhaps also to himself—as bidding him do the very thing he had no power to do. Still he tries it. Again doing what he can, he makes an effort—and, Glory to God! bursting from his lips, succeeds. Virtue goes out of Christ. The shrunken hand instantly acquires a healthful colour, and swells into its right proportions. In his joy the man shuts and opens it; moves the pliant fingers; and holds the miracle aloft to the gaze of a crowd, dumb with astonishment. Give him a harp, and with that hand he would sweep its sounding strings to the praise of Jesus. Pattern to men who have souls to be saved, and hearts to cure, he did what he could—using all means within his power to obtain the blessing. And, did people, with equal eagerness, repair to the church on Sabbath, as he to the synagogue, to meet Jesus Christ, and with the same earnestness and the same faith, lay out their sins and soul's sorrows before him, our Sabbaths would witness greater works than this—He who healed that withered hand healing withered hearts, and, whether they required to be saved or sanctified, giving power to them that have no might.

Take another case. Covered with dust, footsore and weary, a messenger presents himself to our Lord, and speaking in Mary and Martha's name, says, Behold he whom thou lovest is sick! Tell a mother that her child is fallen into the river. It is enough. She stays to ask no questions, to hear no more. She is off on flying feet; and, descrying its sinking head, with one wild scream she leaps like a flash into the roaring flood. With no such haste, much as he loved Lazarus, did Jesus turn his steps to Bethany; but abiding where he was for two days, left his friend to die; even as, with a still grander purpose in view, on seeing the serpent creep into Eden he made no haste from heaven, but left our first parents to fall. He whom he loved has died, is buried; and four days thereafter the news that "the Master is come" brings the sisters this consolation, that, though they have lost a brother in Lazarus, they have still a friend in Christ—one who sticketh closer than any brother, and who, as the event proved, can restore a brother. They go to the grave to weep, but He to wrench its bars asunder, and stand there more conspicuously than in almost any other scene both God and man; in his works a God and in his tears a man. He is to raise the dead. Yet though the chief, he is not the only actor on a stage where it might be fancied man had no part to play. By that tomb men do not sit mere spectators of the might and majesty of Godhead, Jesus addressing them to say, Stand back, stand still and see the salvation of God! A great stone closes the mouth of the sepulchre; standing, with the Saviour in front and the corpse behind it, between the living and the dead. It must be removed: and Christ has only to say the word, and, moved by hands invisible, it rolls away to disclose the secrets of the tomb. But He who takes away stony hearts, because none other can, does not take away this stone; nor address it, but those who have put it there, and can take it thence. He requires them to do what they can—each doing their part; theirs to roll away the stone and his to raise the dead. Now, though we can neither convert nor sanctify ourselves or others, yet man has something, and much to do, as is plain from such words as these, "Cast away from you all your trangressions, whereby ye have transgressed ; and make you a new heart and a new spirit : for why will ye die ?" Strictly speaking, we cannot make us a new heart, but we can place ourselves or others in a position for God to make it. We can remove obstructions to that gracious and holy change —we can dispel ignorance, put away temptation, abandon bad habits—the drunkard's cup, for instance, renounce pleasures that occupy our hearts. Thus removing what obstructs the flow of life and grace from Christ, we can "take away the stone ;" and, co-operating with God in the use of these and all divinely appointed means, we can, and, as we can, we ought to work out our salvation with fear and trembling, God working in us both to will and to do of his good pleasure.

It is with man and God in the production of spiritual, as with the skies and the soil in the production of material, fruit. Gathering harvests each successive year from fields whose wealth of fruitfulness seems exhaustless, we say, How bountiful is the earth? —the world's, like the widow's, meal-barrel, is never empty. We speak of the fruits of earth, and the flowers of earth, and the harvests of earth ; but these, her offspring, have another parent. Heaven claims their sweet juices, and fragrant odours, and glorious colours, as hers, and most her own. To the treasures of light, heat, rain, and dews, poured from exhaustless skies on the dull cold soil, earth's flowers owe their beauty, her gardens their fruits, her fields their golden harvests. Each, at any rate, has its own part to do ; nor would a husbandman labour to less purpose under a sunless sky on fields bound hard with frost and buried in perpetual snow, than preachers without the cheering, warming, enlivening influences of the Sun of Righteousness, the dews of grace, and the blessing of the Spirit. Man's is but a husbandman's office—to plant ; to water ; nothing more. "Paul," as the apostle himself says, "planteth, Apollos watereth, but God giveth the increase ; so, then, neither is he that planteth anything, nor he that watereth, but God that giveth the increase." And thus, whether we preach, or are preached to, when most diligent in the use of means, let a sense of our inability turn our eyes and all our hopes on God. With him is the blessing and the residue of the Spirit. Nothing, indeed, so much hinders the cure of a soul as what helps the cure of a body. Many as the analogies between the processes of grace and nature are, here there is none—but a total dissimilarity. In that anxious sick room, where life and death struggle for the mastery, it is all-important to sustain the patient's strength. This offers, so to speak, his only chance ; and for that end there is no charm in drug or stimulant more potent than boundless confidence in the skill of the physician. Such confidence in man lies at the foundation of the physician's success ; such confidence in man is fatal to a minister's. This may be one reason why, with so many sermons, there are so few conversions ; why, among the crowds that throng God's house, so many depart unblessed, unsaved, unsanctified—no better, but rather worse. God will not give his blessing to such as, shutting him out, put their confidence in the use of means—in the virtue of sacraments or the power of sermons, in dead books or living preachers. He is a jealous God, and will not give his glory to another.

COTTAGE POEMS.

BY A CURATE.

IV.—AMONG THE FLOWERS.

We took them to the woods one day,
When the summer woods were gay,
At the flowery close of May,
Saying, "Children, run and play!"

And they hardly understood
They might wander where they would ;
And it seemed a doubtful good
That on very flowers they stood—

Flowers too precious in the sight
Of these children—priceless quite !
One a king-cup, shining bright,
Held as if she held a light !

Every bank with treasure teemed,
Daisies silver coinage seemed,
Dandelions, starry-beamed,
Like to bright gold pieces gleamed.

Of primroses, ling'ring there,
One would weave a garland fair ;
One would fill her lap with care
And a miser's anxious air.

From the city's slums they came,
Flowerless, dark, and full of shame,
Full of foulness without name—
Homes, alas ! and hearts the same.

"Feed my lambs," said Christ one day ;
So we took them out to play ;
For the young lambs God doth lay
Down among the flowers of May.

HEROES AND MARTYRS OF THE REFORMATION IN ITALY.

III.—THE LADY GIULIA DA GONZAGA.

WHEREVER the Reformation spread it found zealous adherents among the female sex, who in many instances greatly promoted its interests by their devoted activity, and everywhere adorned the cause by their graces and virtues. In Italy this was remarkably the case. At the close of the preceding article the names of three distinguished ladies were mentioned as among the disciples of Juan Valdez; and to these other names have to be added, of females in different grades of society and in other parts of the peninsula, who connected themselves with the Reformation movement there. It may not be possible very clearly to trace their influence, or even to indicate their course of action. Still it cannot be doubted that their influence was very considerable, and on this account as well as on account of their personal worth, they are entitled to a place in this series of sketches.

The first place in the series is undoubtedly due to the Duchess da Gonzaga-Colonna, one of the earliest adherents of Valdez, one of the most intimate of his associates, and the steadfast friend of evangelical truth to the last.

GIULIA DA GONZAGA was the eldest daughter of Luigi da Gonzaga, Duke of Sabbionetta, and his wife Francesca di Gianluigi Fieschi, of Genoa. The family to which she belonged was a branch of the great ducal house of Mantua, a house from which many names illustrious in European history have proceeded. The name of Gonzaga stands associated with illustrious achievements in the field, and with the early pursuit and generous patronage of literature. Of those members of the family whose names have become famous, five were ladies.*

Giulia was born at Gazzuolo, in the last year of the fifteenth century. Endowed with mental qualities and personal charms of the highest order, and uniting to these great sweetness of temper and an open, candid, and generous bearing, she at an early age commanded the esteem no less than the admiration of all with whom she came into intercourse. Whilst youthful knights of the highest rank were ready to break spears in her honour, poets caught the inspiration of her charms, and even grave historians thought it not unworthy of them to celebrate her praises in their pages. De Thou ranks her among the "lectissimæ fœminæ" of Italy, who were suspected of heretical pravity,† and Hilarion da Coste says that "De Thou, François Billon, and other authors, praise her for her attainments (son savoir) which made her be held in estimation by the ablest men in Italy."‡ Brantome, an authority in such matters, says that she was esteemed the most beautiful woman of the time in all Italy, and that he had seen her portrait, taken after she had been several years a widow, and that it fully confirmed the reputation she enjoyed.*

At the early age of thirteen she was married to Vespasiano Colonna, Duke of Traietto and Count of Fondi. The disparity of their ages was great, he being past forty; he was, besides, a widower, with a daughter, named Isabella; but, notwithstanding this, he succeeded in inspiring his young wife with an affection which survived his death, and never decayed in her bosom as long as she lived. Infirmities, brought on by severe military service, had impaired his constitution, so that their happy union lasted only a few years. At his death he testified the confidence he had in her character and abilities by intrusting to her the management of his estates and the sole guardianship of his daughter Isabella. On her part profound regard for his memory and the deathless love with which he had inspired her, led her to reject the many and urgent offers of marriage which her beauty, her endowments, and her wealth caused to be made to her from some of the noblest houses in Italy. According to a fashion, common at that time, she chose for her device an amaranth, a flower of which the poets have feigned that it never fades,† and a species of which, remarkable for the protracted duration of its efflorescence, is known in our gardens under the name of Love-lies-bleeding; and for her motto, Non moritura, "undying"—a motto borrowed from Virgil, to express that her love for her husband could neither perish nor change. Among those who were suitors for her hand was Ippolito de' Medici, the grandson of the illustrious Lorenzo de' Medici, and the protégé of Leo X., a man of splendid abilities, a lover of literature and himself a proficient in classical learning, but restless, vain, prodigal, and ambitious, and who, though he ultimately became a churchman and reached the dignity of cardinal and archbishop, showed always more of the knight and the warrior than of the ecclesiastic. Having translated the second book of the Æneid into Italian, he dedicated it to the Signora Giulia in terms expressive of the warmest affection towards her. Though she rejected his suit, he seems to have continued towards her his knightly fealty, and some years after met his death whilst on a visit to her after a warlike expedition on her behalf. In devoting himself to the Lady Giulia, Ippolito traversed the design of his patron the Pope, who was desirous of marrying him to Isabella, the daughter of that lady's deceased husband. Isabella became the wife of Luigi da Gonzaga, of Gazzuolo, the brother of her stepmother, a young noble of great personal attractions, and who had received the name Rodomonte for his romantic bravery and great strength. Their union was not of long duration. Having been commissioned by the Emperor to recover for his sister certain possessions which had been claimed and taken from her by Ascanio Colonna, but which the Pope, Clement VII., had adjudged to belong to her in terms of her husband's will, he was wounded in the shoulder by a shot from an arquebus whilst engaged in besieging the Castle of Nicovara, and died shortly afterwards, leaving his widow to the guardian care of Giulia. A son, named Vespasiano, was the fruit of this marriage; by his father's will he was placed, first under the guardianship of his paternal grandfather, and on his decease, in 1540, came under that of his aunt Giulia da Gonzaga.

The disputes and troubles which arose from rival claimants to her husband's estates having been settled or quashed, Giulia retired to her castle at Fondi, situated on the southern shore of the Bay of Naples. Here she spent her time in the pursuit of literature, in the society of men of culture and refinement, in the management of the estates which had been intrusted to her care by her husband's will, and in deeds of beneficence. Her name occurs in many of the letters of the literary men of the time, and her praises were sung by the poets in varied verse. Ariosto,* Molza, and Perrino, have celebrated her fame, and Bernardo, the father of the illustrious Torquato Tasso, has dedicated to her two sonnets, of which we will attempt a translation.

I.

O regal dame, whose beauty infinite,
A boon by the Creator's own hand given
That thereby to the path that leads to heaven
Many thou shouldst attract with gentle might.

With grace divine each soul thou dost invite
To worthy deeds that bring enduring fame;
And in thine eyes serene the sacred flame
Of purest love sheds forth its wondrous light.

Sense, virtue, worth, and winning gentleness
Attend thee as the sun attends the day,
Or as the lustrous stars attend the night;
Thy heavenly gait, thy smile, what thou dost say,
The thought and sweetness that thy words express,
Are of thy beauty the adornments bright.

In the other sonnet he goes even beyond this in his eulogy.

O gentle Pilgrim, who on either side
Hast search'd heaven through to find the true and good,
These in thy breast with loving willinghood
Have made their home, and with thee aye abide.

Propitious Star that dost the traveller guide,
Drawing by gracious and resplendent ray
Each thoughtful soul into the happy way
That leads to where earth's storms may be defied.

Signet on which, imprest in living lines,
Is seen the image of the Deity;
And every form of grace and price is there,
Of goodness and true honour Mirror fair,
Divine idea where all beauty shines—
Thrice happy is the man that sighs for thee.†

† "Rime di Bernardo Tasso," Bergamo, 1749, son. 188 and son. 155, quoted by Mr. Wiffen, "Life and Writings of Juan de Valdez," p. 110

This is in that style of extravagant eulogy which was characteristic of the age, and in which Bernardo Tasso was especially given to indulge. There can be no doubt, however, that the lady who is the subject of it possessed that rare combination of personal attractions, with high mental powers and serene moral dignity, which constitutes as near an approach to ideal perfection as it is given to our fallen nature to reach.

Giulia, breathing an atmosphere of literary enthusiasm and poetic fervour, was herself inspired to utter her soul in song. Her sonnets, which even in that age were esteemed excellent, were collected from various early collections, and published separately at Bergamo in 1750.

Her repose at Fondi was on one occasion rudely interrupted by an event which strikingly illustrates the unsettled state of society at the time, and the perils to which a lady of her condition might be exposed. The fame of her transcendent beauty had travelled as far as Constantinople, and had reached the ears of the Sultan Suleyman, who, with true Oriental unscrupulousness, determined that such a gem must, at all hazards, be appropriated to himself. In obedience, accordingly, to his instructions, the famous corsair, Barbarossa, steered his galleys into the Bay of Naples, and in the month of September, 1534, in the dead of night, made an attack on the town and castle of Fondi. No resistance could be offered by the affrighted townspeople; but the noise which the assault and their terror produced aroused the inmates of the castle. They had only time to awaken their mistress, and hurry her by a secret passage out of the castle, when the invaders were at the gate. Giulia, having procured a fleet horse, fled to Vallacorsa, where she was in safety. Barbarossa, baulked of the valuable prey he had hoped to seize, and finding that, the alarm having been given, forces were assembling to oppose him, ruthlessly plundered the town, and then hastened to re-embark. Among the nobility whom the danger of the Duchess summoned to her defence was her former admirer, Ippolito de' Medici. Resuming for the nonce the warlike accoutrements which he had laid aside for the priestly vestments, he gathered a body of his dependants and hastened to her defence. Before his arrival the danger had passed, and Giulia had returned to her castle. Here, whilst enjoying for a few days the hospitality which gratitude prompted her richly to offer, he begged her to allow him to send a painter, by whom a portrait of her worthy of the subject might be taken. The result was that Sebastiano del Piombo, the most famous portrait painter of his day, visited her at Fondi, and there executed a portrait which Vasari pronounces "divine," which was doubtless that seen by Brantome, and which, after passing through various fortunes, is probably now in the National Gallery in London.* On a subsequent occasion, about a year after, Ippolito paid another

* "The portrait of Giulia Gonzaga, painted by Sebastiano, went into the collection of Francis I. of France, at Fontainebleau. A portrait, said to be the same, having the attributes of a saint, S. Agatha or S. Apollonia, the nimbus and pincers, afterwards adorned the Borghese palace at Rome. It was purchased by the Rev. W. Holwell Carr, and bequeathed by him to the National Gallery, London."—Wiffen, p. 14, note.

visit to Fondi. The Duchess was from home, and Ippolito, finding this, retired to Itri. Here he was seized with sudden and violent illness, the symptoms of which were not unlike those of Asiatic cholera. After thirteen hours of intense suffering he expired. Suspicions that he had been poisoned fastened upon his groom, who was supposed to have been bribed to the infamous deed by Duke Alessandro, of Florence, his master's cousin. Whether the man was guilty or not was never ascertained; for though Ippolito believed he had been poisoned, and suspected his groom, he gave orders that no attempt was to be made to discover the evil-doer. The belief, however, had taken hold of the minds of the people, and when the groom returned to his native town the inhabitants rose up against him, and stoned him to death for his ingratitude to so kind and indulgent a master.

The disputes and troubles in which the Lady Giulia was involved after her husband's death were not the only nor the most vexatious annoyances which she had to endure in connection with her temporal affairs. Her step-daughter Isabella, having married as her second husband Carlo de Lanoja, Prince of Sulmona, commenced a process of litigation with the view of depriving her of that management of her husband's estates which she claimed in terms of his will, and securing to herself the possession of certain jewels which it was alleged on the other side had been only lent to her. The Lady Giulia declared herself willing to agree to a fair compromise, but to this the other party would not accede. A long and harassing series of processes and negotiations ensued, which was at length terminated by the judges deciding that the Signora Isabella should pay to the Signora Giulia 2500 ducats annually in quarterly payments, and 1000 ducats down for lapsed time. Giulia, however, retained the guardianship of her nephew Vespasiano, Isabella's son, on the demise of his paternal grandfather. Over his education and training she watched with the most assiduous and enlightened care, causing him to be instructed by the best masters in Tuscan, Latin, and Greek, and instilling into his mind the principles of piety and virtue. The fruits of her judicious culture were seen in his after-life. He grew up adorned by many excellences, and became one of the most zealous patrons of learning, both secular and sacred. He granted to the Jews a license to establish a Hebrew press at Sabbionetta, from which issued several editions of the Pentateuch, Psalter, and Rabbinical commentaries. He died in 1591, and with him the dukedom of Sabbionetta became extinct.

It was whilst her mind was disquieted by the litigations provoked by her step-daughter that the Lady Giulia came under the influence of Juan Valdez. By this time she had left Fondi, and taken up her residence in Naples, where she had a house and establishment in the Borgo delle Vergine; though, to avoid scandal, she herself lived as a secular person at the Franciscan convent of Santa Chiara. In what way she was led to attend the meetings of the Reformers we are not told. We meet with her in the society of Valdez for the first time on the occasion of her walk home with him from the preaching of Ochino; but that this was not the commencement of their intercourse is evident from the tenor of the conversation which he reports as having taken place on that occasion, and especially from the fact that she there speaks of his having known her for a long time, and refers to previous conversations. Already it is clear that, in whatever way originated, their intercourse was of the most friendly character. The Duchess freely opens to him her mind, and asks his counsel in that state of disquiet and contrariety in which she felt herself, and he replies to her with the freedom and point which well-established friendship could alone have permitted. Their intercourse continued till his death; and there can be no doubt that his influence over her was great in the way of moulding her religious convictions, and helping forward the development of her spiritual life. She survived him for twenty-six years, during which she carefully sought to follow out the principles which he had commended to her. Her time was spent in the study of the Scriptures, "which," says a writer of the time, "she perused with pure and sincere heart;" in the visitation of the sick and the destitute; and in the society of persons like-minded with herself. After the death of Valdez, Carnesecchi became her confidential adviser. When he was put on trial for his relations with the Reformers, her name appeared in his correspondence; and this caused her to be brought under the inquisition of the Holy Office. The vexations to which she was thus exposed are said to have shortened her life. She died on the 19th of April, 1566, and was interred in the church of Santa Chiara; having in her last will virtually proclaimed herself of the Reformed party by commending herself, not, as a Romanist would have done, to the Virgin and the Saints, but to "the Lord God Almighty, her long-suffering Father, and to Jesus Christ his Son, her Redeemer;" to whom she committed her soul, "if it be worthy to be received into eternal life."* She left behind her a rich and fragrant memory, treasured in the inmost souls of those who best knew her worth. To after-generations her name has come down as that of one in whom the rarest gifts of mind and person were transcended only by the moral and spiritual excellences with which they were associated.

ON PRIVATE PRAYER.

TO THE YOUNG.

Prayer is the soul's incense—the rising of the spirit-nature to God. Prayer in its highest form is not a petition, but a communion with God. God is always near us, but we do not always realise his presence. In prayer He is not only near us,—we "draw nigh unto Him." Seasons of peace and places of retirement are especially suited to prayer.

Isaac went out into the fields to meditate or "pray."

It was outside the great city, on the banks of the Euphrates, that the pious Jews met together in exile, and poured out their grief to God, when "by the waters of Babylon they sat down and wept."

With the blue peaks around him, on the top of Mount Carmel, from whence he could descry afar the shining levels of the Mediterranean sea, Elijah bowed his head between his knees in the frequent attitude of prayer.

Without the town, by the river side, the converts at Philippi met together to pray with Paul.

And our Lord himself often sought the hilly solitudes of Judea and Galilee, and continued all night in prayer.

When you are alone with God and nature, do not forget to raise your heart in swelling thankfulness to Him. See Him everywhere—in the waving of the golden corn-fields and in the light of setting suns. Sanctify all outward things with his presence, and learn to associate all that is fair and lovely in his creatures with the Divine beauty and the Divine love.

It seems to me at this season of the year—in the Spring-time, when we go out into the fields and see the first flowers budding, and nature re-clothing herself with a bright robe of living green—the heart cannot resist joining its own cry of joy to the voices of the world, re-orient out of dust, and the hymn of praise rises with the songs of wild birds and the breath of flowers!

David mentions three special seasons of prayer—"In the evening, morning, and at noon will I pray and cry aloud."

Morning Prayer.—One of the most natural seasons for prayer is certainly the morning. In the morning the mind is clearer, all the faculties are renovated by God's blessed mission of sleep. The night's rest has prepared our eyes for the glorious sunlight, and nerved us for the trials and the business of the day. When we awake in the morning, let our first thoughts be of God—the first moments of the day should be moments of solemn self-dedication. I think it will be either so, or just the reverse—your thoughts are either of God or they are devoted to the world; and, remember, the thoughts and resolutions of the early morning will influence you all day. Neglect not to invigorate your soul with prayer before you set out on your day's journey—neglect not to commit your way unto the Lord, that He may guide your feet into the way of peace. His Holy Spirit, with the overflowing waters of grace, waits to flow through your soul, and make you pure. For you his baptismal streams, like his mercies, are "new every morning."

But there is another morning: it is the morning of life; it is your youth. This is a season of precious opportunity. The sands which are running through your hour-glass are indeed golden sands, and they can never be recalled. Let the morning of your life be also a season of solemn self-dedication to God. Do not let it find you and leave you careless. Be not like the disciples in the garden of Gethsemane: waste not in sleep the precious hours given you to prepare for the coming struggle. You may go to sleep just as they did—sleep whilst your Master is praying and suffering; and when the struggle comes you will be unprepared, just as the disciples were: suddenly waked from slumber, "scarcely able to stand, unable to see right from wrong, and hurried headlong into evil. You are young, perhaps, and surrounded with kind friends and guardians; you have not yet come into rude contact with the outer world. Now is your quiet Gethsemane,—Gethsemane's struggles you cannot yet know,—See that you learn not too well Gethsemane's sleep."*

After prayers of thankfulness and praise, the most appropriate morning prayers are prayers against temptation, and these will be both prayers for yourself and prayers for others; pray thus: "Lord keep me this day from temptations to selfishness, impurity, unkindness, and from all dangers which may assault and hurt the body and the soul; watch over me, and all those who are dear to me;" for, learn it well, you cannot separate yourself from those with whom you live. They are almost always the instruments of your blessing and your trial; through them daily temptations meet you; bear them all in your prayer to God: it is best, it is safest; for them, too, there is a blessing, nor can you be blest apart from them.

Noonday Prayer.—Our first idea of "noon" is that of the sun beating down fiercely upon an arid plain, and in the bright sultry noon you will often long for some shady retreat, some green oasis, where you may find rest and communion with God. "At noonday," says the Psalmist, "I will pray and cry aloud."

Some persons make a practice of retiring in the middle of the day, if it be only for five or ten minutes, for noonday prayer. Some good men have even urged that it was not possible to lead a godly life without such prayer. We can hardly admit this; our souls are so differently constituted. To some it may prove salutary, but to others even the reverse. Some are able, from the nature of their occupations or characters, to withdraw themselves and fix their thoughts upon God in the middle of the day's work, but others, much occupied in business or of a more excitable temperament, although working "ever as in their great Taskmaster's eye," might not be able so far to banish intrusive thought as to make such special retirement useful. There are no stiff rules to be laid down; there are vital principles connected with prayer —principles, not rules. The principle is "Pray always, lifting up holy hands;" "Pray without ceasing;" but, remember, when or where or how long you pray is of little importance compared with the spirit of your prayer. There is no magic about prayer. It is an instinct as natural as any other human instinct. Prayer is the soul's desire for God; if it is not that, it is nothing. If you can say, on rising from your knees, "O God! for a few moments I have been one with Thee; I have received grace and strength in time of need. Thou hast inclined Thine ear unto me and heard me, and for that purpose came I hither"—then you have prayed. But for those who do not affect a definite time for noonday prayer, occasional short prayers at any time may be substituted. I allude to "ejaculatory prayers." Such was the Publican's prayer, "Lord be merciful unto me a sinner!" It was not remarkable for originality or length, but it reached Heaven; it was a reiterated utterance caused by the pressure of the same thought over and over again upon the soul. That is ejaculatory prayer. When you walk abroad you may say, "Turn away mine eyes, lest they behold vanity;" or, at other times, "Help, Lord," "Save me, O God, for the waters are come in even unto my soul." The Psalms are full, quite full, of sentences which will help you. Although the times, and the seasons, and the manner and substance of prayer must vary, yet of prayer, which is so vital a part of our spirit-life—prayer, which is the dream-ladder of the soul—the very channel of communication between God and man—prayer of any kind, at any time, so only it be real, we can never have too much.

There are some temptations which are continually meeting us; scarcely a day passes without our being beset by them—trials which spring, it may be, from our family and social relations. Let us pray that our very blessings may not lead as astray. We have so much to be thankful for—enjoyments, friends, families, brothers and sisters—let us beware how we use them. It is God's law that the very things which should be our blessings may become our curses—what may guide us to Heaven may thrust us down to hell. Every day then we are tempted in our souls and in our members—suddenly, at all sorts of times, in all sorts of ways, and to such temptations we must oppose the suitable weapons of short and earnest prayers. To do this is a severe test of character, for when we most need prayer we are often least able to pray. Pray, then, that you may be able to pray when you are tempted.

One last word on Evening Prayer. When the shadows are closing around us, and another day in the rent-roll of our life begins to look black as we try to see it in the light of heaven, surely then, above all, it is a fitting time for solemn prayer.

Ere we lay our heads to rest upon our pillows, we ponder, "Another day of weakness and sin and failure is past—is lost! I have not been 'about my Father's business.'" We do not say there may not be other thoughts, for perhaps it is with a feeling of deep thankfulness that you lie down to sleep. You may be grateful for strength during the day; you may have received great blessings, great mercies, great marks of Christ's love. Many peaceful thoughts may mingle with your evening praper; but the first must be, "I have sinned, and come short of the glory of God," and this because confession is what puts us in our right position with God; it is the first step in our restoration, "I confessed my sin, and so thou forgavest the wickedness of my sin." In the morning, then, let us pray against temptation; at noonday, under temptation; in the evening, after temptation—that so we may learn daily more and more of His tender mercy "who tempteth no man," nor suffers any "to be tempted above what they are able to bear," but "who with the temptation makes a way of escape" for all, that they may "return unto the Shepherd and Bishop of their souls." H. R. Haweis.

THE SHULAMITE AT THE LORD'S FEET.

"My beloved is mine, and I am his: he feedeth among the lilies."—Canticles, ii. 16.

Poor heart! why throb thus wildly in my breast?
The more I ponder on my Master's word,
The more are doubts and fears within me stirr'd,
Long as my eyes on my own weakness rest.

I to come forth? What, I? 'Twas so He said—
My wav'ring steps to others must be guide,
My feeble arm must 'gainst the foe be tried:
There a whole world—and here a lowly maid!

Ah no, my Lord!—and yet the call is Thine!
I spoke unwisely, keeping self in sight;
I'll only look on Thy all-saving might—
Be calm, my heart! for my Beloved is mine!

Yes, my Beloved is mine—what wouldst thou more?
The cause is His! It is His work I do!
He is my rock, my shield and buckler too,
Of strength and wisdom my unfailing store.

And I am His. Oh heart, be faithful still!
Still let Him lead me as it seems Him best!
With Him to combat, or with Him to rest,
March, or encamp, according to His will.

My friend is mine, and I for ever His:
Himself he gave—myself to Him I give;
In me He dwells; in Him alone I live:
Was ever union half so blest as this? L. C. C.

WHAT MISSIONS ARE DOING IN WESTERN INDIA.

Some remarks of Dr. Livingstone's on the religious condition of Western India have lately attracted notice, and were referred to in a late number of this Magazine.* The subject is one of great interest; and Dr. Livingstone is a very candid, careful, and intelligent observer. His letter, as given in a recent number of "Evangelical Christendom," is now before us; and so pregnant a text might well warrant a pretty ample commentary. We hasten to say that our object is not criticism or correction, but enlargement and explanation. Those who have been interested by Livingstone's remarks will probably be glad to hear something more on the same subject.

We mean to speak of Western India in particular. To talk in fluent terms of India generally is somewhat hazardous. For India is a vast continent, the so-called provinces of which are nations; and every nation has its peculiarities in India, as elsewhere. Be it remembered that we reckon up at least twelve cultivated languages in India—each having its distinct and characteristic literature. In many points, Bengal is different from Bombay, and Madras often differs from both. Certainly Calcutta is not India, nor is it even Bengal, in the sense in which Paris is said to be France.

Nor is it enough to give the correct geography of the place to which our remarks are meant specially to apply. For society in India is not like society in Europe. Society in Europe consists of one great mass, divisible indeed into upper, middle, and lower portions, but yet, to a considerable extent, homogeneous. But in consequence of the universal prevalence of caste, Hindu society consists rather of a series of strata; and one stratum may have amazingly little in common with the stratum next it. And hence reforms in India—and, indeed, all influences, whether reforming or deforming—proceed laterally rather than vertically; they run along the stratum in which they take their rise more easily than they ascend or descend. Christianity may be rapidly extending in one caste, while it makes little or no progress in others inhabiting the very same district.

I wish, from the bottom of my heart, that the men who still tell us that the Gospel is making very little progress in India would keep in mind the very simple principle now mentioned. Dolus latet in generalibus: please to come to particulars. Tell us the exact place—tell us the class of people—regarding which your assertion is made. Dr. Livingstone supplies us with a case in point. He mentions that, before going to India, he "understood that the profession of Christianity by a native was generally evidence of bad character." Such was the information he had received. To what extent is this assertion true, or rather, how could such an extraordinary statement be made? Partly, it is a tradition of former days; a specimen, unfortunately not yet locked up in a museum, of the false and bitter things which used to be said in opposition to Missions when the battle for the opening of India to the Gospel had to be fought and won against the old East India Company. But partly, also, it is an instance of the sweeping, erroneous generalisations of which we have spoken. For there is to be found in connection with most military stations in India a mixed multitude of people of whom a great many are ready enough, if they can make anything by it, to call themselves Christians. In Western India few of these camp-followers are natives of the soil. The indigenous Christians are not fond of their society; they call them, slightingly, "people from Madras,"—as it happens that the far greater part of this mixed and often vagrant class comes from Southern India. Farther, the great majority of these so-called Christians are Roman Catholics, when they have any religion at all; of those we have seen fully five-sixths were Romanists. And, therefore, be their character what it may, our Protestant missions are in no way responsible for it. Livingstone's very true remark, after he had seen with his own eyes the missions of Western India, is that the people who gave him such information could have come in contact only with "the scum of camps and cities." Of camps, above all, we say; and the melancholy thing is that many of our countrymen—military men especially—unless they are heartily interested in the spread of the Gospel, may see native Christianity only as exhibited in this very "scum." The opinion of native Christianity held by such men, although just to a certain extent, regarding a certain class, yet, in the form in which it is commonly thrust forward, is deplorably and flagrantly wrong.

In speaking of missionary work in Western India, it is with some difficulty that I refrain from prefacing my remarks with an explanation of the chief characteristics of the native races. Perhaps in no part of the world is there a more remarkable confluence of races than in Bombay and its neighbourhood. Marvellous are the contrasts of costume and countenance—marvellous the Babel-like variety of dialects in the crowded, sweltering bazaars of that great commercial city, which is still rising in population with a rapidity almost beyond example. But, lest we lose ourselves in the rush and whirl, let us commence with what is easier of comprehension. Let us go first to the quiet country districts, and ask what is doing there.

We shall be compelled to confine our attention at present to the two great provinces of Maharashtra and Gujarat.

Maharashtra is the country of the Marathas, a people possessing a marked character and a marked history. They first came prominently forward about two centuries ago, when they rose in revolt against the Mohammadan Emperor of Delhi (the Great Mogul). The Maratha chiefs soon claimed to be lords paramount of India; and their plundering horse swept resistlessly over the continent from the Himalayas to Tanjore. They were finally overthrown by the British in 1818 ; but the wild spirit of the race was only curbed, not broken. The Marathas had waged war for religion as much as for empire—for plunder, indeed, more than either ; and the Brahmans, who had been all-powerful under the native rulers, hated the presence of the Mlencha—the unclean foreigner—with a perfect hatred. If we are to look at natural causes as predisposing men to the reception or rejection of the Gospel, assuredly, at the time when missionaries came to labour among them, the Maratha people were one of the least likely of Indian races to welcome their message. For the foreigner from the far West still grasped with the one hand the reeking sword which had cloven down their dominion, while with the other he presented to them the new Shastra.

* In "Notes for Readers out of the Way," page 422.

Another point is of importance. Missions to Western India are comparatively of recent origin. One of the first Scottish missionaries to Bombay has fallen at his post, only a few weeks ago. The earliest mission to the Maratha people goes only a little farther back than the Scottish. After many harassing impediments thrown in its way by the British Government, it may be said to have commenced its labours about the beginning of 1815.

This first mission to the Marathas was American. The next was English. The next was Scotch. On the southern boundaries of the Maratha country there next came a German mission, connected with the Basle Society ; but of this we shall hardly speak, as comparatively little of its extensive work is done among the Marathas. The same remark applies to a station of the London Missionary Society at Belgaum, at which two faithful men long laboured, and not in vain.

But avoiding over-minuteness, and not cumbering our page with lengthy statistics, we proceed to speak of Native Christianity. The largest number of adherents belong to the oldest, the Mission of the American Board, which has its chief seat in and around Ahmednuggur, a town about 70 miles N.E. of Poona. Connected with this Mission there are 23 churches, containing 640 communicants, and 500 baptized children ; in all 1140 persons.

This is not a large number of professing Christians. And yet it is not small, when various considerations are carefully weighed. In addition to what has been already mentioned regarding the prejudices of the Maratha nation (which influence powerfully all but the lowest castes) and also the shortness of the time the Missions have been at work, it is important to note that the rate of increase in the Missions of Western India is high. Thus, the members of the American Mission eight years ago were under 200. Or look at the rate in another place. About three years ago, two people were baptized as the first fruits of the Free Church Mission at Jaulna. In little more than two years the number baptized at and around that station had risen to sixty-two. I recollect that on going through the figures with some care about three years ago, it came out clearly that the ratio of increase of Native Christianity in Western India had been nearly 300 per cent. in ten years. And it is certainly higher now.

But enough of mere statistics. Who are the people among whom the increase mostly takes place ? As might have been expected, not mostly the higher castes. There are, in all the Missions, men of the very highest caste ; and not a few of the "twice-born" Brahmans have really been born of water and of the Spirit, and are now energetic preachers of the once-hated faith. But still the majority, ay, the great majority, of those who are now rapidly coming over to Christ are the lower classes. Among the caste of the Mahars, who, though despised now by the upper classes, possibly were the original occupiers of the soil and gave name to the country,* the American Mission labours, with cheering tokens of Divine favour and ever-growing success. The English and Scottish Missions have drawn many of their recent converts from a yet lower class—the Mangs.

Some of the Missions are preparing to commence operations among the wild aboriginal races living among the mountains and the forests ; and when they shall do so, all the experience of the past encourages the pleasing expectation that the progress of the truth among these will be still more rapid than among the castes that have been yet referred to. The Brahmans and the Parbhus come over by units, the Mahars and Mangs by tens, or rather hundreds ; and we may hope that the Waralis and Bheels, and Gonds, will come ere long by thousands. The explanation of the difference is not far to seek. The higher classes are held in the iron grasp of an ancient, fully developed, and elaborately constructed system, with complex rites to fatigue the conscience, and a most fantastic mythology to regale the fancy ;—above all, with a watchful priesthood ready to explain it, and to enforce it by penalties more tremendous to the Hindu than death itself. The religion of the lowest castes, on the contrary, although wild and gloomy enough, is yet comparatively vague and shapeless ; and it more easily gives way before a definite and loving faith. This is still more true of the half-savage jungle tribes. Be it remembered also that the lower classes have always been despised and trampled on by the higher. On the whole, then, if the result ere long shall be that men of low castes and outcasts shall be found pressing into the kingdom, while the haughty Brahman, and even the middle-class man, remain self-excluded, it need not greatly surprise us. And while we must ever feel that in the Divine election of particular communities to receive before others the blessings of Divine grace, there is much which it baffles human wisdom to explain, yet surely we may without presumption say that we recognise a beauty in the way in which the light of life now dawns by degrees on India. It is redemption to all, yet it comes in a certain order ; it is redemption first to the oppressed —and next, to the oppressor.

So far have we spoken of rural Missions in Maharashtra. Let us turn now to Gujarat. In this rich and important province, with six or seven millions of inhabitants, there was one Mission that laboured since the year 1815—that of the London Missionary Society. Its head-quarters were at Surat, which was formerly a great commercial city, though it has been steadily declining as Bombay has been rising. Much faithful work had been performed, and important good achieved before the London Missionary Society withdrew from Gujarat a few years ago, handing over an interesting body of converts to the Irish Presbyterian Mission, which had commenced its labours in the year 1841. Unhappily there have hardly ever been more than five or six missionaries labouring in the whole province, even when both Missions were in the field.

Less warlike than the Marathas, having few or no traditions of independence and empire, and split up into a larger number of conflicting sects, the people of Gujarat might seem likely to be less prejudiced against the Gospel than the inhabitants of the sister province. And so they probably are. Among the middle classes of the Hindus proper a hopeful entrance has been made; and Christian agricultural settlements at Ahmedabad and Borsud exhibit pleasing specimens of native Christianity. And about four years ago a new movement occurred, of a somewhat remarkable character;—fully 200 families of Dhers, a caste very much answering to the Mahars of the Maratha country, came to the missionaries—spontaneously, as one might say, yet surely the hand of God was there—and put themselves under Christian instruction. These were from twenty-eight different villages. Their motives, doubtless, were mixed; they were not actuated solely by a desire to know the truth; partly, they sought relief from the intolerable tyranny of the higher castes. But let no one blame them for this, nay, let us praise them; for he deserves the lash who consents to be a slave. This important movement has not disappointed the Mission. Additions are still made to the numbers under instruction; and a late report mentions an accession of twenty families at once. And so the influence spreads along the caste.

It would appear that the rural Christians whom Dr. Livingstone came in contact with were at the two settlements in Gujarat which we have mentioned. A friend who saw them lately describes their appearance as like that of respectable men of the small farmer class at home. Livingstone's remark is still more pointed. "One thing," says he, "struck me very forcibly, on looking at the Christian women of Ahmedabad, Borsud, and elsewhere—the change of expression in their countenances. They were pleasant to look at; while the women of the lower classes seem to have discontent imprinted on their faces." Precisely so. This is one of the most blissful changes that the Gospel effects in India; and it is also one of the most patent. Females of the higher classes may sometimes have a look of easy comfort and content; but those of the middle and lower classes have an expression of anxiety and suffering, and what one might call a kind of bewildered look, as if they not only groaned under the burden of care, but also (to quote Wordsworth's phrase) as if they "wondered at the sorrow of the time." In Christian women this has given place to an aspect of intelligence and peace. Exceptions, of course, will occur; but most certainly this is the rule. And the remark does not apply only to Western India. Anywhere, if on the outskirts of a village you come to a well and see the women drawing water, a glance will discover what religion they profess. In many cases the clothing shows this; for the clothing of the Christian woman is fuller and more modest than that of the Hindu. This is especially the case in the south of India, where the dress of some of the lower castes hardly conceals at all the upper portion of the body. But wholly apart from the dress, the religion is discoverable from the look and manner. The Gospel of the grace of God—the Gospel of purity and peace—has stamped itself on the features and demeanour, so as to be known and read of all men:—even the heathen have confessed that they are astonished at the change.

In Mr. Merivale's very suggestive book on "the Conversion of the Northern Nations" there occurs the following sentiment, which has much interest when taken in connection with the point I have been discussing. "The divorce of mothers from the moral training of their children was an inherent weakness of Paganism, which made it fall and collapse in presence of the Christians—of men themselves brought up by holy women in the fear and nurture of the Lord" (p. 152). Much has been said—and it is impossible to say too much—of the benefits which Christianity in India will confer on woman, now enslaved and trampled on; but it is well, likewise, to remember how nobly emancipated woman will repay the kindness by rising at once to the discharge of her highest duties, and so hastening the blessed day of India's Christianization.

As given in the Report of last year, the whole number of native Christians in the Gujarat Mission is 300. The baptisms last year were seventy-five. The number may seem small; but it implies a rapid increase during the last few years. And let us remember that in the whole province of Gujarat there have hardly been, for years, more than four missionaries labouring at once—a man to two millions, or thereabouts. Yet Gujarat is said to be "occupied!"

Thus far I have spoken almost exclusively of rural Christianity in Western India. This is native Christianity, pure and simple—not as surrounded and affected by the adjuncts of Western civilization. In their habits of life the native Christians in the villages resemble their native neighbours, unless in so far as the Gospel, by teaching a higher morality, has compelled a change. I would fain linger on the subject, and describe their mental and spiritual characteristics; but I must press on.

I come now to speak—but very briefly—of the large cities of Western India. Pre-eminent in the Maratha country are, of course, Bombay and Poona.

The main characteristic of the missionary work carried on in these places, as compared with the rural districts, is the amount of education. There are three large missionary institutions in Bombay; and a still larger one in Poona. There are other schools less advanced. In Gujarat the Irish Presbyterians have thought of establishing a Missionary College at the great city of Ahmedabad; and I shall be truly thankful when they can effect their purpose.

From the missionary institutions there issues forth a stream of youths, who are not only well trained in the branches of general education, but familiar with the high teachings of Christianity. Some of the pupils are not only convinced of the truth of the Gospel, but converted. These do admirable service as preachers, teachers, translators of the Holy Scriptures, authors of tracts and often of tolerably large books, writers in periodicals, and so forth. I have lists now beside me of the publications of some of these educated Christians; their number and size would astonish most men; and, in several cases, the fluency is not more remarkable than the grace with which these writers use their mother tongue. Vernacular Christian literature is advancing in Western India; and whereas, at first, and for many years, the missionaries were almost the sole contributors, of late native Christian authorship has become quite a power in the land. The pity is that readers should still be sorrowfully few; for the productions I speak of are readily, often eagerly, purchased by the natives who can use them.

It is sometimes said that if an educated Christian youth leave the service of the Mission, and accept of secular employment, his influence in furthering the Gospel is nearly lost. Assuredly this is a great mistake. The young native Christians mingle in the various ranks of native society; and the example of pious men is a life-long proclamation of the Gospel. The testimony they render for Christ comes even with greater emphasis, when they are not in the pay of the Mission. The Missions of course require agents—increase of Mission work demands increase of agency; and there is a danger that a far higher rate of remuneration obtainable elsewhere may carry off to secular pursuits some whom we would fain see devoting their talents to the direct extension of the faith; the foreign field and the home field are in this respect alike. The question of the supply of fit agents is certainly a very grave one; but hitherto, at all events, there has been far less difficulty in obtaining the agents in India than in procuring from Britain the means wherewith to support them.

But I am reminded of the affecting truth that in our Mission colleges and schools in Western India, where twenty or forty are impressed or even convinced of the truth of Christianity, only one is actually baptized. Yes: the conductors of Mission colleges know full well the terrible anguish of

> Still travailing in second birth
> Of souls that will not be redeemed;—

and I have no wish either to conceal the sorrow or to undervalue its amount. While then we rejoice over the one baptized, what of the forty who are "almost persuaded?" They are not, in all cases, lost to Christ. Sometimes the seed sown lies dormant for years, and then springs up. Often there is a great movement in the heart and conscience, as death approaches. I venture to say often, for, in the great majority of cases, the heathen relatives no doubt are able to conceal it from the missionaries; and yet they come to know of such things from time to time. One of the most affecting cases I remember, was that of a young man, formerly a pupil in a Mission seminary, and not seemingly more impressed with the truth of the Gospel than many others, who died at a distance from all Christian friends. As death approached, he summoned his heathen relatives around his bed, declared he was in heart a Christian, expressed his deep shame and sorrow that he had not openly avowed his convictions, wondering whether such unfaithfulness could be forgiven. And then, saying he could not die with any measure of hope unless he obeyed Christ's command as far as in him lay, and feebly telling his young heathen wife the proper words, he made her sprinkle the water and repeat over him the formula. Was this baptism? Not such as qualifies for entrance into the Church on earth; but who shall say that poor Kesava Sakharam was not qualified for entering into the Church in Heaven? And during life such men as I have now referred to are often unimpeachable in moral conduct; in fact, the danger is that they make a religion of their morality, and so lull the conscience to repose.

In the great cities of India Christianity has to be at present, if I may use such an expression, its own forerunner. In the old Roman empire Judaism largely prepared the way for the spread of the Gospel by diffusing far higher thoughts than even a Socrates or a Seneca could supply, regarding God and the soul, and moral truth and duty, and heaven and hell. "The vanquished have given laws to the victors," is Seneca's expression, speaking of this very point; victoribus victi leges dederunt. But in India what shall prepare the way for the triumphs of the Gospel, by rousing the torpid conscience, and conveying right thoughts regarding God and man's relation to the Divine? Christianity herself must do it. And she is largely doing it. Every conception which the educated classes in India now form on religious subjects is powerfully influenced by Christianity; Christian thought diffuses itself like an atmosphere all around, and men perforce must breathe it.

Meanwhile, many influences come in as auxiliaries. Every change in India, if it be not positively bad, must be good, for it accustoms the mind to the idea of reform and facilitates future changes. But many of the changes are really good in themselves. Just administration, material improvement, increasing intercourse with Europeans, education,—above all, the wonderful readiness to have the females educated, and many other things that might be mentioned, will all co-operate with still higher agencies in preparing the way for the Christianization of India. They are, at all events in the large cities, rapidly revolutionising Indian mind, and slowly remodelling Indian life. A rather startling illustration of the change of sentiment occurred two years ago in Bombay. A number of educated young men, though themselves heathen, were shocked at the lengths to which the Portuguese native Christians, who are Romanists, carried their worship of the cross, and their use of images generally. A public meeting was held, at which the young Hindus and Parsees boldly taxed the Roman Catholics as idolaters, and as practising a form of worship condemned alike by the Bible and right reason. The priests (men educated at Goa, but very superficially) replied with what arguments they could; but certainly not to the silencing of their unlooked-for opponents. I should be glad, however, to feel assured that none of these very men who assailed the image-worship of Romanism, would have defended it when they heard a Protestant missionary preaching against it as practised by their own countrymen, or even (strange inconsistency) by themselves.

I have not time to enter into any full explanation of the mental state of natives educated at Government colleges. Unhappily it is often decidedly hostile to Christianity, even when friendly, from personal considerations, to the men who preach it. One great counteraction to the evil of this educated infidelity would be the enlargement and multiplication of missionary colleges. If any of our readers have been led to think that Missions have in some cases paid too much attention to education, I must entreat them to dismiss the thought. Unless we have a great increase of Christian education in India, and of a high order, alas for the upper and middle classes! and alas even now for the multitudes issuing from Government colleges, whose belief in all revealed religion is destroyed, and who drift hopelessly on the great ocean of scepticism, without an anchor, without a compass, without a guiding star! But for the missionary seminaries and the influence they exert, the evil would be intensified tenfold. I have already exhibited the deep interest I take in rural Missions. Let them be prosecuted with all possible energy. But prosecute with equal zeal the city Missions; nay, if there be a difference, with more. For the rural districts will continue much as they are, if they are left to themselves. But the cities will not; in them all educated mind would speedily harden into a bitter contempt of Christianity. Now is the call for action—action prompt, energetic, and sustained. Already the number is sorrowfully great, of men trained at much expense in Government seminaries, who, while they welcome the civilisation, sharply reject the religion of Britain; whose faith is the unhappy creed that can be compounded out of the old philosophies of the East, as interpreted by the newest infidelities of the West.

I have hardly yet mentioned by name the Parsees. But we must not overlook them. They form an important element of native society; and in so far as the Western Presidency differs in character from the others, the difference is, in good measure, owing to the presence of this race. They are Zoroastrians; descendants of the old fire-worshippers of Persia, who fled before the sword of the victorious Arabs in the seventh century after Christ. The educated Parsees eagerly profess Monotheism; they only reverence fire, not worship it, they say; they have no images made by men's hands; and more important still, they do not, like the Hindus, ascribe any impure qualities to the object of worship. Their holy book, the Zendavesta, abounds with puerilities, but not with immoralities. Wholly practical in their cast of mind, they never lose themselves, as educated Brahmans are prone to do, in dreams of transcendental speculation. They have adopted many of the European habits of life; are zealous and generous supporters of female education; and altogether are earnest for what seems progress and reform. Approximating as in many points they closely do to European manners and Christian modes of expression, one rather wonders that they do not come over more rapidly to the profession of the Gospel. But the body, though influential, is small; and its parts strongly cohere. The feeling of race is powerful; and in fact, ever since the Persian monarchy was restored in the third century of the Christian era, nationality and religion have in the Parsee mind been inextricably blended. When they come over, they will probably do so in a body. Meantime, we watch the movements of the Parsees with much of interest and hope.

It is difficult to stop; but I constrain myself. Altogether it is a wonderful and a magnificent transformation which is begun in yon far Eastern land—glorious as the rising of the sun; let us hope, as irresistible in its march. Some time ago Garibaldi spoke, with that noble enthusiasm which flames out in all his words, of "the awakening of the nations." He meant the awakening of nations in Europe to the light and joy of civil liberty. We sympathise with the lion-heart of the patriot-soldier; we rejoice fervently in the freedom he has won, with his strong arm and pure mind, for his own loved Italy, and which he anticipates for other lands. But yonder, we think, is the true "awakening of the nations;" yonder, in the ancient East; there, vast populations are shaking off the sleep of innumerable ages, with all the ghastly visions of the night, and crying aloud for the light of heaven: nay, it is truly a resurrection of the dead, and the many-peopled regions of the grave are quivering with new life.

And now, what are we to do in the view of these things? Reform your modes of missionary action, say some. Well, nothing on earth is perfect; no agency is so, either at home or abroad; let us go on improving. But the grand reform which the state of India and the world demands, is extension. Let our missionary activities be doubled, trebled, quadrupled. At present, as the Times newspaper lately said, "for any purpose that can claim a shadow of duty or a chance of success, the nation will lavish millions; but as for our faith, we leave it take its chance, or fling it an occasional sovereign as we do a copper to a questionable beggar." To our task, then; our noble, and ennobling task! We have been playing at missions; now for steady work! For Christ, and with Christ! Let us gird up our loins, not for a holiday procession, but for hard work on the battle-field, and still harder in the trenches!

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.

The late Mr. Douglas of Cavers, in a little tract entitled "The May Meetings," ingeniously connected the character of the season of the year with the great religious gatherings that take place in the weeks of May. The natural Spring, he remarked, is connected in the Bible with the moral Spring, and the renovation of all things. When the Winter is past, the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, and the voice of the turtle is heard in the land, then is the time when the voice of the Beloved comes to stimulate the Church to activity — "Rise up, my love, my fair one, and come away." Following out this analogy between the natural and the spiritual, he thought that Christians ought to connect the opening of the season with times of refreshing from the presence of the Lord, and to hail the first milder breezes with the supplication of "Breathe, O south wind!" "May the spirit of life," he added, "breathe upon us and ours, upon those who are near at hand and those who are far off, while the vernal influences of the Spirit of all grace are descending around us, and the Sun of Righteousness is shining upon us like the clear shining of the sun after rain." The May Meetings bringing under the notice of God's servants the spiritual wants of the whole world, on the one hand, and the varied and struggling efforts of the Christian Church to supply them, on the other, constitute beyond doubt a great call to prayer, as well as a most appropriate occasion for recruiting the energies, and reviving the zeal of all who long for the coming of the Kingdom.

We cannot profess to give anything like an exhaustive view of these meetings, but we may advert to a few leading points brought out in some of the reports and speeches. The season for Church-gatherings is later in Scotland than in England or Ireland; our Scottish notices will, therefore, not appear this month.

In a former number of this Magazine, we noticed the difficulty which the financial question was causing, and the special efforts that had to be made by the great societies to obviate the necessity of curtailing their operations. It appears that for the most part the revenue of the societies has been at least equal to that of former years, but in one source of income there is a very noticeable and considerable decrease. The legacies have fallen off very greatly. The most considerable decrease in this source of revenue is reported by the Bible Society, whose receipts from legacies are less this year by no less a sum than £23,470. The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel has suffered from the same source a decrease of £7260. Other societies have sustained corresponding losses. The fact is not wholly discouraging. It would seem to indicate that people are getting more than formerly into the habit of devoting their money to the purposes of Christian philanthropy in their lifetime. There is less of the tendency to save everything for their own use, or to reserve everything in their own custody, till the last moment, and then attempt to make compensation for life-long narrowness, by a large bequest to charity. In so far as this may account for the lessening of legacies, it indicates a wholesome spirit. The duties of Christian stewardship are surely better exercised by men deliberately and prayerfully giving from their income to Christian objects in which they are deeply interested, than by men accumulating money in a lump, and at their death coldly consigning it to be paid by the hands of a man of business into the treasury of a society. Of course there may be many cases in which, after having intelligently and prayerfully dedicated a part of their income to Christian societies in life, men will feel it their further privilege to destine a part or the whole of their realised property to the same objects after their death. But if the revenue from legacies is to fall off, ought there not to be a much larger increase from other sources? Mr. Gladstone adverted to a significant fact in the House of Commons a few weeks ago—that the proportionate produce of the income tax now is just double what it was a few years ago. In other words, the assessable income of Great Britain has doubled in a few years. It is certain that the benevolent outlay of the country has not increased in the same proportion. Does this not point to the absolute necessity of a more systematic culture of the habit of giving? The active and devoted men in our societies ought not to be always kept wasting their energies upon efforts to make ends meet, and the eloquent men in our societies ought not to have always to prepare their speeches to the tune of how cruel it would be to stop this rill and that of the stream of the water of life. Systematic giving would save many of the undesirable appeals that are now resorted to, and would probably provide the means for expanding the operations of our societies, according as Providence should open the door.

Looking first at the reports and speeches of those societies whose sphere of labour is chiefly or partly at home, it is interesting to ask what light they throw upon two very important questions—the state or progress of ritualism or of scepticism among the more educated classes of England, and the relation of the working masses to Christianity and its ordinances. It is remarkable, however, that direct allusions to these vital topics, especially to the former, do not occur very often. But one or two pronounced opinions may be found. At the meeting of the Church Pastoral Aid Society, Lord Shaftesbury gave utterance to his feelings in the strongest terms of excitement and terror. He thought that on every side the people were deluded by those who ought to be their guides. He hurled the most unqualified anathemas against "Ecce Homo" and all such books. "I confess," he said, "I was perfectly aghast the other day when speaking to a clergyman, and asking him his opinion of that most pestilential book ever vomited, I think, from the jaws of hell, I mean 'Ecce Homo:' when I asked him what was his opinion of that book, he deliberately told me—he being a great professor of Evangelical religion—that that book had excited his deepest admiration, and that he did not hesitate to say that it had conferred great benefit upon his own soul. Why, if we are to have this miserable and uncertain teaching, if the guides to whom we look for light and help can approve such works as that, how can we expect that the mass of the people, the mass even of the educated middle classes who are supposed to think for themselves, will not be led to wander out of the right way? Look at the policy on which the neological party proceed. They are praising a sensuous religion. They hope to get rid of doctrines by sentiments. They hope to get rid of creeds by feelings. Take up the writings of the most gifted and fascinating among them, and you will find them conceding almost all that you desire. You will find that they concede to you the incarnation and divinity of our Lord, and almost everything that you could wish in the history of our Lord and the history of our religion. But when you come to the great fundamental work, when you come to the great turning-point of our religion, without which there is nothing in it worth having, when you come to the atonement which was made on the Cross, when you speak of the atoning blood of our blessed Lord, there they stop short, and they refuse it to you altogether."

On the other hand, at the meeting of the Bible Society, the Earl of Harrowby remonstrated mildly against the language of panic and despondency, and presented a more hopeful view of the state and prospects of the religious world. Referring to the report of the society, he said :—"I think the tone is occasionally a little too despondent. I think it expresses too much apprehension—perhaps natural to all of us—too much apprehension and anxiety on account of the present state of the religious mind of the world. I cannot but think that the struggle which is now going on, that the reviving energies of infidelity, are in fact the prelude to a greater extension of true faith. I cannot but feel that anything is preferable to indifference, that anything is preferable to the state in which the world was a century ago, when perhaps, although agreed not to say much against Christianity, very little was done or said in its favour. The struggle of the present time kindles all our interest and all our affection—compels us to review the foundation of the faith—and thus kindles a deeper interest in the extension of that noble structure. I believe at this moment those very infidel publications which are so distressing and agonising, must, whether in Italy, in Germany, or in France, excite an interest in the Scriptures which has been hitherto unknown in those countries. I believe that many are saying, "Who is this Jesus of whom we hear so much? We should like to hear a little more." And that, wherever these abominable publications have found their way, the Scriptures have followed in their course, and, being more satisfactory to the human heart and feeling, have struck a deeper root than the publications which have previously attracted the public attention. I think, further, that even the Roman Catholic population themselves, and even many of the Roman Catholic priesthood, have been led in some degree, by their apprehensions for a common faith, to look with less animosity upon the Scriptures and upon those who propagate them, and I believe that one of the strongest testimonies of this is to be found in the great centre of our neighbouring nation—in Paris itself. When we find a popular Roman Catholic preacher, who has been attracting thousands of cultivated and literary men around him to hear his harangues in favour of the Christian faith and against infidelity—when we find the Archbishop of Paris coming forward to thank the preacher for his zeal and the sentiments which he has expressed—when we find Roman Catholic priests joining with the Jews and Protestants in a common translation of the Scriptures into the French tongue, I think these are symptoms that, however widely separated, Christians have a common object, and are beginning to feel, and are ready to acknowledge, the source of all, the Holy Scriptures, and that they cannot but be led in some degree to greater community of faith."

The growing interest in the Word of God and reverence for its inspired character referred to by Lord Harrowby, has been variously illustrated by speeches from different parts of the world. Mr. Stuart, of Philadelphia, spoke in the most glowing terms of the efforts to circulate the Scriptures that had lately been made in America, and the cordial reception they had met with. The capacity of the American Bible Society to produce Bibles had been taxed to its utmost during the war. By its steam presses it could throw off twelve copies of the Bible every working minute, but at times during the war even this supply had been unequal to the demand. Altogether, they had circulated two million copies of the Word of God in the army and navy. In the State of Massachusetts inquiries had been instituted as to the character of the men who had been in the army, and it was reported that they had come back better men than they went, and that this was greatly due to the influence of the Bibles that had been distributed among them. Another American gentleman adverted to the facilities for circulating the Scriptures which the same society continues to enjoy. In the Freedmen's Schools in Richmond, Petersburg, and elsewhere, the freedmen were gladly welcoming the Word of God, and earnestly studying it. The children were trying to read it, and follow its teachings; and they were everywhere asking that as they are now at liberty to learn to read, the first book they shall have shall be the Book of books. A gentleman from China told of a missionary tour he had taken there some years ago along with a missionary, when the people ran after their boat along the banks of a river, clamouring for gifts of the Holy Scriptures; and one evening when they came to anchor, a native came and held a lengthened conversation with the missionary, and asked for further instruction in the way of life, his attention having been excited by a stray copy of a Chinese New Testament which he had received about a year before, at a distance of one hundred miles. Thus, whatever in other respects may be the signs of the times, there seems to be ample cause for believing that God is answering the prayer—"that the Word of the Lord may have free course and be glorified."

If we inquire more particularly what views are expressed upon the religious state of the masses at home, and their relation to Christian ordinances, we find on the whole a somewhat hopeful tone prevailing. The London City Mission reports an average amount of results; among which, statistically stated, are—the reclamation of 1102 drunkards, the closing of 173 shops on the Lord's-day, and the rescue of 368 fallen women. This society has been vigorously pushing forward its operations among particular sections of the London population, and often with considerable success. Among others, it has established missions to public houses, and on some future occasion we may have a word to say of its operations in this rather repulsive, but, as the result shows, by no means hopeless field. The Ragged School and Reformatory movement advances in its benevolent career; and Lord Shaftesbury has had, among other successful cases, a most interesting one to report, the case of a neglected boy, which first became known to the public in Mr. Greenwood's account of his visit to the Casual Ward of the Lambeth Workhouse. "In his opinion the gentleman who wrote that picturesque and interesting account of the casual ward in which he had the courage to spend a night, had rendered very great service to his fellow-creatures. They would remember that in that account Mr. Greenwood—for he believed that was the gentleman's name—described what appeared to be one of the most incorrigible boys that could possibly be imagined. The boy, who was called 'Punch,' was about sixteen years of age, and he made himself remarkable as doing everything and saying everything to give annoyance to everybody. That he ought to be hanged or made away with in some other effectual way must have been the opinion of all who read of him. But where did they think 'Punch' was now? In the Refuge at Great Queen-street, Lincoln's-inn-fields. At the supper which was given some time ago to homeless boys 'Punch' attended. The noble earl confessed that at that time he was not acquainted with 'Punch,' but he believed 'Punch' knew him. In the course of conversation he (the chairman), talking with some gentlemen about the 'Amateur Casual's' revelations, mentioned the name of the boy 'Punch,' when a voice close at hand cried out, 'I's here.' The little fellow was told to call the next day, which he did. From his expressed anxiety to get an opportunity of improving his position, he was got into the house in Great Queen-street, and he was now one of the best boys in it—as happy as possible, and in a way to become a good subject of the Queen, and a citizen of the kingdom to come."

The most careful attempt we have met with to estimate the Christian and social standing of working people is in an address at the meeting of the Church of England Scripture-readers' Association, by the Rev. Edward Garbett of Surbiton. On one point Mr. Garbett gave a very decided opinion,—that the unskilled labourers of London, though earning far less money, were in a better state morally and religiously than the skilled artizans. There was a strong class feeling among artizans, a strong love of respectability, but wanting the guidance of Scripture truth and the Spirit of God, the feeling was superficial and unreal. The semblance of respectability made the vices and discomfort and frivolity that often characterised the life of artizans the more deplorable. The labourers were more accessible to Scripture-readers and other Christian agents, and had more frankness, more disposition to learn, and more openness of heart. The navvy, for example, was quite a different man from what he was ten years ago. Then he was rude and discourteous, now he showed kindness, genial courtesy, respect for himself and for others, and a hearty desire to hear the Word of God. The mind of the artizan class, on the contrary, reflected the sceptical literature with which they were conversant. They were notoriously inaccessible to Christian labourers, and the consequence was, to use a Hibernicism, that the worst parts of London were not the worst. There were now greater evils in the west parts of London than in the east. But even the mechanic was beginning to improve. He was beginning to care less for the pleasures of the tap, and to appreciate domestic comfort more highly. His prejudice against the upper class was abating, and the conviction was gaining ground that many of them were sincerely desirous of his good. His mind was in a peculiarly receptive mood; and on such an important topic as the desecration of the Sabbath Day, as Mr. Hughes had cordially testified, the great mass of the working classes were sound. On the whole, he believed that there had been a slow and silent progress, which was more hopeful than any sudden and rapid change could be. The change was coming as surely and as silently as an English Spring, and before the soft May showers of the Divine blessing the verdure would burst forth in all its beauty. The Gospel of the Grace of God was their only effectual weapon, and their only source of strength. They hoped all things, because all things were possible with God.

Turning to survey the Continent of Europe, as reflected in the reports of the societies, there is little of a novel kind to attract our attention. Missions to the Jews are still mainly sustained by faith, and though here and there a few sounds as of the joy of harvest are heard, the labourer for the most part is still sowing in tears. The interest of Evangelistic work on the Continent centres mainly in Italy; and nothing can be more interesting than the glimpses we have of the progress of the truth in that peninsula. Prebendary Burgess in addressing the Tract Society, drew a striking contrast between the past and the present times in Italy. Formerly it was hardly possible to get a tract or a Bible across the Alps; now the whole of Italy, with the exception of two small portions, was open to both. Selecting Naples for special illustration, he said:—

"If you could have visited Naples in those days you would have seen, as regards the character of the scenery, a paradise; but, as a clever writer has said, it was a paradise inhabited by devils. The superstitions, the immoralities, the horrors of Naples under the old régime it would be impossible to describe, and the priests of St. Januarius 'loved to have it so.' But now, what do you see in that city? I have visited the Protestant schools in that city; I have examined there the children of lazzaroni, excavated, as I may say, from the lowest strata of society. These children, when they first appeared at school, were so degraded as to be scarcely human in appearance; but in the course of a few weeks their aspect was entirely changed, and intelligence beamed from their bright Italian eyes. I heard them read well in a rather difficult book, and when I asked how long they had been reading it, I found that twenty-eight girls had mastered all of it within six months. What do you think happened last Christmas in Naples? It was a happy thought of some Christian ladies to collect all the children in the Protestant schools, and give them a treat in the shape of a Christmas-tree. Imagine, my friends, a Christmas-tree in Naples! The difficulty was to get a room large enough to hold them all, none of the school-rooms being sufficiently spacious for a children's festival. One of the Evangelists, a man of humble station, went to the Municipality and told them what we wanted. As soon as they heard the word children, the Municipality said, "Oh, we will give you a room, if it is connected with children and education;" and the result was that they placed at the disposal of the school-managers a magnificent room in which the Bourbon princes used to distribute prizes. Five hundred Protestant children went in procession through the streets of Naples, with banners displayed, to the place where the festival was to be held. In the room were seen in large characters several beautiful texts of Scripture, and among them was this one in Italian, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Hymns were sung on the occasion; the festival was conducted amid great joy; and the little presents that hung on the Christmas-tree were eagerly sought. Such was the scene witnessed in Naples no longer ago than last Christmas. 'Where are we living? In what world are we? or in what age of the world?'"

In like manner at the meeting of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, the Rev. W. Arthur gave a glowing account of his recent visit to Italy. Though his visits had been almost quite confined to stations connected with the Wesleyan Society, and though other older and more extensive operations were carried on by other bodies, what he witnessed was extremely interesting. In the course of his tour he fell in with meetings and classes, more or less numerous, placards announcing Protestant publications, records of labours carried on with great success among soldiers and others, instances of conversion caused by reading the Scriptures, as in the case of a man, now a most active Evangelist, to whom an English lady at a village near Como had given a Bible, the reading of which had been the means of opening his eyes. Sometimes, too, he heard sermons by native preachers, which struck him as remarkably clear and powerful expositions of the way of salvation by the sacrifice of Christ. Mr. Arthur contented himself with a simple statement of facts, feeling that nothing further needed to be added to induce his friends to continue their efforts on behalf of Italy.

When we pass from Europe to Asia, and survey the great fields of heathenism, a very important fact is borne in on our attention by the concurrent testimony of almost all missionaries. That fact is the decay of Hinduism. "The great moral iceberg," as Mr. Birks remarked, "which has been moored for thousands of years under a tropical sun, but which the natural sun could not melt away; seems now to be disappearing under the more powerful influence of the Sun of Righteousness, and the mass of Hinduism to be giving place to the moral and spiritual influence of the gospel of Christ." Almost at random, from the speeches of missionaries, we cull a few illustrations of this decadence of Hinduism. Mr. Kilner, Wesleyan missionary from Ceylon, says, "The Hindu begins to see that there are not three hundred and thirty millions of gods, but that there is one true and living God. Caste is relaxing its grip. The other day, at Madras, I had a request to attend a Hindu meeting and deliver a speech, the request coming from some thirty young men and others who had formed themselves into a confederation for the destruction of caste. I have conversed with three or four high priests, as they call themselves, who have told me that they must keep up the ceremonial of Hinduism with all its hurtfulness, simply to maintain their hold on the pockets of the people. At one of our stations in Southern India, I lately visited a great temple, with no fewer than seven inclosures, in each of which it is said are a thousand monkeys, and in the centre, a shrine of the great god Brahma. My attention was drawn to the many loose stones I saw in the building, and to a leak in the roof, but in calling the notice of a Brahmin to these things, he simply said—'Who cares?'" At the meeting of the Church Missionary Society, emphatic testimony to the same effect was borne by a well-known Christian officer, Sir Herbert Edwardes. Referring to the fact that it is the thoughtful few who influence the opinions of the mass, he asks:—"Now, what are the ideas of the educated natives of the day? Let us take the Hindus, for they are nine-tenths of the population of India; are the most thoughtful race, and are doubtless the race through whom India will be regenerated. It may surprise many of you—but no one who knows the India of to-day will deny what I now state—that a school of thoughtful and proselytising reformers has sprung up, who are actively engaged in what they call the reformation of Hinduism. The points on which they mainly insist are,—renunciation of idolatry and polytheism, and adoption of a pure Deism; abolition of caste; abolition of polygamy; abolition of infant marriages; female education, and general introduction of women into society; purity of morals. A still more advanced school have a dawning consciousness that even Deism is but a halting place, and real reformers must push on to a higher faith. The centre of all this movement has been the association called the Brahma-Somâj, in Calcutta; and what marks the vitality of their impulse, is their missionary zeal. The Brahma-Somâj are most active proselytisers, and have sent missionaries of their own to the other two capitals of India, to preach the reformation they have in hand."

Colonel Edwardes proceeded to give an account of a dinner-party at Lord Shaftesbury's, consisting of all the native gentlemen that were in London, studying for the bar or the civil service. They all joined in the English meal without one thought of caste; and on being questioned as to their opinions of social life in England, they said that they had entirely changed, and they particularly dwelt on the necessity of a complete reform of domestic life in India. The Parsees were carrying on similar movements to the Hindus; the Mohammedans were the most difficult to move, though even among them there were some instances of movement. There was even a more advanced society of Hindus than the Brahma-Somâj of Calcutta, or the Seda-Somâj of Madras; a school that feel that Deism is no resting-place for the soul. They are eager to reform caste, yet they complain that their convictions are too feeble—the martyr-spirit cannot be evoked among them. In a remarkable article in a native newspaper there occurred a most touching appeal to England from this class, who felt, that while English education had robbed them of Hinduism, it had given them nothing instead. "Very strangely," say these people, "we daily see Hindus of every caste becoming Christians, and 'devoted missionaries of the Cross.' (Some people say we never see this—the natives tell a different tale.) They make an infinitely greater personal sacrifice than we as Hindu reformers are called upon to make. They give up Hinduism and their lives to protesting against it without any compromise; and they do it in spite of every family tie, and the active hatred sure to be excited against themselves for their apostacy. But they cannot help themselves. Truth, or what they believe to be the truth, is dearer to them than all the tender sanctities of parent, husband, wife, and child—than all the happiness of life, than very life itself. Strange that there should be such a difference between men of the same race, tongue, and caste! We begin to recognise this difference, and to inquire anxiously for its cause. It is evident that these men, who are so brave and single-minded for what they believe to be the truth, receive a new faith for the faith which education has destroyed within them. On the other hand, education provided by the State simply destroys Hinduism; it gives nothing in its place. It is founded on the benevolent principle of non-interference with religion, but in practice it is the negation of God in life. It is forgotten that, while interference in Christian countries would be a tyranny, in an idolatrous country education itself is interference with the established religion. Christians, holding a faith pure and rational in its essentials, may receive the highest education, and be only the more confirmed in their faith, and more tolerant of each other's minor differences. But education must destroy idolatry, and the State education of India, benevolent in its idea, practically teaches atheism. It leaves its victims faithless. Our young men are, many of them, forced by it into the unhappy position of the sceptics and infidels of Europe. Well may the reorganisation of society seem impossible under such circumstances. As soon as this is generally perceived and felt, the cry will go up to England, 'Father, Father, give us faith!' Knowledge alone does not suffice for men, nor material prosperity, nor good government; the things of this life are fleeting, the life to come is eternal; and men and nations can only be happy in recognising and acting righteously on this Divine fact. Without faith life is without an aim, death without hope, and there can be neither individual happiness nor national greatness. If England will not hear our cry, and, indeed, anticipate it, then will the shriek go up to our Father in heaven,—'Father, Father, gives us faith.'"

The immense interest excited by the system of examinations for honours at the University of Calcutta, unprecedented in any European university since the Middle Ages, is a sign of the times. The rage for education in the upper classes of India is unprecedented; and has much to do with the breaking down of belief in Hinduism.

At the meeting of the Baptist Missionary Society, Mr. Robinson, a missionary from Dacca in India, bore similar testimony to the progress of the Hindu reform movement. He told of a young man in Dacca who came in contact with Christian truth about a year ago, and, from a Bible which he obtained, became convinced of the truth of Christianity. He had never formally renounced Brahminism, nor been baptized; but he called himself a Christian; and it was his custom, when he went to his native village, to call the young men together, and teach them the lessons of Christianity. He had applied for a number of Bibles to teach this class, of whom he said that there were two or three who, he was sure, had learned to love Jesus Christ, and trust to Him as their Saviour. Mr. Robinson felt assured that there were many of the Brahmins who were not far from the kingdom of heaven, though they had yet made no formal avowal of Christianity. Nothing but lack of space prevents us from quoting similar testimonies from missionaries connected with other societies. For the same reason we cannot go into the subject of missions in other countries. We should particularly have liked to copy some of Mr. Ellis's remarks on Madagascar, at the meeting of the London Missionary Society.

We have dwelt at such length on the Meetings of the Evangelical Societies at London that we can hardly advert to the interesting intelligence which lies before us connected with various countries.

From Ireland, we have a letter in the Times from Archbishop Trench, containing an account of a visit to the wild region of Connemara, and a most hearty testimony to the reality of the work of conversion that has been going on there. The new congregations, formed largely of converts from Popery, and the schools, giving most efficient instruction, especially in the Holy Scriptures, are represented by Dr. Trench as most flourishing; and the impression left on his mind by his visit has been of the most gratifying nature. Dr. Trench adverts only to the congregations of the Established Church; but much has been done by the Presbyterians also.

At Paris, there has been held a Conference of Protestant Pastors, which has had a lively discussion. This meeting has been wont to be held for upwards of thirty years, and its object was to unite the pastors and elders of the different Protestant communities. For several years no effort was made to exclude the rationalists, but the boldness with which these have lately been asserting their dogmas, caused a proposal to be submitted that from and after the year 1867, these words should be added to the second article of the Constitution of the Conference :—"The Pastoral Conferences acknowledge, as the basis of their deliberations, the supreme authority of Scripture in matters of faith, and the Apostles' Creed, as the summing up of the miraculous facts therein contained." In the course of the discussion, which lasted four days, this motion was withdrawn, and a proposal to dissolve the Conference, and reconstitute it on a definite religious basis, supported by MM. Bersier and E. de Pressensé, obtained a very large majority : 162 votes being given in its favour.

It appears that the course of the Bible Translation Society, to which reference was made in our last number, is not very smooth. The Monde newspaper continues to abuse it, and some of the ultramontane prelates have fulminated against it the most terrible anathemas. They are indignant at it, as an attack on the principles and privileges of the Church, and an act of gratuitous folly. The consequence is, that most of the clergy have withdrawn from it. It is remarkable how easily the Romish prelates have been excited by a proposal which might have invested the Sacred Scriptures with a considerable measure of popular interest; and it is instructive to observe how completely the Romish priesthood in France are bereft of all individual liberty of action, and forced, at the sound of the episcopal voice, to crawl back into their shell.

Among other items of recent intelligence from Paris, we are told that the Archbishop of Paris lately called on M. de Pressensé, the Independent minister, to thank him for his book, "Jesus Christ, his Life and Work ;" that the Carmelite preacher, Hyacinthe, also called on M. de Pressensé, and on the family of the late Adolphe Monod, to thank them for books and to pray the Lord's Prayer with them ; and that at the meeting in the Oratoire of the Protestant Bible Society, M. Guizot made a speech on the inspiration and authority of the Scriptures that filled the rationalist part of his audience with astonishment.

The Pope has taken a new mode of upholding the influence of the Roman Church, by erecting, through a pontifical brief, into a permanent Jesuit College, all the staff of writers connected with the Civiltá Cattolica, —a paper conducted by Jesuits for the advancement of Papal interests. The members chosen by the Superior to conduct the Civiltá Cattolica, or any similar work, are to devote all their time and labour to composing and publishing writings for the defence of the [Roman] Catholic religion and the Holy See. Some idea of the principles and pretensions of this paper may be got from the following extracts :—

"The Sovereign Pontiff," says the Civiltá, "is unshakeable in the vindication of his rights. The whole world admires his courage, and the bishops conjure him to remain firm. The restitution of the provinces is a necessary condition of the pontifical sovereignty. If Rome remains, as we doubt not it will, in the possession of the Sovereign Pontiff, it must return to its former position, and re-enter into possession of all that liberalism has taken from it. But how can that ever be reconciled with Italian liberalism ?

"The Papacy and liberalism are two masters as contrary as Christ and Satan. It is impossible to serve one without separating from the other. We may be told that such an opinion is only true where liberalism is understood in its extreme and antichristian sense ; but that the effort must be made to Christianise liberalism, and so render it acceptable to the Pope. Christianise liberalism ! The idea is purely poetic. To Christianise it, you must bring it to confess the authority of the Encyclic : that is, to condemn the principle that the civil power has any right to impose bounds on the Church's liberty of action ; to condemn civil marriages, the doctrine of faits accomplis, the principle of non-intervention, of liberty of worship, liberty of thought, liberty of the press, separation of Church and State. You must bring it also to confess that the people have no right to revolt against their legitimate princes ; that the Church has a right to a corrective power, even as regards corporal punishments ; that she has a right to preside over the instruction and education of youth ; that the placet of the State, the appel comme d'abus, the interference in seminaries and pious establishments, are only so many usurpations of the secular power, &c. And after all this has been confessed, what remains of liberalism ?"

From the United States, we have great accounts of the celebration of the Centenary of Methodism. It appears that the two branches of the Methodist Church in the States, North and South, contain more than 1,600,000 members, and more than 22,000 travelling and local preachers. This probably represents an aggregate of several millions of persons connected with the Methodist body. Its Sunday Schools, its publications, and its missions, are all on a scale of very great magnitude. Its missionary contributions of last year exceed half a million dollars; but for the centenary year, it is proposed to raise two million dollars, and it is confidently expected that this sum will be largely exceeded. A great Centenary Hall is to be erected, and an Institution endowed for the training of missionaries and preachers. Chief Justice Chase took part in the meeting at which these projects were announced, and the enthusiasm of the assembly, though not noisy, is said to have been intense.

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

XXVI.

I WAS within a mile of the village, returning from my visit to the Misses Crowther, when my horse, which was walking slowly along the soft side of the road, lifted his head, and pricked up his ears at the sound, which he heard first, of approaching hoofs. The riders soon came in sight—Miss Oldcastle, Judy, and Captain Everard. Miss Oldcastle I had never seen on horseback before. Judy was on a little white pony she used to gallop about the fields near the Hall. The Captain was laughing and chatting gaily as they drew near, now to the one, now to the other. Being on my own side of the road I held straight on, not wishing to stop or to reveal the signs of a distress which had almost overwhelmed me. I felt as cold as death, or rather as if my whole being had been deprived of vitality by a sudden exhaustion around me of the ethereal element of life. I believe I did not alter my bearing, but remained with my head bent, for I had been thinking hard just before, till we were on the point of meeting, when I lifted my hat to Miss Oldcastle without drawing bridle, and went on. The Captain returned my salutation, and likewise rode on. I could just see, as they passed me, that Miss Oldcastle's pale face was flushed even to scarlet, but she only bowed and kept alongside of her companion. I thought I had escaped conversation, and had gone about twenty yards farther, when I heard the clatter of Judy's pony behind me, and up she came at full gallop.

"Why didn't you stop to speak to us, Mr. Walton?" she said. "I pulled up, but you never looked at me. We shall be cross all the rest of the day, because you cut us so. What have we done?"

"Nothing, Judy, that I know of," I answered, trying to speak cheerfully. "But I do not know your companion, and I was not in the humour for an introduction."

She looked hard at me with her keen gray eyes; and I felt as if the child was seeing through me.

"I don't know what to make of it, Mr. Walton. You're very different somehow from what you used to be. There's something wrong somewhere. But I suppose you would all tell me it's none of my business. So I won't ask questions. Only I wish I could do anything for you."

I felt the child's kindness, but could only say—

"Thank you, Judy. I am sure I should ask you if there were anything you could do for me. But you'll be left behind."

"No fear of that. My Dobbin can go much faster than their big horses. But I see you don't want me, so good-bye."

She turned her pony's head, as she spoke; jumped the ditch at the side of the road, and flew after them along the grass like a swallow. I likewise roused my horse and went off at a hard trot, with the vain impulse so to shake off the tormenting thoughts that crowded on me like gadflies. But this day was to be one of more trial still.

As I turned a corner, almost into the street of the village, Tom Weir was at my side. He had evidently been watching for me. His face was so pale, that I saw in a moment something had happened.

"What is the matter, Tom?" I said, in some alarm.

He did not reply for a moment, but kept unconsciously stroking my horse's neck, and staring at me "with wide blue eyes."

"Come, Tom," I repeated, "tell me what is the matter."

I could see his bare throat knot and relax, like the motion of a serpent, before he could utter the words,

"Kate has killed her little boy, sir."

He followed them with a stifled cry—almost a scream, and hid his face in his hands.

"God forbid!" I exclaimed, and struck my heels in my horse's sides, nearly overturning poor Tom in my haste.

"She's mad, sir; she's mad," he cried, as I rode off.

"Come after me," I said, "and take the mare home. I shan't be able to leave your sister."

Had I had a share, by my harsh words, in driving the woman beyond the bounds of human reason and endurance? The thought was dreadful. But I must not let my mind rest on it now, lest I should be unfitted for what might have to be done. Before I reached the door, I saw a little crowd of the villagers, mostly women and children, gathered about it. I got off my horse, and gave him to a woman to hold till Tom should come up. With a little difficulty, I prevailed on the rest to go home at once, and not add to the confusions and terrors of the unhappy affair by the excitement of their presence. As soon as they had yielded to my arguments, I entered the shop, which to my annoyance I found full of the neighbours. These likewise I got rid of as soon as possible, and locking the door behind them, went up to the room above.

To my surprise, I found no one there. On the hearth and in the fender lay two little pools of blood. All in the house was utterly still. It was very dreadful. I went to the only other door. It was not bolted, as I had expected to find it. I opened it, peeped in, and entered. On the bed lay the mother, white as death, but with her black eyes wide open, staring at the ceiling; and on her arm lay little Gerard, as white, except where the blood had flowed from the bandage that could not confine it, down his sweet deathlike face. His eyes were fast closed, and he had no sign of life about him. I shut the door behind me, and approached the bed. When Catherine caught sight of me, she showed no surprise or emotion of any kind. Her lips, with automaton-like movement, uttered the words—

"I have done it at last. I am ready. Take me away. I shall be hanged. I don't care. I confess it. Only don't let the people stare at me."

Her lips went on moving, but I could hear no more till suddenly she broke out—

"Oh! my baby! my baby!" and gave a cry of such agony as I hope never to hear again while I live.

At this moment I heard a loud knocking at the shop door, which was the only entrance to the house, and remembering that I had locked it, I went down to see who was there. I found Thomas Weir, the father, accompanied by Dr. Duncan, whom, as it happened, he had had some difficulty in finding. Thomas had sped to his daughter the moment he heard the rumour of what had happened, and his fierceness in clearing the shop had at least prevented the neighbours, even in his absence, from intruding further.

We went up together to Catherine's room. Thomas said nothing to me about what had happened, and I found it difficult even to conjecture from his countenance what thoughts were passing through his mind.

Catherine looked from one to another of us, as if she did not know the one from the other. She made no motion to rise from her bed, nor did she utter a word, although her lips would now and then move as if moulding a sentence. When Dr. Duncan, after looking at the child, proceeded to take him from her, she gave him one imploring look, and yielded with a moan; then began to stare hopelessly at the ceiling again. The doctor carried the child into the next room, and the grandfather followed.

"You see what you have driven me to!" cried Catherine, the moment I was left alone with her. "I hope you are satisfied."

The words went to my very soul. But when I looked at her, her eyes were wandering about over the ceiling, and I had and still have difficulty in believing that she spoke the words, and that they were not an illusion of my sense, occasioned by the commotion of my own feelings. I thought it better, however, to leave her, and join the others in the sitting-room. The first thing I saw there was Thomas on his knees, with a basin of water, washing away the blood of his grandson from his daughter's floor. The very sight of the child had hitherto been nauseous to him, and his daughter had been beyond the reach of his forgiveness. Here was the end of it—the blood of the one shed by the hand of the other, and the father of both, who had disdained both, on his knees, wiping it up. Dr. Duncan was giving the child brandy; for he had found that he had been sick, and that the loss of blood was the chief cause of his condition. The blood flowed from a wound on the head, extending backwards from the temple, which had evidently been occasioned by a fall upon the fender, where the blood lay both inside and out; and the doctor took the sickness as a sign that the brain had not been seriously injured by the blow. In a few minutes he said—

"I think he'll come round."

"Will it be safe to tell his mother?" I asked.

"Yes: I think you may."

I hastened to her room.

"Your little darling is not dead, Catherine. He is coming to."

She threw herself off the bed at my feet, caught them round with her arms, and cried,—

"I will forgive him. I will do anything you like. I forgive George Everard. I will go and ask my father to forgive me."

I lifted her in my arms—how light she was!—and laid her again on the bed, where she burst into tears, and lay sobbing and weeping. I went to the other room. Little Gerard opened his eyes, and closed them again as I entered. The doctor had laid him in his own crib. He said his pulse was improving. I beckoned to Thomas. He followed me.

"She wants to ask you to forgive her," I said. "Do not, in God's name, wait till she asks you, but go and tell her that you forgive her."

"I dare not say I forgive her," he answered. "I have more need to ask her to forgive me."

I took him by the hand, and led him into her room. She feebly lifted her arms towards him. Not a word was said on either side. I left them in each other's embrace. The hard rocks had been struck with the rod, and the waters of life had flowed forth from each, and had met between.

I have more than once known this in the course of my experience—the ice and snow of a long estrangement suddenly give way, and the boiling geyser-floods of old affection rush from the hot deeps of the heart. I think myself that the very lastingness and strength of animosity have their origin sometimes in the reality of affection: the love lasts all the while, freshly indignant at every new load heaped upon it; till, at last, a word, a look, a sorrow, a gladness, sets it free; and, forgetting all its claims, it rushes irresistible towards its ends. Thus was it with Thomas and Catherine Weir.

When I rejoined Dr. Duncan, I found little Gerard asleep, and breathing quietly.

"What do you know of this sad business, Mr. Walton?" said the doctor.

"I should like to ask the same question of you," I returned. "Young Tom told me that his sister had murdered the child. That is all I know."

"His father told me the same; and that is all I know. Do you believe it?"

"At least we have no evidence about it. It is tolerably certain neither of those two could have been present. They must have received it by report. We must wait till she is able to explain the thing herself."

"Meantime," said Dr. Duncan, "all I believe is, that she struck the child, and that he fell upon the fender."

I may as well inform my reader that, as far as Catherine could give an account of the transaction, this conjecture was corroborated. But the smallest reminder of it evidently filled her with such a horror of self-loathing, that I took care to avoid the subject entirely, after the attempt at explanation which she made at my request. She could not remember with any clearness what had happened. All she remembered was that she had been more miserable than ever in her life before; that the child had come to her, as he seldom did, with some childish request or other; that she felt herself seized with intense hatred of him; and the next thing she knew was that his blood was running in a long red finger towards her. Then it seemed as if that blood had been drawn from her own over-charged heart and brain; she knew what she had done, though she did not know how she had done it; and the tide of her ebbed affection flowed like the returning waters of the Solway. But beyond her restored love, she remembered nothing more that happened till she lay weeping with the hope that the child would yet live. Probably more particulars returned afterwards, but I took care to ask no more questions. In the increase of illness that followed, I more than once saw her shudder while she slept, and thought she was dreaming what her waking memory had forgotten; and once she started awake, crying, "I have murdered him again."

To return to that first evening:—When Thomas came from his daughter's room, he looked like a man from whom the bitterness of evil had passed away. For the time, at least, it seemed as if self had been utterly slain in him. His face had that child-like expression in its paleness, and the tearfulness without tears haunting his eyes, which reminds one of the feeling of an evening in summer between which and the sultry day preceding it has fallen the gauzy veil of a cooling shower, with a rainbow in the east.

"She is asleep," he said.

"How is it your daughter Mary is not here?" I asked.

"She was taken with a fit the moment she heard the bad news, sir. I left her with nobody but father. I think I must go and look after her now. It's not the first she's had neither, though I never told anyone before. You won't mention it, sir. It makes people look shy at you, you know, sir."

"Indeed I won't mention it.—Then she mustn't sit up, and two nurses will be wanted here. You and I must take it to-night, Thomas. You'll attend to your daughter, if she wants anything, and I know this little darling won't be frightened if he comes to himself, and sees me beside him."

"God bless you, sir," said Thomas.

And from that hour to this there has never been a coolness between us.

"A very good arrangement," said Dr. Duncan; "only I feel as if I ought to have a share in it."

"No, no," I said. "We do not know who may want you. Besides, we are both younger than you."

"I will come over early in the morning, then, and see how you are going on."

As soon as Thomas returned with good news of Mary's recovery, I left him, and went home to tell my sister, and arrange for the night. We carried back with us what things we could think of to make the two patients as comfortable as possible; for, as regarded Catherine, now that she would let her fellows help her, I was even anxious that she should feel something of that love about her which she had so long driven from her door. I felt towards her somewhat as towards a new-born child, for whom this life of mingled weft must be made as soft as its material will admit of; or rather, as if she had been my own sister, as indeed she was, returned from wandering in weary and miry ways, to taste once more the tenderness of home. I wanted her to read the love of God in the love that even I could show her. And, besides, I must confess that, although the result had been, in God's great grace, so good, my heart still smote me for the severity with which I had spoken the truth to her; and it was a relief to myself to endeavour to make some amends for having so spoken to her. But I had no intention of going near her that night, for I thought the less she saw of me the better, till she should be a little stronger, and have had time, with the help of her renewed feelings, to get over the painful associations so long accompanying the thought of me. So I took my place beside Gerard, and watched through the night. The little fellow repeatedly cried out in that terror which is so often the consequence of the loss of blood; but when I laid my hand on him, he smiled without waking, and lay quite still again for a while. Once or twice he woke up, and looked so bewildered that I feared delirium; but a little jelly composed him, and he fell fast asleep again. He did not seem even to have headache from the blow.

But when I was left alone with the child, seated in a chair by the fire, my only light, how my thoughts rushed upon the facts bearing on my own history which this day had brought before me! Horror it was to think of Miss Oldcastle even as only riding with the seducer of Catherine Weir. There was torture in the thought of his touching her hand; and to think that before the summer came once more, he might be her husband! I will not dwell on the sufferings of that night more than is needful; for even now, in my old age, I cannot recall without renewing them. But I must indicate one train of thought which kept passing through my mind with constant recurrence:—Was it fair to let her marry such a man in ignorance? Would she marry him if she knew what I knew of him? Could I speak against my rival?—blacken him even with the truth—the only defilement that can really cling? Could I for my own dignity do so? And was she therefore to be sacrificed in ignorance? Might not some one else do it instead of me? But if I set it agoing, was it not precisely the same thing as if I did it myself, only more cowardly? There was but one way of doing it, and that was—with the full and solemn consciousness that it was and must be a barrier between us for ever. If I could give her up fully and altogether, then I might tell her the truth which was to preserve her from marrying such a man as my rival. And I must do so, sooner than that she, my very dream of purity and gentle truth, should wed defilement. But how bitter to cast away my chance! as I said, in the gathering despair of that black night. And although every time I said it—for the same words would come over and over as in a delirious dream—I repeated yet again to myself that wonderful line of Spenser,—

> It chanced—Eternal God that chance did guide, yet the words never grew into spirit in me; they remained "words, words, words," and meant nothing to my feeling—hardly even to my judgment meant anything at all. Then came another bitter thought, the bitterness of which was wicked: it flashed upon me that my own earnestness with Catherine Weir, in urging her to the duty of forgiveness, would bear a main part in wrapping up in secresy that evil thing which ought not to be hid. For had she not vowed—with the same facts before her which now threatened to crush my heart into a lump of clay—to denounce the man at the very altar? Had not the revenge which I had ignorantly combated been my best ally? And for one brief, black, wicked moment I repented that I had acted as I had acted. The next I was on my knees by the side of the sleeping child, and had repented back again in shame and sorrow. Then came the consolation that if I suffered hereby, I suffered from doing my duty. And that was well.

Scarcely had I seated myself again by the fire when the door of the room opened softly, and Thomas appeared.

"Kate is very strange, sir," he said, "and wants to see you."

I rose at once.

"Perhaps, then, you had better stay with Gerard."

"I will, sir; for I think she wants to speak to you alone."

I entered her chamber. A candle stood on a chest of drawers, and its light fell on her face, once more flushed in those two spots with the glow of the unseen fire of disease. Her eyes, too, glittered again, but the fierceness was gone, and only the suffering remained. I drew a chair beside her, and took her hand. She yielded it willingly, even returned the pressure of kindness which I offered to the thin trembling fingers.

"You are too good, sir," she said. "I want to tell you all. He promised to marry me. I believed him. But I did very wrong. And I have been a bad mother, for I could not keep from seeing his face in Gerard's. Gerard was the name he told me to call him when I had to write to him, and so I named the little darling, Gerard. How is he, sir?"

"Doing nicely," I replied. "I do not think you need be at all uneasy about him now."

"Thank God. I forgive his father now with all my heart. I feel it easier since I saw how wicked I could be myself. And I feel it easier, too, that I have not long to live. I forgive him with all my heart; and I will take no revenge. I will not tell one who he is. I have never told any one yet. But I will tell you. His name is George Everard—Captain Everard. I came to know him when I was apprenticed at Addicehead. I would not tell you, sir, if I did not know that you will not tell any one. I know you so well that I will not ask you not. I saw him yesterday, and it drove me wild. But it is all over now. My heart feels so cool now. Do you think God will forgive me?"

Without one word of my own, I took out my pocket Testament and read these words:—

"For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you."

Then I read to her, from the seventh chapter of St. Luke's gospel, the story of the woman who was a sinner and came to Jesus in Simon's house, that she might see how the Lord himself thought and felt about such. When I had finished, I found that she was gently weeping, and so I left her, and resumed my place beside the boy. I told Thomas that he had better not go near her just yet. So we sat in silence together for a while, during which I felt so weary and benumbed, that I neither cared to resume my former train of thought, nor to enter upon the new one suggested by the confession of Catherine. I believe I must have fallen asleep in my chair, for I suddenly returned to consciousness at a cry from Gerard. I started up, and there was the child fast asleep, but standing on his feet in his crib, pushing with his hands from before him, as if resisting some one, and crying—

"Don't. Don't. Go away, man. Mammy! Mr. Walton!"

I took him in my arms, and kissed him, and laid him down again; and he lay as still as if he had never moved. At the same moment, Thomas came again into the room.

"I am sorry to be so troublesome, sir," he said; "but my poor daughter says there is one thing more she wanted to say to you."

I returned at once. As soon as I entered the room, she said eagerly:—

"I forgive him—I forgive him with all my heart; but don't let him take Gerard."

I assured her I would do my best to prevent any such attempt on his part, and making her promise to try to go to sleep, left her once more. Nor were either of the patients disturbed again during the night. Both slept, as it appeared, refreshingly.

In the morning, that is, before eight o'clock, the old doctor made his welcome appearance, and pronounced both quite as well as he had expected to find them. In another hour, he had sent young Tom to take my place, and my sister to take his father's. I was determined that none of the gossips of the village should go near her if I could help it; for, though such might be kind-hearted and estimable women, their place was not by such a couch as that of Catherine Weir. I enjoined my sister to be very gentle in her approaches to her, to be careful even not to seem anxious to serve her, and so to allow her to get gradually accustomed to her presence, not showing herself for the first day more than she could help, and yet taking good care she should have everything she wanted. Martha seemed to understand me perfectly; and I left her in charge with the more confidence that I knew Dr. Duncan would call several times in the course of the day. As for Tom, I had equal assurance that he would attend to orders; and as Gerard was very fond of him, I dismissed all anxiety about both, and allowed my mind to return with fresh avidity to the contemplation of its own cares, and fears, and perplexities.

It was of no use trying to go to sleep, so I set out for a walk.

XXVII.

It was a fine frosty morning, the invigorating influences of which, acting along with the excitement following immediately upon a sleepless night, overcame in a great measure the depression occasioned by he contemplation of my circumstances. Disinclined notwithstanding for any more pleasant prospect, I sought the rugged common where I had so lately met Catherine Weir in the storm and darkness, and where I had stood without knowing it upon the very verge of the precipice down which my fate was now threatening to hurl me. I reached the same chasm in which I had sought a breathing space on that night, and turning into it, sat down upon a block of sand which the frost had detached from the wall above. And now the tumult began again in my mind, revolving around the vortex of a new centre of difficulty.

For, first of all, I found my mind relieved by the fact that, having urged Catherine to a line of conduct which had resulted in confession—a confession which, leaving all other considerations of my office out of view, had the greater claim upon my secrecy that it was made in confidence in my uncovenanted honour,—I was not, could not be at liberty to disclose the secret she confided to me, which, disclosed by herself, would have been the revenge from which I had warned her, and at the same time my deliverance. I was relieved I say at first, by this view of the matter, because I might thus keep my own chance of some favourable turn; whereas, if I once told Miss Oldcastle, I must give her up for ever, as I had plainly seen in the watch of the preceding night. But my love did not long remain skulking behind the hedge of honour. Suddenly I woke and saw that I was unworthy of the honour of loving her, for that I was glad to be compelled to risk her well-being for the chance of my own happiness; a risk which involved infinitely more wretchedness to her, than the loss of my dearest hopes to me; for it is one thing for a man not to marry the woman he loves, and quite another for a woman to marry a man she cannot even respect. Had I not been withheld partly by my obligation to Catherine, partly by the feeling that I ought to wait and see what God would do, I should have risen that moment and gone straight to Oldcastle Hall, that I might plunge at once into the ocean of my loss, and encounter, with the full sense of honourable degradation, every misconstruction that might justly be devised of my conduct. For that I had given her up first, could never be known even to her in this world. I could only save her by encountering and enduring and cherishing her scorn. At least so it seemed to me at the time; and, although I am certain the other higher motives had much to do in holding me back, I am equally certain that this awful vision of the irrevocable fate to follow upon the deed, had great influence, as well, in inclining me to suspend action.

I was still sitting in the hollow, when I heard the sound of horses' hoofs in the distance, and felt a foreboding of what would appear. I was only a few yards from the road upon which the sand-hill opened, and could see a space of it sufficient to show the persons even of rapid riders. The sounds drew nearer. I could distinguish the step of a pony and of two horses besides. Up they came and swept past—Miss Oldcastle upon Judy's pony, and Mr. Stoddart upon her horse, with the Captain upon his own. How grateful I felt to Mr. Stoddart! And the hope arose in me that he had accompanied them at Miss Oldcastle's request.

I had had no fear of being seen, sitting as I was on the side from which they came. One of the three, however, caught a glimpse of me, and even in the moment ere she vanished I fancied I saw the lily-white grow rosy-red. But it must have been fancy, for she could hardly have been quite pale upon horseback on such a keen morning.

I could not sit any longer. As soon as I ceased to hear the sound of their progress, I rose and walked home—much quieter in heart and mind than when I set out.

As I entered by the nearer gate of the vicarage, I saw Old Rogers enter by the farther. He did not see me, but we met at the door. I greeted him.

"I'm in luck," he said, "to meet yer honour just coming home. How's poor Miss Weir to-day, sir?"

"She was rather better, when I left her this morning, than she had been through the night. I have not heard since. I left my sister with her. I greatly doubt if she will ever get up again. That's between ourselves, you know. Come in."

"Thank you, sir. I wanted to have a little talk with you.—You don't believe what they say—that she tried to kill the poor little fellow?" he asked, as soon as the study door was closed behind us.

"If she did, she was out of her mind for the moment. But I don't believe it."

And thereupon I told him what both his master and I thought about it. But I did not tell him what she had said confirmatory of our conclusions.

"That's just what I came to myself, sir, turning the thing over in my old head. But there's dreadful things done in the world, sir. There's my daughter been a-telling of me——"

I was instantly breathless attention. What he chose to tell me I felt at liberty to hear, though I would not have listened to Jane herself.—I must here mention that she and Richard were not yet married, old Mr. Brownrigg not having yet consented to any day his son wished to fix; and that she was, therefore, still in her place of attendance upon Miss Oldcastle.

"——There's my daughter been a-telling of me," said Rogers, "that the old lady up at the Hall there is tormenting the life out of that daughter of hers—she don't look much like hers, do she, sir?—wanting to make her marry a man of her choosing. I saw him go past o' horseback with her yesterday, and I didn't more than half like the looks on him. He's too like a fair-spoken captain I sailed with once, what was the hardest man I ever sailed with. His own way was everythink, even after he saw it wouldn't do. Now, don't you think, sir, somebody or other ought to interfere? It's as bad as murder that, and anybody has a right to do summat to perwent it."

"I don't know what can be done, Rogers. I can't interfere."

The old man was silent. Evidently he thought I might interfere if I pleased. I could see what he was thinking. Possibly his daughter had told him something more than he chose to communicate to me. I could not help suspecting the mode in which he judged

I might interfere. But I could see no likelihood before me but that of confusion and precipitation. In a word I had not a plain path to follow.

"Old Rogers," I said, "I can almost guess what you mean. But I am in more difficulty with regard to what you suggest than I can easily explain to you. I need not tell you, however, that I will turn the whole matter over in my mind."

"The prey ought to be taken from the lion somehow, if it please God," returned the old man solemnly. "The poor young lady keeps up as well as she can before her mother; but Jane do say there's a power o' crying done in her own room."

Partly to hide my emotion, partly with the sudden resolve to do something, if anything could be done, I said:—

"I will call on Mr. Stoddart this evening. I may hear something from him to suggest a mode of action.

"I don't think you'll get anything worth while from Mr. Stoddart. He takes things a deal too easy like. He'll be this man's man and that man's man both at oncet. I beg your pardon, sir. But he won't help us."

"That's all I can think of at present, though," I said; whereupon the man-of-war's-man, with true breeding, rose at once, and took a kindly leave.

I was in the storm again. She suffering, resisting, and I standing aloof! But what could I do? She had repelled me—she would repel me. Were I to dare to speak, and so be refused, the separation would be final. She had said that the day might come when she would ask help from me: she had made no movement towards the request. I would gladly die to serve her—yea more gladly far than live, if that service was to separate us. But what to do I could not see. Still, just to do something, even if a useless something, I would go and see Mr. Stoddart that evening. I was sure to find him alone, for he never dined with the family, and I might possibly catch a glimpse of Miss Oldcastle.

I found little Gerard so much better, though very weak, and his mother so quiet, notwithstanding great feverishness, that I might safely leave them to the care of Mary, who had quite recovered from her attack, and her brother Tom. So there was something off my mind for the present.

The heavens were glorious with stars,—Arcturus and his host, the Pleiades, Orion, and all those worlds that shine out when ours is dark; but I did not care for them. Let them shine: they could not shine into me. I tried with feeble effort to lift my eyes to Him who is above the stars, and yet holds the sea, yea, the sea of human thought and trouble, in the hollow of his hand. How much sustaining, although no conscious comforting, I got from that region

> Where all men's prayers to Thee raised
> Return possessed of what they pray Thee,

I cannot tell. It was not a time favourable to the analysis of feeling—still less of religious feeling. But somehow things did seem a little more endurable before I reached the house.

I was passing across the hall, following the "white wolf" to Mr. Stoddart's room, when the drawing-room door opened, and Miss Oldcastle came half out, but seeing me drew back instantly. A moment after, however, I heard the sound of her dress following us. Light as was her step, every footfall seemed to be upon my heart. I did not dare to look round, for dread of seeing her turn away from me. I felt like one under a spell, or in an endless dream; but gladly would I have walked on for ever in hope, with that silken vortex of sound following me. Soon, however, it ceased. She had turned aside in some other direction, and I passed on to Mr. Stoddart's room.

He received me kindly, as he always did; but his smile flickered uneasily. He seemed in some trouble, and yet pleased to see me.

"I am glad you have taken to horseback," I said. "It gives me hope that you will be my companion sometimes when I make a round of my parish. I should like you to see some of our people. You would find more in them to interest you than perhaps you would expect."

I thus tried to seem at ease, as I was far from feeling.

"I am not so fond of riding as I used to be," returned Mr. Stoddart.

"Did you like the Arab horses in India?"

"Yes, after I got used to their careless ways. That horse you must have seen me on the other day, is very nearly a pure Arab. He belongs to Captain Everard, and carries Miss Oldcastle beautifully. I was quite sorry to take him from her, but it was her own doing. She would have me go with her. I think I have lost much firmness since I was ill."

"If the loss of firmness means the increase of kindness, I do not think you will have to lament it," I answered. "Does Captain Everard make a long stay?"

"He stays from day to day. I wish he would go. I don't know what to do. Mrs. Oldcastle and he form one party in the house; Miss Oldcastle and Judy another; and each is trying to gain me over. I don't want to belong to either. If they would only let me alone!"

"What do they want of you, Mr. Stoddart?"

"Mrs. Oldcastle wants me to use my influence with Ethelwyn, to persuade her to behave differently to Captain Everard. The old lady has set her heart on their marriage, and Ethelwyn, though she dares not break with him, she is so much afraid of her mother, yet keeps him somehow at arm's length. Then Judy is always begging me to stand up for her aunt. But what's the use of my standing up for her if she won't stand up for herself; she never says a word to me about it herself. It's all Judy's doing. How am I to know what she wants?"

"I thought you said just now she asked you to ride with her?"

"So she did, but nothing more. She did not even press it, only the tears came in her eyes when I refused, and I could not bear that; so I went against my will. I don't want to make enemies. I am sure I don't see why she should stand out. He's a very good match in point of property and family too."

"Perhaps she does not like him," I forced myself to say.

"Oh! I suppose not, or she would not be so troublesome. But she could arrange all that if she were inclined to be agreeable to her friends. After all I have done for her! Well, one must not look to be repaid for anything one does for others. I used to be very fond of her; I am getting quite tired of her miserable looks."

And what had this man done for her, then? He had, for his own amusement, taught her Hindostanee; he had given her some insight into the principles of mechanics, and he had roused in her some taste for the writings of the Mystics. But for all that regarded the dignity of her humanity and her womanhood, if she had had no teaching but what he gave her, her mind would have been merely "an unweeded garden that grows to seed." And now he complained that in return for his pains she would not submit to the degradation of marrying a man she did not love, in order to leave him in the enjoyment of his own lazy and cowardly peace. Really he was a worse man than I had thought him. Clearly he would not help to keep her in the right path, not even interfere to prevent her from being pushed into the wrong one. But perhaps he was only expressing his own discomfort, not giving his real judgment, and I might be censuring him too hardly.

"What will be the result, do you suppose?" I asked.

"I can't tell. Sooner or later she will have to give in to her mother. Everybody does. She might yield with a good grace."

"She must do what she thinks right," I said. "And you, Mr. Stoddart, ought to help her to do what is right. You surely would not urge her to marry a man she did not love."

"Well, no; not exactly urge her. And yet society does not object to it. It is an acknowledged arrangement, common enough.

"Society is scarcely an interpreter of the Divine will. Society will honour vile things enough, so long as the doer has money sufficient to clothe them in a grace not their own. There is a God's-way of doing everything in the world, up to marrying, or down to paying a bill."

"Yes, yes. I know what you would say; and I suppose you are right. I will not urge any opinion of mine. Besides, we shall have a little respite soon, for he must join his regiment in a day or two."

It was some relief to hear this. But I could not with equanimity prosecute a conversation having Miss Oldcastle for the subject of it, and presently took my leave.

As I walked through one of the long passages, but dimly lighted, leading from Mr. Stoddart's apartment to the great staircase, I started at a light touch on my arm. It was from Judy's hand.

"Dear Mr. Walton——" she said, and stopped.

For at the same moment appeared at the further end of the passage towards which I had been advancing, a figure of which little more than a white face was visible; and the voice of Sarah, through whose softness always ran a harsh thread that made it unmistakeable, said,

"Miss Judy, your grandmamma wants you."

Judy took her hand from my arm, and with an almost martial stride the little creature walked up to the speaker, and stood before her defiantly. I could see them quite well in the fuller light at the end of the passage, where there stood a lamp. I followed slowly that I might not interrupt the child's behaviour, which moved me strangely in contrast with the pusillanimity I had so lately witnessed in Mr. Stoddart.

"Sarah," she said, "you know you are telling a lie. Grannie does not want me. You have not been in the dining-room since I left it one moment ago. Do you think, you bad woman, I am going to be afraid of you? I know you better than you think. Go away directly, or I will make you."

She stamped her little foot, and the "white-wolf" turned and walked away without a word.

If the mothers among my readers are shocked at the want of decorum in my friend Judy, I would just say, that valuable as propriety of demeanour is, truth of conduct is infinitely more precious. Glad should I be to think that the even tenour of my children's good manners could never be interrupted, except by such righteous indignation as carried Judy beyond the strict bounds of good breeding. Nor could I find it in my heart to rebuke her wherein she had been wrong. In the face of her courage and uprightness, the fault was so insignificant that it would have been giving it altogether undue importance to allude to it at all, and might weaken her confidence in my sympathy with her rectitude. When I joined her she put her hand in mine, and so walked with me down the stair and out at the front door.

"You will take cold, Judy, going out like that," I said.

"I am in too great a passion to take cold," she answered. "But I have no time to talk about that creeping creature.—Auntie doesn't like Captain Everard; and Grannie keeps insisting on it that she shall have him whether she likes him or not. Now do tell me what you think."

"I do not quite understand you, my child."

"I know Auntie would like to know what you think. But I know she will never ask you herself. So I am asking you whether a lady ought to marry a gentleman she does not like, to please her mother."

"Certainly not, Judy. It is often wicked, and always a mistake."

"Thank you, Mr. Walton. I will tell her. She will be glad to hear you say so, I know."

"Mind you tell her you asked me, Judy. I should not like her to think I had been interfering, you know."

"Yes, yes; I know quite well. I will take care. Thank you. He's going to-morrow. Good night."

She bounded into the house again, and I walked away down the avenue. I saw and felt the stars now, for hope had come again in my heart, and I thanked the God of hope. "Our minds are small because they are faithless," I said to myself. "If we had faith in God, as our Lord tells us, our hearts would share in his greatness and peace. For we should not then be shut up in ourselves, but would walk abroad in Him." And with a light step and a light heart I went home.

XXVIII.

Very severe weather came, and much sickness followed, chiefly amongst the poorer people, who can so ill keep out the cold. Yet some of my well-to-do parishioners were laid up likewise—amongst others Mr. Boulderstone, who had an attack of pleurisy. I had grown quite attached to Mr. Boulderstone by this time, not because he was what is called interesting, for he was not; not because he was clever, for he was not; not because he was well-read, for he was not; not because he was possessed of influence in the parish, though he had that influence; but simply because he was true: he was what he appeared, felt what he professed, did what he said; appearing kind, and feeling and acting kindly. Such a man is rare and precious, were he as stupid as the Welsh giant in "Jack the Giant-Killer." I could never see Mr. Boulderstone a mile off, but my heart felt the warmer for the sight. Even in his great pain he seemed to forget himself as he received me, and to gain comfort from my mere presence. I could not help regarding him as a child of heaven, to be treated with the more reverence that he had the less aid to his goodness from his slow understanding. It seemed to me that the angels might gather with reverence around such a man, to watch the gradual and tardy awakening of the intellect in one in whom the heart and the conscience had been awake from the first. The latter safe, they at least would see well that there was no fear for the former. Intelligence is a consequence of love; nor is there any true intelligence without it.

But I could not help feeling keenly the contrast when I went from his warm, comfortable, well-defended chamber, in which every appliance that could alleviate suffering or aid recovery was at hand, like a castle well appointed with arms and engines against the inroads of winter and his yet colder ally Death,—when, I say, I went from his chamber to the cottage of the Tomkinses, and found it, as it were, lying open and bare to the enemy. What holes and cracks there were about the door, through which the fierce wind rushed at once into the room to attack the aged feet and hands and throats! There were no defences of three-fold draperies, and no soft carpet on the brick floor,—only a small rug which my sister had carried them laid down before a weak-eyed little fire, that seemed to despair of making anything of it against the huge cold that beleaguered and invaded the place. True, we had had the little cottage patched up. The two Thomas Weirs had been at work upon it for a whole day and a-half in the first of the cold weather this winter; but it was like putting the new cloth on the old garment, for fresh places had broken out, and although Mrs. Tomkins had fought the cold well with what rags she could spare, and an old knife, yet such razor-edged winds are hard to keep out, and here she was now lying in bed, and breathing hard, like the sore-pressed garrison which had retreated to its last defence, the keep of the castle. Poor old Tomkins sat shivering over the little fire.

"Come, come, Tomkins! this won't do," I said, as I caught up a broken shovel that would have let a lump as big as one's fist through a hole in the middle of it. "Why don't you burn your coals in weather like this? Where do you keep them?

It made my heart ache to see the little heap in a box hardly bigger than the chest of tea my sister brought from London with her. I threw half of it on the fire at once.

"Deary me, Mr. Walton! you are wasteful, sir. The Lord never sent his good coals to be used that way."

"He did though, Tomkins," I answered. "And He'll send you a little more this evening, after I get home. Keep yourself warm, man. This world's cold in winter, you know."

"Indeed, sir, I know that. And I'm like to know it better afore long. She's going," he said, pointing over his shoulder with his thumb towards the bed where his wife lay.

I went to her. I had seen her several times within the last few weeks, but had observed nothing to make me consider her seriously ill. I now saw at a glance that Tomkins was right. She had not long to live.

"I am sorry to see you suffering so much, Mrs. Tomkins," I said.

"I don't suffer so wery much, sir; though to be sure, it be hard to get the breath into my body, sir. And I do feel cold-like, sir."

"I'm going home directly, and I'll send you down another blanket. It's much colder to-day than it was yesterday."

"It's not weather-cold, sir, wi' me. It's grave-cold, sir. Blankets won't do me no good, sir. I can't get it out of my head how perishing cold I shall be when I'm under the mould, sir; though I oughtn't to mind it when it's the will o' God—till the resurrection, sir."

"But it's not the will of God, Mrs. Tomkins."

"Ain't it, sir? Sure I thought it was."

"You believe in Jesus Christ, don't you, Mrs. Tomkins?"

"That I do, sir, with all my heart."

"Well, He says that whosoever liveth and believeth in Him shall never die."

"But, you know, sir, everybody dies. I must die, and be laid in the churchyard, sir. And that's what I don't like."

"But I say that is all a mistake. You won't die. Your body will die, and be laid away out of sight; but you will be awake, alive, more alive than you are now, a great deal."

And here let me interrupt the conversation to remark upon the great mistake of teaching children that they have souls. The consequence is, that they think of their souls as of something which is not themselves. For what a man has cannot be himself. Hence, when they are told that their souls go to heaven, they think of their selves as lying in the grave. They ought to be taught that they have bodies; and that their bodies die; while they themselves live on. Then they will not think, as old Mrs. Tomkins did, that they will be laid in the grave. It is making altogether too much of the body, and is indicative of an evil tendency to materialism, that we talk as if we possessed souls, instead of being souls. We should teach our children to think no more of their bodies when dead than they do of their hair when it is cut off, or of their old clothes when they have done with them.

"Do you really think so, sir?" said the old woman.

"Indeed I do. I don't know anything about where you will be. But you will be with God—in your Father's house, you know. And that is enough, is it not?"

"Yes, surely, sir. But I wish you was to be there by the bedside of me when I was a-dyin'. I can't help bein' summat skeered at it. It don't come nat'ral to me, like. I ha' got used to this old bed here, cold as it has been—many's the night—wi' my good man there by the side of me."

"Send for me, Mrs. Tomkins, any moment, day or night, and I'll be with you directly."

"I think, sir, if I had a hold ov you i' the one hand, and my man, there, the Lord bless him, in the other, I could go comfortable."

"I'll come the minute you send for me—just to keep you in mind that a better friend than I am is holding you all the time, though you mayn't feel His hands. If it is some comfort to have hold of a human friend, think that a friend who is more than man, a divine friend, has a hold of you, who knows all your fears and pains, and sees how natural they are, and can just with a word, or a touch, or a look into your soul, keep them from going one hair's-breadth too far. He loves us up to all our need, just because we need it, and He is all love to give."

"But I can't help thinking, sir, that I wouldn't be troublesome. He has such a deal to look after! And I don't see how He can think of everybody, at every minute, like. I don't mean that He will let anything go wrong. But He might forget an old body like me for a minute, like."

"You would need to be as wise as He is before you could see how He does it. But you must believe more than you can understand. It is only common sense to do so. Think how nonsensical it would be to suppose that one who could make everything, and keep the whole going as He does, shouldn't be able to help forgetting. It would be unreasonable to think that He must forget because you couldn't understand how He could remember. I think it is as hard for Him to forget anything as it is for us to remember everything; for forgetting comes of weakness, and from our not being finished yet, and He is all strength and all perfection."

"Then you think, sir, He never forgets anything?"

I knew by the trouble that gathered on the old woman's brow what kind of thought was passing through her mind. But I let her go on, thinking so to help her the better. She paused for one moment only, and then resumed—much interrupted by the shortness of her breathing.

"When I was brought to bed first," she said, "it was o' twins, sir. And, oh! sir, it was very hard. As I said to my man after I got my head up a bit, 'Tomkins,' says I, 'you don't know what it is to have two on 'em cryin' and cryin', and you next to nothin' to give 'em; till their cryin' sticks to your brain, and ye hear 'em when they're fast asleep, one on each side o' you.' Well, sir, I'm ashamed to confess it even to you; and what the Lord can think of me, I don't know."

"I would rather confess to Him than to the best friend I ever had," I said; "I am so sure that He will make every excuse for me that ought to be made. And a friend can't always do that. He can't know all about it. And you can't tell him all, because you don't know all yourself. He does."

"But I would like to tell you, sir. Would you believe it, sir, I wished 'em dead? Just to get the wailin' of them out o' my head, I wished 'em dead. In the court-yard o' the squire's house, where my Tomkins worked on the home-farm, there was an old draw-well. It wasn't used, and there was a lid to it, with a hole in it, through which you could put a good big stone. And Tomkins once took me to it, and, without tellin' me what it was, he put a stone in, and told me to hearken. And I hearkened, but I heard nothing, as I told him so. 'But,' says he, 'hearken, lass.' And in a little while there came a blast of noise like from somewheres. 'What's that, Tomkins?' I said. 'That's the ston',' says he, 'a strikin' on the water down that there well.' And I turned sick at the thought of it. And it's down there that I wished the darlins that God had sent me; for there they'd be quiet."

"Mothers are often a little out of their minds at such times, Mrs. Tomkins. And so were you."

"I don't know, sir. But I must tell you another thing. The Sunday afore that, the parson had been preachin' about 'Suffer little children,' you know, sir, 'to come unto me.' I suppose that was what put it in my head; but I fell asleep wi' nothin' else in my head but the cries o' the infants and the sound o' the ston' in the draw-well. And I dreamed that I had one o' them under each arm, cryin' dreadful, and was walkin' across the court the way to the draw-well; when all at once a man come up to me and held out his two hands, and said, 'Gie me my children.' And I was in a terrible fear. And I gave him first one and then the other, and he took them, and one laid its head on one shoulder of him, and t'other upon t'other, and they stopped their cryin', and fell fast asleep; and away he walked wi' them into the dark, and I saw him no more. And then I woke cryin', I didn't know why. And I took my twins to me, and my breasts was full, if ye'll excuse me, sir. And my heart was as full o' love to them. And they hardly cried worth mentioning again. But afore they was two year old, they both died o' the brown chytis, sir. And I think that He took them."

"He did take them, Mrs. Tomkins; and you'll see them again soon."

"But, if He never forgets anything——"

"I didn't say that. I think He can do what He pleases. And if He pleases to forget anything, then He can forget it. And I think that is what He does with our sins—that is, after He has got them away from us, once we are clean from them altogether. It would be a dreadful thing if He forgot them before that, and left them sticking fast to us and defiling us. How then should we ever be made clean?—What else does the prophet Isaiah mean when he says, 'Thou hast cast my sins behind thy back'?

Is not that, where He does not choose to see them any more? They are not pleasant to Him to think of any more than to us. It is as if He said—'I will not think of that any more, for my sister will never do it again,' and so He throws it behind his back."

"They are good words, sir. I could not bear Him to think of me and my sins both at once."

I could not help thinking of the words of Macbeth, "To know my deed, 'twere best not know myself."

The old woman lay quiet after this, relieved in mind, though not in body, by the communication she had made with much difficulty, and I hastened home to send some coals and other things, and then call upon Dr. Duncan, lest he should not know that his patient was so much worse as I had found her.

From Dr. Duncan's I went to see old Samuel Weir, who likewise was ailing. The bitter weather was telling chiefly upon the aged. I found him in bed, under the old embroidery. No one was in the room with him. He greeted me with a withered smile, sweet and true, although no flash of white teeth broke forth to light up the welcome of the aged head.

"Are you not lonely, Mr. Weir?" I asked.

"No, sir. I don't know as ever I was less lonely. I've got my stick, you see, sir," he said, pointing to a thorn stick which lay beside him.

"I do not quite understand you," I returned, knowing that the old man's gently humourous sayings always meant something.

"You see, sir, when I want anything, I've only got to knock on the floor, and up comes my son out of the shop. And then again, when I knock at the door of the house up there, my father opens it and looks out. So I have both my son on earth and my father in heaven, and what can an old man want more?"

"What, indeed, could any one want more?"

"It's very strange," the old man resumed after a pause, "but as I lie here, after I've had my tea, and it is almost dark, I begin to feel as if I was a child again. They say old age is a second childhood; but before I grew so old, I used to think that meant only that a man was helpless and silly again, as he used to be when he was a child: I never thought it meant that a man felt like a child again, as light-hearted and untroubled as I do now."

"Well, I suspect that is not what people do mean when they say so. But I am very glad—you don't know how pleased it makes me, to hear that you feel so. I will hope to fare in the same way when my time comes."

"Indeed, I hope you will, sir; for I am main happy. Just before you came in now, I had really forgotten that I was a toothless old man, and thought I was lying here waiting for my mother to come in and say good-night to me before I went to sleep. Wasn't that curious, when I never saw my mother, as I told you before, sir?"

"It was very curious."

"But I have no end of fancies. Only when I begin to think about it, I can always tell when they are fancies, and they never put me out. There's one I see often—a man down on his knees at that cupboard nigh the floor there, searching and searching for somewhat. And I wish he would just turn round his face once for a moment that I might see him. I have a notion always it's my own father."

"How do you account for that fancy, now, Mr. Weir?"

"I've often thought about it, sir, but I never could account for it. I'm none willing to think it's a ghost; for what's the good of it? I've turned out that cupboard over and over, and there's nothing there I don't know."

"You're not afraid of it, are you?"

"No, sir. Why should I be? I never did it no harm. And God can surely take care of me from all sorts."

My readers must not think anything is going to come out of this strange illusion of the old man's brain. I questioned him a little more about it, and came simply to the conclusion, that when he was a child, he had found the door open and had wandered into the house, at the time uninhabited, had peeped in at the door of the same room where he now lay, and had actually seen a man in the position he described, half in the cupboard, searching for something. His mind had kept the impression after the conscious memory had lost its hold of the circumstance, and now revived it under certain physical conditions. It was a glimpse out of one of the many stories which haunted the old mansion. But there he lay like a child, as he said, fearless even of such usurpations upon his senses.

I think instances of quiet un*self*conscious faith are more common than is generally supposed. Few have along with it the genial communicative impulse of old Samuel Weir, which gives the opportunity of seeing into their hidden world. He seemed to have been, and to have remained, a child, in the best sense of the word. He had never had much trouble with himself, for he was of a kindly, gentle, trusting nature; and his will had never been called upon to exercise any strong effort to enable him to walk in the straight path. Nor had his intellect, on the other hand, while capable enough, ever been so active as to suggest difficulties to his faith, leaving him, even theoretically, far nearer the truth than those who start objections for their own sakes, liking to feel themselves in a position of supposed antagonism to the generally acknowledged sources of illumination. For faith is in itself a light that lightens even the intellect; and hence the shield of the complete soldier of God, the shield of faith, is represented by Spenser as "framed all of diamond, perfect, pure, and clean," (the power of the diamond to absorb and again radiate light being no poetic fiction, but a well-known scientific fact), whose light falling upon any enchantment or false appearance, destroys it utterly: for > "all that was not such as seemed in sight,

> Before that shield did fade, and suddaine fall."

Old Rogers had passed through a very much larger experience. Many more difficulties had come to him, and he had met them in his own fashion and overcome them. For while there is such a thing as truth, the mind that can honestly beget a difficulty must at the same time be capable of receiving that light of the truth which annihilates the difficulty, or at least of receiving enough to enable it to foresee vaguely some solution, for a full perception of which the intellect may not be as yet competent. By every such victory Old Rogers had enlarged his being, ever becoming more child-like and faithful; so that, while the child-likeness of Weir was the childlikeness of a child, that of Old Rogers was the childlikeness of a man, in which submission to God is not only a gladness, but a conscious will and choice. But as the safety of neither depended on his own feelings, but on the love of God who was working in him, we may well leave all such differences of nature and education to the care of him who first made the men different, and then brought different conditions out of them. The one thing is whether we are letting God have his own way with us, following where he leads, learning the lessons he gives us.

I wished that Mr. Stoddart had been with me during these two visits. Perhaps he might have seen that the education of life was a marvellous thing, and, even in the poorest intellectual results, far more full of poetry and wonder than the outcome of that constant watering with the watering-pot of self-education which, dissociated from the duties of life and the influences of his fellows, had made of him what he was. But I doubt if he would have seen it.

A week had elapsed from the night I had sat up with Gerard Weir, and his mother had not risen from her bed, nor did it seem likely she would ever rise again. On a Friday I went to see her, just as the darkness was beginning to gather. The fire of life was burning itself out fast. It glowed on her cheeks, it burned in her hands, it blazed in her eyes. But the fever had left her mind. That was cool, oh, so cool, now! Those fierce tropical storms of passion had passed away, and nothing of life was lost. Revenge had passed away, but revenge is of death, and deadly. Forgiveness had taken its place, and forgiveness is the giving, and so the receiving of life. Gerard, his dear little head starred with sticking-plaster, sat on her bed, looking as quietly happy as child could look, over a wooden horse with cylindrical body and jointless legs, covered with an eruption of red and black spots.—Is it the ignorance or the imagination of children that makes them so easily pleased with the merest hint at representation? I suspect the one helps the other towards that most desirable result, satisfaction.—But he dropped it when he saw me, in a way so abandoning that—comparing small things with great—it called to my mind those lines of Milton:—

> "From his slack hand the garland wreathed for Eve, > Down dropt, and all the faded roses shed."

The quiet child flung himself upon my neck, and the mother's face gleamed with pleasure.

"Dear boy!" I said, "I am very glad to see you so much better."

For this was the first time he had shown such a revival of energy. He had been quite sweet when he saw me, but until this evening, listless.

"Yes," he said, "I am quite well now." And he put his hand up to his head.

"Does it ache?"

"Not much now. The doctor says I had a bad fall."

"So you had, my child. But you will soon be well again."

The mother's face was turned aside, yet I could see one tear forcing its way from under her closed eyelid.

"Oh I don't mind it," he answered. "Mammy is so kind to me! She lets me sit on her bed as long as I like."

"That is nice. But just run to Auntie in the next room. I think your mammy would like to talk to me for a little while."

The child hurried off the bed, and ran with overflowing obedience.

"I can even think of him now," said the mother, "without going into a passion. I hope God will forgive him. I do. I think He will forgive me."

"Did you ever hear," I asked, "of Jesus refusing anybody that wanted kindness from Him? He wouldn't always do exactly what they asked Him, because that would sometimes be of no use, and sometimes would even be wrong; but He never pushed them away from Him, never repulsed their approach to Him. For the sake of his disciples, He made the Syrophenician woman suffer a little while, but only to give her such praise afterwards and such a granting of her prayer as is just wonderful."

She said nothing for a little while; then murmured.

"Shall I have to be ashamed to all eternity? I do not want not to be ashamed; but shall I never be able to be like other people—in heaven I mean?"

"If He is satisfied with you, you need not think anything more about yourself. If He lets you once kiss his feet, you won't care to think about other people's opinion of you even in heaven. But things will go very differently there from here. For everybody there will be more or less ashamed of himself, and will think worse of himself than he does of anyone else. If trouble about your past life were to show itself on your face there, they would all run to comfort you, trying to make the best of it, and telling you that you must think about yourself as He thinks about you; for what He thinks is the rule, because it is the infallible right way. But perhaps rather, they would tell you to leave that to Him who has taken away our sins, and not trouble yourself any more about it. But to tell the truth, I don't think such thoughts will come to you at all when once you have seen the face of Jesus Christ. You will be so filled with his glory and goodness and grace, that you will just live in Him and not in yourself at all."

"Will He let us tell Him anything we please?"

"He lets you do that now: surely He will not be less our God, our friend there."

"Oh, I don't mind how soon He takes me now! Only there's that poor child that I've behaved so badly to! I wish I could take him with me. I have no time to make it up to him here."

"You must wait till he comes. He won't think hardly of you. There's no fear of that."

"What will become of him, though? I can't bear the idea of burdening my father with him."

"Your father will be glad to have him, I know. He will feel it a privilege to do something for your sake. But the boy will do him good. If he does not want him, I will take him myself."

"Oh! thank you, thank you, sir."

A burst of tears followed.

"He has often done me good," I said.

"Who, sir? My father?"

"No. Your son."

"I don't quite understand what you mean, sir."

"I mean just what I say. The words and behaviour of your lovely boy have both roused and comforted my heart again and again."

She burst again into tears.

"That is good to hear. To think of your saying that! The poor little innocent? Then it isn't all punishment?"

"If it were all punishment, we should perish utterly. He is your punishment; but look in what a lovely, loving form your punishment has come, and say whether God has been good to you or not."

"If I had only received my punishment humbly, things would have been very different now. But I do take it—at least I want to take it—just as He would have me take it. I will bear anything He likes. I suppose I must die?"

"I think He means you to die, now. You are ready for it now, I think. You have wanted to die for a long time; but you were not ready for it before."

"And now I want to live for my boy. But His will be done."

"Amen. There is no such prayer in the universe as that. It means everything best and most beautiful. Thy will, O God, evermore be done."

She lay silent. A tap came to the chamber-door. It was Mary, who nursed her sister and attended to the shop.

"If you please, sir, here's a little girl come to say that Mrs. Tomkins is dying, and wants to see you."

"Then I must say good-night to you, Catherine. I will see you to-morrow morning. Think about old Mrs. Tomkins; she's a good old soul; and when you find your heart drawn to her in the trouble of death, then lift it up to God for her, that He will please to comfort and support her, and make her happier than health—stronger than strength, taking off the old worn garment of her body, and putting upon her the garment of salvation, which will be a grand new body, like that the Saviour had when He rose again."

"I will try. I will think about her."

For I thought this would be a help to prepare her for her own death. In thinking lovingly about others, we think healthily about ourselves. And the things she thought of for the comfort of Mrs. Tomkins, would return to comfort herself in the prospect of her own end, when perhaps she might not be able to think them out for herself.

ESHCOL.

"And they came unto the brook [Heb. nachal] of Eshcol, and cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes; and they bare it between two upon a staff."—Numbers xiii. 23.

I.

Where, in the purling streamlet's track, had sprung
Life and lush greenery from the sultry ground,
A goodly vine-branch, with rare cluster hung,
Two way-worn wanderers found.

From the sweet-smiling valley where it grew,
The vine-branch on a staff they 'tween them bare,— Earnest of that good land to all who through
The dreary desert fare.

Who walk'd before, scarce saw, with straining eye,
Its shadow flit upon the barren waste:
Who walk'd behind, gazed on it ever-nigh,
And could its dainties taste.

But both must toil 'neath many a burning sun,
And chide the changeless seasons of the wild;
And many a fight must each see lost and won,
And live but in his child:

Yea, pass away must many a weary year,
Ere they possess that land of corn and wine,
Ere they who wander in the desert drear
Sit under their own vine.

No more by hunger, nor by thirst distrest,
Then shall they drink of that life-giving rill,
Dwell safely in the land, and be at rest,
And take and eat their fill.

II.

Christ is this goodly vine-branch: patriarch gray
Long through the world's drear desert wander'd sad,
Bearing the heat and burden of the day,—
Then found Him, and was glad.

As—after parch'd waste found in valley fair,
That hath its verdure from some purling stream—
Shows goodly vine-branch hung with cluster rare,
Such Christ in patriarch's dream.

Christ is this goodly vine-branch: they of old
Saw fitfully a shadow of his face;
The Branch himself, rare-fruited, we behold,
And taste, and know his grace.

Yet we but know in part: much toil, much woe,
Must us unto the Land of Promise bring;
We must encounter many a ghostly foe,
And Death's relentless sting:

Yea, time shall be no more, earth pass away,
Ere we the Vine in all his beauty see,
Ere we, who through the world's drear desert stray,
Sit under our own Tree.

Hunger and thirst for righteousness shall we
Not then: for Christ shall give us of his store
To drink,—yea, Life's pure stream itself; and He Shall feed us evermore.

WORDS TO THE WEARY.

"To the weary!" Many a one listens at the word. To many a one it is like a personal salutation; the next thing to naming the name. No one, perhaps, would take in a single letter with only the superscription of our article upon it, as though it were intended for himself. But when the address is general, when it is made to a large constituency, each one of the multitude thus described and addressed is almost as ready to listen to the communication as though it had been sent to him under his own name. Hardly any experience is more common among men than that of weariness. The causes of it are very manifold; and the degrees of it range from utter exhaustion, bordering on blank despair, up to its slightest forms and appearances, when it seems no more than a passing shadow. But, whatever be its causes, and whatever its degree, weariness is a state which, more than most other states, inclines a man to listen—not indeed to the strife of tongues and the shock of conflict, and all the hot surgings and wild stir of life, which are heard by a weary man with pleasure only when they come in softened murmurs as from distance, but—eagerly to any words spoken expressly and fitly to himself. A weary man is, in some respects, a much better hearer than a working-man. Strength is bold; weariness is tender. Strength uses the arm, the foot, the tongue, the brain; weariness is all ear and heart. She sits by life's way-side, with feeble pulse and lack-lustre eye, heedless apparently of all that may come and go, of all that may rise or fall in the world about her; but let any one speak tenderly to her, and although there will in the nature of the case be no passionate and pronounced indications of her interest, she will listen, as the long-parched earth may be supposed to listen to the patter of the falling rain. She will open the exhausted fountains of being and "receive," which is only less "blessed" than "to give."

God in his word speaks often to the weary. "At sundry times and in divers manners." This, simply as a general consideration, and apart from the particular messages delivered, should bring some consolation and nourishment to those who are thus addressed. Surely it is a reviving thing to know that this extreme condition of our human experience, this condition of disadvantage, inability, prostration, is tenderly recognised and fully provided for. He who never wearies, whose light is never lost in shadow, whose emotion is in unsubsiding fulness, whose existence is everlasting strength, looks to the weary among men, pities them, makes gracious provision for their strengthening. The knowledge of this ought to be comfort and strength to weak and weary spirits. There may be failure in the administration of the provided help. Even those among us who are appointed to give the consolation, lacking wisdom, or lacking tenderness, may fail to give it in particular instances, in any sensible or helpful measure. But it is provided, and He who means it to be given will find some way to accomplish his purpose. The great "river" of his love flows into innumerable "streams," which not only "make glad the city of God," but which find their way to the "desert" places far and near, making "the wilderness" of weary lonely spirits "like Eden, and their desert like the garden of the Lord." The very thought of this is reviving—the thought of what lies behind all our human endeavours to express and communicate. These endeavours may fail in part or entirely, and yet—

> "The barren wilderness shall smile,
> With sudden green and herbage crown'd,
> And streams shall murmur all around."

But let us at least try to direct some of these streams towards those who are athirst; or, what will be in result the same, let us try to guide the faltering steps of those who need to drink of them to the channels where they flow.

I.

To "him that is weary" by the overtoil of life, we have some "words in season" to speak. Of course we are not alluding simply to bodily fatigue, and that sympathetic gentle exhaustion of the spirit, which are the natural results of a certain measure of activity. No word of comfort is needed for a state like that. For such a condition of mind and body ample compensation is given in the rest which the evening brings. It is wholesome, it is almost delightful to be moderately weary with honest labour of any kind when we can sink back into untroubled rest. It is the overtoil that brings the distressing weariness. And there is so much of that now-a-days! All kinds of industries and enterprises are pushed on, as far as may be, by all kinds of activities and devices. Human strength, of muscle, brain, and will, is calculated and used much as the power of a steam-engine is tested and applied. More than that. For a steam-engine cannot be pushed beyond its power. Not one atom or pulsation of force can be got out of it that is not fairly in it. You cannot deal unfairly by it. You cannot draw out of the ultimate fountains of force in nature. They are kept in such entire secrecy, and so closely under the hand of the Almighty, that no man can avail himself of them, or, indeed, even approach them. It is otherwise with the human being. The force here is not merely mechanical; it is vital. It is not merely statical or dynamical pressure; it is life. It is life under the control of will which is free. Here the fountains are open to the man. He can draw too much out of them; he does many a time. The life that would run on to three-score years and ten, and even beyond, in some freshness, is spent and gone at fifty. Under the pressure of modern necessities men do draw from the organic springs during one day more than ought to be taken out for the day. To use a homely image, they sink the bucket deep down into the well of life, and draw it fast up, brimming; then sink it down again, and yet again, until the well is dry. Or—to use another familiar figure—they draw out of the account current in the bank of their strength, day by day, more than nature puts into it. They touch the deposit account, the far-down strength that should never be touched until the dying days; and then of course they are "weary," very weary.

You will allow that one right word to some who are in this case, one seasonable word to these weary, is a word of frank and strong remonstrance. You should not do this. You should not, willingly, extend and enlarge your affairs so much as to necessitate this excessive draft on normal organic strength. You plead the example of others; the necessity of the case; the needs of the children; the uncertainties of the future. I plead the law of God; the higher necessities; the best examples; the eternal certainties. I point you to the fact that you are over-drawing your account, and hastening a crisis. You are sinking the bucket too deeply into the well of your own life. You are shortening your days, and overclouding them with mist and rain. You are bringing on a weariness for which you never can have so much consolation as you would have if it came on you lawfully. Yes—"Let a man strive lawfully," and then—let him fear no results which can come, to others or to himself. There is a perfect Providence. There is an everlasting Love. All things work together for good to loving and obedient souls.

But one is quite aware that in many cases it is hard to say where, exactly, the line is, beyond which a man ought not to go. One man is more capable naturally than another, and claims therefore a wider sphere. One man is in better health than another, and does not need to circumscribe the natural limits of activity. One man works in a better atmosphere than another, and amid happier social conditions. One man has a business which is greatly easier of transaction than that of another; and so, amid these diversities and complications, it comes to pass, that many are weary, without, wittingly, having gone beyond what duty demands; and many by a kind of necessity, out of which no way presents itself which duty would clearly sanction. Naturally, they would feel that hard measure was being meted to them, if, on the day of rest, when looking, among other things, at "words to the weary," we should meet them only with the sharp message that they have been breaking the laws of God. But no. We have a word in season to those who are thus unwillingly overtaken in the fault of the age, to those who are weary by the overtoil from which, to them, there seems to be no escape. Work you must: then think how divine is work. Nothing is more divine than work, except love. "God is love." God is known by work. "My Father worketh hitherto." He is working still, in every place, through every moment, in every visible thing—in the greening of the leaf, in the yellowing of the corn, in the kindling of the stars: in rolling rivers, in fluctuating seas, in breathing winds—in all the life that lives, in all the death that dies, God is working.

Work is as proper to a human life as to the Divine. In "the image of God" possessed by the human being the activities have due place, and to a perfect development, doing is as necessary as knowing and loving. See how soon the new-created man is working! We behold him rising into life under the hand and quickening breath of God, and then—does he stand on sunny heights in all the radiance of perfection, a spectacle to angels, a picture to his successors among men? Does he recline on flowery banks, or sit, in meditative mood, in bowers of ease, gazing on the majestic hills which stand about the cradle of the human race, soothed by the birds, the wandering breeze, the rippling stream? "And the Lord God took the man and put him into the garden of Eden, to dress it and to keep it." At once he is appointed to work. The perfect life is not "still life." It has the glow of labour in it, and is exercised with the "light burden" of a sinless care. For remember, this was before the fall. Labour—of head, and heart, and hand—is holy, is divine. People sometimes speak of it as if it were the curse (which, indeed, in part it may be, when it is turned to ill account, or when it is hard, excessive, or unrequited), as if the direst earthly punishment God had in reserve for the erring man was this—"Go work in my vineyard." No mistake could be greater. The curse fell on the ground for man's sake, but never on the labour which tills it. That is the vanquisher of the curse. By that, blessed and sanctified, the curse shall be vanquished in the end, and Eden then will be, not in any one place, or here and there, but all the world over. A man working, therefore, working hard, in lawful work, putting forth his nature into a strenuous activity, and, in consequence, touched at times with a sad weariness, may, for his encouragement and cheer, think, and think truly, "I am like God in this. If I stir up the strength that is in me, if I work wisely and well, as wisely and as well as I know how, then I am in my little human measure like the ever-working God. In this respect, if I will, I may be partaker of the divine nature, and escape the corruption that is in the world through idleness. I am not like God in my weariness, for He fainteth not, and is never weary, but I am like Him in my work; and it makes my weariness less to think that in these daily toils, rude and exhausting as they sometimes are, I yet have such a glorious fellowship."

Think, too, how this overtoil, which you cannot resist or control, tends, in some ways, to enhance the consolations and blessings of the gospel. It imparts the peculiar zest of contrast to all the mild, quiet, refreshing things of grace. It impairs perhaps the penetrative power, and may lessen therefore the amount of intellectual religious attainment. An overwrought man is not so likely to enrich himself in the treasures of pure thought. But then, on the other hand, his weariness, unless it be excessive, will be likely to add eagerness and quickness to the receptive faculties. It may seem a play upon the words, but we mean it as a literal and simple truth, that no receiver is so thankful and humble as "an exhausted receiver." As the dry ground drinks the rain—the parched plants stretching out their leafy hands for it, the flowers holding up their cups to catch it as it falls; as the over-heated room pulls in the vital air at every crevice, and at the open window in a stream—so the overwearied spirit drinks in some of the consolatory gifts of the gospel, with peculiar avidity and relish. Because work has been hard, rest is more restful. Because the week has been busy, the Sabbath stillness is more calm. Because other days have heat and stir and darkness in them, you are able to apostrophize your Sabbath and say, "O day, most calm, most bright!" Many a promise finds you out in your weak and worn times, which you would not see, or seeing, fail to appreciate in times of full capacity and sufficiency. "Out of weakness" you "are made strong." Lapsing sometimes into the helplessness of the little child, you enter into a very Kingdom of Heaven.

Think, too, how all this earthly labour, when well-wrought, is instrumentally preparing, refining, sweetening the heavenly rest. It may seem almost idle to make comparison between the entrance of one sinful man and that of another into heaven,—the rest will be so welcome to all, the joy so great to each. But surely, in so far as heaven is rest after labour, it must be more delightful, at least for a season, and that probably not a brief one, to those who enter it from life-long toil and strife, than it can be to those who had, in their own allotment on the earth, become accustomed to some beginning of its tranquillities. "They rest from their labours, and their works do follow them," as it were increasing and deepening the rest. Fancy the arrival at the gate of the celestial city, at the same moment, of two spirits just released from earth and sin. One is a veteran from long and hard service, seamed and scarred in many a conflict, weary with many a long journey, to whom even death has been struggle and "sacrifice." The other is a gentle spirit who has dwelt much in calmness, had but little conflict, lived in the beauty of a lowly love, and who has just now awoke out of the sweet "sleep" of death, and is waiting at the gate to enter into the everlasting peace. Each enters without challenge; each is welcome home. But tell me not that the emotion of the one can be like that of the other. Ah, how delicious the "green pastures" to the feet that have trodden so many rough ways! How soothing "the still waters" to one who has had so many tossings amid the storms! Is it possible that gentle Isaac, from his flocks and fields and eventide meditations, should enter "the city of habitation," and sink into the depths of its overcoming and abiding peace with that sense of unutterable satisfaction which is given to stormy Paul, who comes up from Titanic wrestlings, from "journeyings," "prisons," "seas," and "deaths?" Be not weary, then, in the making of your own heaven; for indeed you are making it, instrumentally, if only you are working aright. All earthly work is hallowed, and touched to finest issues in the heavenly world, if only the principle of it be right. To speak with plain applications,—you, skilled and cunning worker, you are shaping your destiny in the articles you construct. You, clerk and ready writer, you are securing heaven in the figures of your calculation. You, busy trader, are buying it in what you buy, if you buy fairly, and confirming the purchase by what you sell, if you sell fairly. You, far-looking merchantman, seeking goodly pearls until often you are weary in the search, and sometimes cannot but sigh, "What a vanity it is!" whatever you may miss or find in your more immediate objects, whatever may come of the nearer earthly ventures, so you do all in love, and by divine law, you gain certainly at length a pearl of greater price than any to be found here. You, mother and mistress of the house, worn down each day, sometimes almost to literal fainting, with children, servants, visitors, cares, see you not what path you are treading? It is toilsome, secluded, and has no glory to the common sight, but it is taking you up step by step to fields of heavenly rest. You, servant, doing your duty well, perhaps amid many difficulties—the harsh words of an unreasonable mistress assailing you every day, the hasty temper of a fellow-servant trying yours, the lack of a tender sympathy in any fellow-creature who is near filling your heart sometimes with "the drought of summer,"—think whose "servant" you are; from whose lips, in a while, you expect to hear, "Well done! Be ruler now." And so of all others who are true. Hard work, when wrought in faith, has the grand function of preparing the worker for the fuller enjoyment of the heavenly rest.

II.

To him that is weary, not so much by the hardness and excess of the labour of life, as by its commonness and comparative meanness, there is surely a word in season. There are undoubtedly many who are affected far more by what we call "the drudgery of life" than by the positive severity of its tasks. It is not that they have not strength enough to do all that is to be done, but it is that what they do seems so little worth doing. They have strength and to spare; strength which frets in the leash of circumstances, which goes off sometimes in murmurings and moanings, and which is apt even to darken into disdain of those ignoble conditions by which they feel so fettered and hindered as to their best development. For in proportion as they can think highly of their own nature, they are compelled to think unfavourably of their circumstances and their tasks. It seems strange to them that a divinely-gifted creature, carrying the light of immortality in his breast, and a mirror that reflects the image of God, and a heart that holds his love, and thoughts that keep company with his thoughts, should be set to such mean employment, and kept at it so long—figuring through endless calculations, talking superficial talk—of the weather, of the markets, of the news, of the quality of some piece of manufactured goods; asking the same questions, saying the same things, smiling the same smile, a great many times each day; trudging through the same streets, meeting the same people,—in short, going the same "trivial round" of life from day to day, with the same small, inappreciable results! O, it is wearisome! And in those moments when the soul is touched with ambition, or moved by any of its great instinctive desires, the scene darkens almost into a prison, and the man in his own esteem is the poor prisoner pacing the dull weary rounds! It is wearisome, too, in scenes and walks of life still more private—in homes. How many must there be in this great forest of houses called "city"—how many, too, in villages and country places, to whom daily life is a daily burden, not because of the greatness, but because of the littleness and obscurity of their duties, because they have so little on which they can write the great name of Duty clearly? It seems all drudgery, triviality, nothing.

What is the word in season here? Surely in part it is this—that life is noble and not common. We cannot indeed controvert the outer facts. They are what they seem. Many things in the lives of Christian people are little in themselves—they could not well be less. But they lose their littleness when they are associated with the higher things in which true Christian life consists, and especially with that right internal motive which consecrates all. If I am faithfully serving Christ, does it really so much matter whether my hand holds a sceptre, a pen, or a spade?—whether I touch thousands every day, or only shillings and pence?—whether I meet many people, or only few?—whether my house is large or small?—whether my name is famous or utterly unknown? It is but "a little while," and the stir and tumult of life, be it in high or low degree, will be over, the drudgery all gone through, the commonness ended in the shining of eternal sublimity. Not where I am, but what I am; and, still more, what I am becoming, is the thing! Not what I do, but how I am doing it! Not high or low in earthly place and estimate, but high or low in purpose, tone, temper! Now, supposing that you are really in the place where God's providence has put you, and that you are really "called" to the duties (or as you say tasks and trivialities) which wait for you every day—then call them not "common." God has "cleansed" them. He has prepared and appointed them for you; and they are at least as good as any other circumstances would be for the accomplishment of life's moral ends.

If anything of nobler outward aspect can be inserted into your life, well. If you can have the seeming commonness associated and relieved with something visibly greater and better—some new task, endeavour, friendship, possibility—well. But if not, we say again, call not that life which God in his infinite wisdom has appointed for you; which by his great redeeming act He has purified; which from the roll of his providence is unfolding itself under his very eye; which is quick with the stirrings of his Spirit; which has the seeds of immortal glory in its bosom: call it not common. It is great, unless you make it little. It is good, unless you make it evil. When God calls his "kings" from earth to heaven, He finds many of them where Elijah found Elisha—at the plough: many where Samuel found David—with the sheep: many where the Saviour found Peter, James, and John—at the nets and the fishing. "The Lord seeth not as man seeth, for man looketh on the outward appearance, but the Lord looketh on the heart."

III.

A word in season now to him that is weary amid the perplexities and difficulties of life. By these, great spirit-weariness often comes—by the multitudinous character of life—by the multiplicity of things—by the varieties of them. By their crossings and intercrossings. By the sudden changes that come, so altering circumstances that duty cannot remain the same. Life, with those who are much in society, is not simple. It is very complex. Civilisation, so far, seems to involve and necessitate complexity; but how to get through? How to consider each claim, that is a claim, and each person whose claim it is? How to make just, and no more than just, allowance, for peculiarities of disposition, for differences of judgment, and for ever-changing circumstances—how hard it is! And what a weariness it sometimes brings on! Let the scene be no larger than just a family of ordinary size, and with no extraordinary circumstances or troubles in it—you have there the materials of a constant perplexity and of much heart-weariness. Suppose that any member of that family, parent or child, wishes to do his or her duty fathfully and fully by all the rest, will it be quite easy? I do not think we at all know what a trouble we are to each other, at home: what shadows we cast (not designing it) on each other's way: how hard we make to another the path that runs close by our own. Young people, do you know what an anxious care you are, sometimes, to father or mother? How you load them with invisible burdens, and perplex them with difficulties which are none the less because they are not likely to explain or express them to you? Do you know what an anxiety it sometimes is, simply to know, whether to speak or keep silence, whether to give advice or "hold their peace even from good;" whether to act with authority, or wait in patience and prayer? And how, when they are doing all for the best, and have no complaint to make of you, and no heart-sorrow about you, they are yet, against their own will, wearied and worn out, with the ceaseless ministrations of love?

Then, if we go beyond the family, there are "the cares of the world," and all the perplexities of its business, the writing of difficult letters, the making important engagements and promises, the duties consequent on success or failure. There is the watching of the action of others; and, in a word, all the flux and reflux of this ever-moving world. Surely it is not surprising, that, here and there at least, there should be a weary Spirit—one tired of ceaseless bargain-making; one sick almost to disgust with the daily necessity for watching against the guile and the over-reaching of others; one ready to say with Job, "I loathe it, I would not live alway."

The seasonable word—what shall it be? This, at any rate—Seek the Master's feet. Be sure you cast all your care on Him who careth for you. Be sure you take the help He is so near to give. Take each day fresh baptisms of his love; by one quick thought you can bring it around you like the air. The unreserved communication of your difficulties TO HIM will much endear and strengthen the bond of attachment between Him and you, and will also very likely make some crooked things straight and some rough places plain. "Rest in the Lord and wait patiently for Him, and He shall give thee the desires of thine heart." "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths."

IV.

To him that is weary in well-doing there is a word in season. The whole of a good life is well-doing, in a sense, as we have seen. All is religious, and nothing is "common." Yet is there a clear enough distinction between higher and lower in every life. Labours undertaken and pursued exclusively with reference to spiritual ends are the highest of all. In quality, at least, they are superlative. But success does not always seem to attend them in anything like proportion to the time, the thought, the solicitude which are expended. Often there is apparently no success at all. "That which is wanting cannot be numbered." Then "hope deferred maketh the heart sick." The hands hang down, the knees are feeble, the eye is dim, the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint with sowing which is never followed by reaping, and with long waiting which never ends in joy. The word in season is—the old word which has cheered and delivered so many in every age, which has nerved many a sinking arm, stayed many retreating steps, and brightened many a darkening field with the glow of new promise—the clear, bold, freshening word—"In due season ye shall reap if ye faint not." "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him." May God fill every faithful, toilsome heart with the light and power of that undying promise.

V.

To him that is weary with the strife—the great strife of every good man's life, the strife with sin—there is a word in season. Every vital process in this world is subject to pause, blight, hindrance. Buds are nipped with frost. Green leaves are shrivelled with east wind. Young creatures pine and sicken sometimes, and for a while do not grow. The most vital process of any is subject to the same vicissitude. The divine life in the soul grows in conflict, in aspiration, by hope, by endeavour. But every one knows—every one who has had much experience of this life—that there are times of pausing and uncertainty, even of apparent retrogression, when all that is past seems quite in vain, and the imagined progress has brought the soul circling round again, apparently to the very beginning. How discouraging is this! and how wearisome to the spirit!—wearisome to have the two principles still at war, as if the conflict would never end! To have the "evil" still present, while striving to do the "good!" To have old misbelievings come back upon us, old fears revived, old swervings repeated! Does it not sometimes seem as though there were no necessary perseverance of saints, or, at any rate, as if we are not saints persevering? Ah, why are the serene heights, where walk the victors, clad in white, yet so far above us? Why is the progress so uncertain? and when shall the struggle end at last? and where? and how? In victory or in defeat?

The word in season is, PERSEVERE. "Be of good courage, and God shall strengthen your heart; wait, I say, on the Lord." Did you ever hear of a river which runs straight from its source to the sea? There is not such a one in the world. There are some which bend and turn and almost circle round again and again. Yet "all the rivers run into the sea" at length. What tree grows right up to heaven, never bending a branch to the wind, never losing a leaf in frost or gale? The largest, noblest trees are shaken with the greatest number of tempests, exposed to the winters of the greatest number of years. Is there a bird that can soar right upwards to the zenith? Not one. Even the eagle has some sinuosity and curving, however little it may seem, as he goes up the sky. Is there in God's book or in any of men's, recorded life of any good man who grew up without one pause, without any fear or doubt, shadow or weariness? What is his name? Is it Jacob, who said, "All these things are against me?" Is it Moses, who prayed in the deepest despondency, "If not—blot me out of thy book?" Is it David, who so often "cried out of the depths?" Is it Elijah, who asked that he might die in the wilderness? or Jonah, who repeated the prayer? or Peter, who sank in the waves he tried to tread, who wept in the dark night as he thought of the Master he had denied? or even the intrepid Paul, who certainly must have had his mournful and desponding moods (although perhaps only at considerable intervals), else it could hardly be written of him with such emphasis, that on one occasion, the sight of brethren who had come to meet him on the way, made him "thank God and take courage." To be weary in such weariness is to be in good company. Persevere.

VI.

The last word is to those "who labour and are heavy laden," with sin of which they would fain repent, from the guilt and power of which they would fain be delivered; who feel how heavy God's hand is, who see how fiery is his law, whose moisture has become summer drought, who long for rest and cannot find it. And this is the word in season—not our word, nor even an inference of ours from his word; but the very word of God the Saviour,—"Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Doubtless this, in the first instance, is the rest of a free forgiveness, without merit or price of any kind. Yet is it most closely associated with the new law of duty and obedience, "Take my yoke upon you." It has often been observed and said that weary men find relief very pleasantly, not in the entire cessation of work, but in change of occupation. A book is seldom more pleasant than after a long walk. A walk is refreshing after some continuance of mental occupation. The most sublime application of this principle is found when struggling men, weary at last of sin—not merely of its inconveniences and penalties, and through fear of its unknown results, but of its nature and its presence—come to Christ, to the sin-bearing, sin-forgiving, sin-consuming Christ, because He has invited all, and especially them to come; and, lo! He puts his "yoke" upon them, a yoke which they are never to cast off: He weights them with his "burden," which they are to carry for evermore. And this is rest—the rest of eternity—the very rest of God.

Indeed, Christ and his yoke is the greatest and best word we can speak to the weary of every kind, and all the world over. There is not one of any of the classes which have been specified but will find relief from his particular trouble by taking the yoke and bearing the burden. This holy service daily renewed will lessen the severities of overwork, will dignify the commonness of life, will dissolve the coils of perplexity, will disperse the shadows of care, will invigorate as nothing else can do the faltering purpose of obedience, will break the bands and blot out the stains of sin, and will fill all the life with sweetness, and gladness, and strength—for, "His yoke is easy, and his burden is light."

ALEXANDER RALEIGH.

THE ENGLISH HYMNS OF THE ELIZABETHAN ERA.

"A HYMN is a singing angel, and goes walking through the earth, scattering the devils before it. Therefore, he who creates hymns imitates the most excellent and lovely works of our Lord God, who made the angels. These hymns watch our chamber door, they sit upon our pillow, they sing to us when we are awake, and therefore our Master was resolved to sow the minds of his young people with them as our beautiful Italy is sown with the seeds of all coloured flowers." From the Gulf of Genoa to the Adriatic Sea—in the deep valleys among the purple Apennines—in the air-hung villages which gleam among the pine and chestnut trees on the southern slopes of the Alps—and even in queenly Florence, which a few years later sent the bold friar of San Marco to heaven in a chariot of fire, simple Italian ballads containing some of the elementary truths of the Gospel were winning their way among the common people with such rapidity that Antonio Sforza was hardly guilty of a poet's licence of speech when he wrote of them as being as universal as those flower seeds which slept beneath the soil of his own fair land. And his beloved master Savonarola was right and wise when he trusted the truths which make men wise unto salvation to these airy messengers; it was not the first time that God had chosen the weak things of the world to confound the mighty. So, at the close of the fifteenth century, in the chilly solemn hour of mist and darkness which preceded the daybreak, the white wings of these singing angels were glimmering here and there, and in some homes in which sorrow dwelt, and round which death hovered, and in some hearts which were mourning for sin, there was a light, new, unearthly, and, perchance, feeble, yet one destined to shine more and more unto the perfect day.

Thirty years later the German churches were ringing with the hymns of Luther, Eber, and Sachs, and the poetry of the Reformation, wedded to popular music, was sung in every household. By the middle of the sixteenth century the reformed hymnology of Denmark had assumed such a position as to call for a history from the pen of Thomïsson, but still no answering voice from England told that the new doctrines had reached the heart of the people. Yet England had been stirred by an impulse altogether new, and English piety might afford to forget the courtly and inauspicious rise of the Reformation in the days when the blood of the witnesses for Jesus Christ was scarcely dry upon the scaffolds, and the ashes of the piles of Smithfield were hardly given to the winds; yet, of that goodly company which had gone to swell the noble army of martyrs, none were singers. The walls of our English prisons echoed the deep earnest tones of prayer, and voices declaring defiantly for Christ's truth against lying wrong, but no trace remains of such melodies as made the prison of Philippi ring, and startled the soldiers who guarded the dungeons where the followers of Huss suffered for the right. Protestantism rejoiced in the accession of Elizabeth,—the monks were cast out from the cloisters, and the leisure, of which the Latin hymns were the fruit, was no more—in the churches mass was no longer chanted, and the Bible was accessible in the vernacular; but still the "singing angels" were few, and appeared with wings so marvellously and grotesquely clipped, that they could not fly through the land, if indeed it be true, which I much misdoubt, that they were angels at all! The Latin hymns, with their wonderful pathos and beauty, were banished from the churches, and people fell back upon the Psalms of David done into verse by Sternhold and Hopkins, content, though under the clear shining of the Sun of the New Testament, to sing to the Head of the Church only in poetry in which the Name which is above every name is not found.

This age, of which the hymnology is so scant and meagre, was the most brilliant in English literature. Round Spenser, Shakespeare, Bacon, and Raleigh clustered a host of lesser luminaries, any one of whom was worthy to be the sun of a duller era. Imagination, genius, thought, all flooded it with light—the lingering spirit of chivalry gave a singular stateliness to words which breathe the spirit of modern freedom and enlightenment; and thought ranged over every field of fact, creation, and speculation, with a riotous strength never equalled. Of all the forces which combined to produce "The Elizabethan Age," the strongest was that spirit which breathed over England announcing freedom of religious thought. It appears at first sight singular that between the newly revealed spiritual world and the lingering picturesqueness of the middle ages, so few sparks of even tolerable sacred poetry should have been struck out. But the Elizabethan age was not the golden age of Christ's Church in England. The rigid ecclesiastical orthodoxy forced upon the country by the Queen had not a genial influence upon piety. While Catholic dissent was sternly repressed with one hand, the other was equally heavy on all Protestant departures from the stereotyped ecclesiastical polity, and if there was not the violent antagonism between the Old and the New which rent Germany and Scotland at the same period, neither was there that hearty religious abandonment and energy which flourish in the atmosphere of vehement differences. So complete was the external uniformity produced by the repressive influences of the government, that though Puritanism existed, it has not in any shape a place in literary history until the reign of James I.

There was something manifestly unfavourable to hymn-writing in such an atmosphere, and it does not appear that the religion of the day felt any necessity for hymn-singing. There is a stereotyped piety, which even martyr fires cannot warm, and the staid Churchmen of that era to whom religion and a settled government meant one and the same thing, were not the men either to require or patronise unauthorised singing. Whatever be the cause, our forefathers seem to have been quite content with the absence of devotional poetry. The Latin hymns which breathed the strains of a warmer and more devout piety—the exquisite beauties of Bernard of Clugny and his namesake of Morlaix, were banished from the churches, and after Cranmer, who undertook the task of translation and miserably failed, no person seems to have thought it worth while to make them accessible. It was not until 1562 that the version of the Psalms by Sternhold and Hopkins received the permissive authorisation of the Queen, and the popular element was re-introduced into worship. Not a single hymn suitable on the whole for public use has come down to us from this glorious reign, for the obvious reason that unlicensed singing was not permitted, and the devotional poetry for private use is not of a high order. This last conclusion is an unsatisfactory one, if the piety of an age is to be gauged in any measure by its hymnology, and most of all is it so in England, for perhaps the chiefest part which has been allotted to our English hymns is that of consoling, stimulating, and edifying individual believers. Sighs and prayers inarticulate, wordless aspirations and hopes, experiences none the less deep for being unspoken, all find expression in our hymns, and will be uttered in them till the songs, often mingled with, and faltered through tears here, are exchanged for those which tell only of victory.

Although in our innumerable collections of hymns scarcely six survive of the reign of Elizabeth, we have a great interest in knowing on what species of poetry the piety of our forefathers nourished itself, though the most of it has become obsolete. The first thing worthy of remark is, that the hymn-writers of this period, Spenser, Raleigh, Gascoigne, Wotton, Wither, &c., were not men of the deep devotion and absorbing piety of the German contemporary poets, and the English hymn-writers of the 18th century. Indeed there is occasionally such an incongruity between the hymns and the known character of the writers, as to warrant the supposition that some of them wrote merely because the fashion of the day demanded that poets and dramatists should show their versatility and eclecticism by an occasional exercise of their powers on sacred themes. This fashion ran riot at the Restoration, when men of infamous character indited litanies to the Spirit of truth and holiness.

Oftentimes men stepped aside from the whirl of court, political, or military life, to write hymns; and it may be believed that they came sometimes in all sincerity from hearts compelled to turn heavenwards for that earth had been made so blank and bare; but it is seldom that anything which gives the impression of being the spontaneous utterance of the spirit is to be found in the whole range of the Elizabethan hymns. Something of this is due to the stilted and fantastic style of the poetry of the period, and the fashion of far-fetched and subtle allusions, which were as great a tax upon the comprehension of the reader as upon the ingenuity of the composer. It appeared to be the aim of poets to clothe their thoughts in quaint and fanciful conceits of speech, hampered by rhyme and metre of the most difficult and perverse description. The style of Adam of St. Victor seemed to be the model of the hymn-writers, and we find them reproducing his fanciful applications of Scripture, and imitating his inordinate use of types, without those singular merits which made him the greatest of the medieval hymnologists. A verse from "A hymn to God my God," by Donne, is one of the most favourable specimens which can be selected of the fanciful allusions to Scripture which mark many of the hymns:

> "We think that Paradise and Calvary,
> Christ's cross, and Adam's tree, stood in one place:
> Look, Lord! and find both Adams met in me:
> As the first Adam's sweat surrounds my face,
> May the last Adam's blood my soul embrace."

It was scarcely possible for the liveliest religious feeling to take wing under the incumbrance of such fetters. It is not wonderful that hardly any of the hymns of the Elizabethan era survive, for the fashion of the time was on them, and it has passed away; and a stanza by Charles Wesley, or Oliver the Welsh blacksmith, stirs our spirits more than all the grandiloquence of the "Divine Poems" of Spenser, Drayton, and Gascoigne.

It was an age of conceit and allegory, both in prose and poetry: conceits which in poetry attained their perfect caricature afterwards in the poems of Herbert and Francis Quarles. The love of emblems was something extraordinary, yet it is impossible to believe that it took hold generally of our direct and matter-of-fact English mind,—it seems rather that the emblematists and allegorists wrote for the enjoyment of a choice few, and that their hymns even in their own day never were the property and delight of the many. In prose, Sir Thomas Browne's "Garden of Cyrus" still torments the curiosity and taxes the ingenuity of readers. In poetry there was hardly an exception to the prevailing taste for the catching up of remote resemblances, and the cunning invention of them where none existed. The reader becomes absolutely weary of the perverse conceits, laboured quaintness, contorted ideas, and ingenious symbolism of the "Divine Poems" of Spenser, Wotton, Gascoigne, Crashaw, Herrick, and others. Yet there is a charm in the strong thought which here and there struggles to develop itself through the medium of metaphor. Here is a fragment of a "Midnight Meditation," by King:

"The beating of thy pulse when thou art well
Is just the tolling of thy passing bell.
Night is thy hearse, whose sable canopy
Covers alike diseased day and thee;
All, all these weeping dews that nightly fall,
Are but the tears shed for thy funeral."

BISHOP KING.

In the two first lines we recognise the germ of the fine lines by Longfellow—

"And our hearts so bold and brave,
Still like muffled drums are beating
Funeral marches to the grave."

The "Colloquy with God," by Sir T. Browne, who lived at the close of this era, is a fine specimen of the best manner of the period. It is perfectly free from exaggeration, and seems the original of that Evening Hymn of Bishop Ken, which has a world-wide celebrity.

"The night is come. Like to the day,
Depart not Thou, great God, away;
Let not my sins, black as the night,
Eclipse the lustre of Thy light:
Keep still in my horizon, for to me
The sun makes not the day, but Thee.

"Thou whose nature cannot sleep,
On my temples sentry keep:
Guard me 'gainst those watchful foes
Whose eyes are open while mine close;
Let no dreams my head infest,
But such as Jacob's temples blest.

"While I do rest my soul advance,
Make my sleep a holy trance;
That I may, my rest being wrought,
Awake into some holy thought,
And with as active vigour run
My course as doth the nimble sun.

"Sleep is a death: O make me try
By sleeping what it is to die;
And as gently lay my head
On my grave as now my bed.
Howe'er I rest, great God! let me
Awake again at last with Thee:

"And thus assured behold I lie,
Securely or to wake or die.
These are my drowsy days; in vain,
I now do wake to sleep again;
O come sweet hour, when I shall never Sleep again, but wake for ever!"

SIR T. BROWNE.

Again, from the Hymn on Hope, by Faithful Tate—

"Hope is next door to Heaven's gate,
'Tis but a step from this to that,
Nay Hope doth Heaven antedate,
And bring down hither.
Hope is the antidote against despair,
Coffin of fear, and couch of care,
Cradle of patience, Hope hath fair,
Even in foul weather.

"Yet bony Death sometimes looks in,
Bringing a list of all my sin,
Pinching my hope till it looks thin,
And like to die.
Death in my very face doth stare,
So ghastly as if it meant to scare
And fright my hope into despair
While sin stands by."

FAITHFUL TATE.

These quaint stanzas, though perhaps distasteful to the modern ear, are full of concentrated force. Some of the hymns descend to language too absolutely colloquial, and rhyme too absolutely jingling to befit their themes, as if by way of reaction from the stilted style demanded by the age. The fine hymn, "The Soul's Errand," now generally attributed to Raleigh, concludes thus:—

"When thou hast, as I
Commanded thee, done blabbing,
Although to give the lie
Deserved no less than stabbing," &c.

Browne uses a simile which excites a smile by its grotesque want of dignity:—

"There will I sit like that industrious flie, Buzzing thy praises."

The marvellous "industry" is so opposed to our notions of the perfect spontaneity of the praises of the redeemed, and the "buzzing" suggests a most unattractive monotony of occupation. The most poetic minds fall into the vice of obscure metaphor and fanciful allusions. Crashaw, in a fine but fanciful hymn, has the following unpleasant stanza:—

"But O Thy side, Thy deep digged side,
That hath a double Nilus going;
Nor ever was the Pharian tide
Half so fruitful, half so flowing."

The great fault of the hymns of the Elizabethan era remains to be alluded to. Many of the monkish hymns offend our modern taste by the terms of passionate endearment applied to our Lord; the hymn movement, under Zinzendorf, in Germany, produced hymns which erred in the same direction; and two or three of the Methodist hymns are so tinctured with this leaning, as to repel the sensitively reverent nature; but the Elizabethan hymns not only go far beyond any in the commission of the same fault, but have a type of coarse familiarity peculiarly their own. Some of those which breathe the deepest piety, breathe it in language which can only gratify the profane; and the most exaggerated and languishing epithets of an earthly tenderness, not of the most respectful kind, are applied, not only to the Saviour, but to Him before whom the cherubim veil their faces. Many of the "Divine Poems" are as repellant to the tasteful from their coarseness, as are some of the works of the contemporary dramatists. Some of the best of the hymn writers in their adventurous imitations of the Canticles, used the most exaggerated language of the mystics,*

* A fine communion hymn, of high poetic merit, contains some stanzas which may be given in illustration of the mystical style of writing:—

"O let Thy wretch find that relief
Thou did'st afford the faithful thief;
Plead for me, Love! allege and show
That faith hath further yet to go
And less to lean on; because, than Though hid as God, wounds writ Thee man.

Sweet, consider then that I,
Though allowed not hand nor eye
To reach at Thy loved face, nor can Taste thee God, or touch thee Man,
Both of it believe and witness Thee,
My Lord too, and my God to be.

O soft, self-wounding pelican!
Whose breast wept balm for wounded man,
Ah, this way bend thy benign flood,
To a bleeding heart that gasps for blood;
That blood whose least drops sovereign be
To wash my worlds of sins from me.

but apparently without the excuse, either of their deep piety or fervid temperament, and the monkish, love-sick sentimentalism of Crashaw and others, is of the earth earthy, oftener sinking to hell than rising to heaven. It is impossible to transfer to these pages any specimens of this reprobate style of hymn-writing; it absolutely excludes from our notice half of the hymns of the Elizabethan era.

The faults of the hymnology of the period may be briefly recapitulated. Artificiality, exaggerated emblematicism, coarse materialism, affectation, and frigidity. Clear statements of evangelical doctrine, tersely expressed thought, and vigorous imagery are constantly to be found, but the soaring flight of faith, the lowly fervour of reverent love, the joyful utterances of conscious emancipation, the peace of life and thought brought into a loving captivity unto Jesus Christ, are wofully absent. Christianity, though escaped from the fetters of Roman Catholicism, was not yet disentangled from ecclesiasticism—its praise is feeble and stilted, its prayer is slavish and fearful, and the hymns of the English Reformation stand in dismal isolation between the grand poetic lyrics of the medieval darkness, and the fervid, joyful, irregular, spiritual songs which, like true "singing angels," soared gaily into the sunlight in the jubilee of Germany. A solitary hymn, "The Highway to Mount Calvary," by a writer little known, breathes a sweeter spirit and a more simple piety than any of the "Divine Poems" by the great masters of the day.

A Cento from "The Highway to Mount Calvary."

Repair to Pilate's hall,
Which place when thou hast found,
There shalt thou see a pillar stand
To which thy Lord was bound.
'Tis easy to be known
By any Christian eye;
The bloody whips do point it out
From all that stand thereby.

A little from that place,
Upon the left-hand side,
There is a curious portlie door,
Right beautiful and wide.
Leave that in any wise,
Forbid thy foot go thither;
For out thereat did Judas go,
Despair and he together.

But to the right-hand turn,
Where is a narrow gate,
Forth which St. Peter went to weep
His poor distrest estate.
Do imitate the like,
Go out at sorrow's door,
Weep bitterly as he did weep,
That wept to sin no more.

By this direction, then,
The way is understood—
No porch, no door, nor hall to pass,
Unsprinkled with Christ's blood.
So shall no error put Misguiding steps between,
For every drop sweet Jesus shed
Is freshly to be seen.

A crown of piercing thorns
There lies imbrued in gore!
The garland that thy Saviour's head
For thy offences wore;
Which when thou shalt behold,
Think what his love hath been,
Whose head was laden with those briars
T' unload thee of thy sin.

Follow his feet that goes
For to redeem thy loss,
And carries all our sins with Him
To cancel on his cross.
Look on with liquid eyes,
And sigh from sorrowing mind,
To see the death's-man go before,
The murdering troupes behind.

Then press amongst the throng,
Thyself with sorrows wed;
Get very near to Christ and see
What tears the women shed;
Tears that did turn Him back,
They were of such a force—
Tears that did purchase daughter's names,
Of Father's kind remorse.

Think on their force by tears—
Tears that obtained love;
Where words too weak could not persuade,
How tears had power to move.
Then look towards Jesus' load,
More than He could endure,
And how for help to bear the same
A hireling they procure.

Join thou unto the cross,
Bear it of love's desire:
Do not as Cyrenæus did,
Who took it up for hire.
The voluntary death
That Christ did die for thee,
Gives life to none but such as joy
Cross-bearing friends to be.

Up to Mount Calvary
If thou desire to go,
Then take thy cross and follow Christ,
Thou canst not miss it so.
When thou art there arrived
His glorious wounds to see,
Say but as faithful as the thief,
"O Lord, remember me."

Assure thyself to have
A gift all gifts excelling,
Once sold by sin, once bought by Christ,
For saints eternal dwelling.
By Adam Paradise
Was sin's polluted shade;
By Christ, the dunghill Golgotha
A Paradise was made.

Samuel Rowlands, 16th century.

The quaintness and tenderness of this hymn are far more akin to the poetry of an earlier age and the piety of a later than to the contemporary "Divine Poems," and lead us to hope that unknown men as well as great men wrote hymns, and that pious men and women were edified thereby; that the devotions of the feeble were aided, and the faith of the strong expressed in similar unpretending hymns which have become obsolete. But the hymns of the Elizabethan era, with the merits we know to be few, and the demerits we know to be many, unlike the German hymns of the same period, have fallen into a complete disuse. A few are to be met with in modern collec

Come Love! come Lord! and that long day
For which I languish, come away,
When this dry soul these eyes shall see
And drink the unsealed source of Thee,
When glory's sun faith's shade shall chase;
Then for Thy veil give me Thy face."

tions of sacred poetry, but they are little known and less esteemed. One only, "A Litany to the Holy Spirit," is used in public worship, and that only rarely, while of translations and imitations of the Ambrosian and medieval Latin hymns, nearly two hundred are retained. It is a cause of some thankfulness that the inauspicious rise of our English hymnology is so forgotten in its later glories both of poetry and thought which are not eclipsed by those of any country. We may well afford to part with that which has decayed and waxed old from a lack of inherent life. Ernst Woltersdorf used to say, "The day will come when many an old schoolmaster, peasant, or shoemaker, who has made three halting stanzas from his heart, shall have the crown on Mount Zion before those masters of verse." So in our Zion, the Church of Jesus Christ within these realms, the names of Watts, Wesley, Oliver, and Newton are held in higher repute than those of Spenser, Sidney, Raleigh, Gascoigne, and the other writers of "Divine Poems" in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

FLORAL AND BOTANICAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE HOLY LAND.

From the seething hollows of the wadys by the Dead Sea, the mouths of the Arnon and Callirrhöe, still crowded with luxuriant palm-trees, and from the tropical splendour of the plain of the Safieh (the southern Nimrim), the traveller rapidly ascends to the bare yet verdant downs which form the plains of Moab, and the rich heritage of the pastoral Reubenites. The northern portion we visited; of the southern part of the highlands we had only distant views. There are no traces here of primæval forest; probably the country has always been an open down. Its rolling pastures are to this day as fertile as when "the children of Reuben and the children of Gad saw the land of Jazer and the land of Gilead, that, behold, the place was a place for cattle" (Numbers xxxii. 1). Here and there may be seen a solitary terebinth tree (Pistachia terebinthus), the "Foustak" of the Arabs, sometimes spreading its gnarled and knotted boughs under the shelter of a cliff, at the foot of which its roots straggle, half-exposed, yet with a tenacious grasp of every cranny; sometimes standing forth like a land-mark on the top of a green knoll. One of the most remarkable of these trees crowns the summit of Jebel Attarus, the Pisgah of several writers, though I believe incorrectly so identified. The heap of stones underneath the shadow of the tree marks the burial-place of some old sheikh or saint; and these ancient trees, still hallowed in the eyes of the neighbouring Arabs, remind us of the groves and high places of olden idolatry, of which they are doubtless the relics. "They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks, and poplars, and elms (Hebr. ţerebinths), because the shadow thereof is good" (Hos. iv. 13).

But these trees are few and far between. The western highlands of Moab are covered with an even springy turf, closely cropped by flocks of thousands of sheep, reared for their fleeces rather than their mutton, for the rich men of Kerak and the Belka are still sheepmasters, like Mesha, king of Moab of old, who "rendered unto the king of Israel an hundred thousand lambs and an hundred thousand rams, with the wool" (2 Kings iii. 4). One of these grassy slopes was the field of Zophim, on the top of Pisgah. When we rode over this region the season of flowers was past, though the herbage in the early summer was still green and growing; and the only relics of its vernal colouring were the half-buried seed-pods of crocuses and the flower-stalks of hyacinths.

Passing northwards from Heshbon into the land of Jazer, the finest portion of the inheritance of Reuben, wrested from Sihon, king of the Amorites, the botany as well as the scenery becomes more varied. Eastward, indeed, towards Amman, the ancient Rabbah, the country is open, but intersected by many a perennial streamlet, near the edges of which the luxuriant herbage rose to our horses' knees, varied by the red or purple blossom of several species of Centaurea, by the bright gladiolus, just emerging from its sheath, by luxuriant malvæ, scorzoneras, ranunculuses, crimson and yellow, and a bright pheasant's eye (Adonis æstivalis). Terebinth trees become more numerous in the valleys; and on some few elevated portions of the plateau, where fragments of red sandstone overlie the chalky limestone, are patches of rather stunted pine-wood, Pinus carica, poor and insignificant when compared with those of Gilead. Further west, however, and especially on the western side of the watershed of the Gilead range, near Arak el Emir, the ruins of the great palace and fortress of Hyrcanus, the botany is infinitely more varied; the terebinth attains a size unknown elsewhere in Palestine; the streams are shaded and protected from evaporation by long lines of oleanders ("willows by the watercourses"), with stems often several feet in circumference; cane brakes shelter the wild boars in the lower parts, and the butcher's broom (Ruscus aculeatus), with its bright green leaf, flourishes conspicuously on the mounds of the perished villages.

The day's journey from the plains of Jordan to the summit of Jebel Osha (Mount Gilead) illustrates admirably the perpendicular distribution of the Palestine forest flora. Everywhere else the ancient system of terrace cultivation has precluded the possibility of the primæval forest resuming its sway. When the terraces were neglected and allowed to fall into decay, and the fruit trees disappeared, the soil on the hill-sides, which had been held together by their roots and been kept up by the terrace walls, was rapidly washed down by the sudden rains which follow the long droughts; and the rocky sides have been left bare and barren. But Reuben and Gad, with a vast extent of fertile prairie, rich in cattle, enjoying the ease of a pastoral life rather than intent on developing their agricultural wealth, were content with partial clearings round their scattered villages, and never scarped their slopes into terraces for vines and fig-trees. Thus the whole country from Nimrim to the Yarmuk is now a series of open parklike glades, surmounted with noble forests of oak or of pine, according to the elevation. The sites of towns are marked by turf-clad mounds, and often by more distinct ruins round the well, and by spaces more open than elsewhere, where decaying olive trees and unfenced patches of wheat and barley yield a rich return for the light labour of the Arabs most grudgingly bestowed.

The forest flora of Gilead may be grouped perpendicularly into four zones: the lower, commencing with the plains of Moab, marked by the jujube tree (Zizyphus spina-Christi), the acacia (A. seyal), and an occasional palm; the second, where the oleander, the oriental plane-tree (Platanus orientalis), the olive and the fig-tree predominate; the third, for the most part a belt of oak, evergreen and deciduous (Quercus ægilops and Q. pseudo-coccifera) interspersed with many an arbutus, myrtle, and bay-tree; and above these, on the highest peaks, an unvaried forest of pine-trees.

This pine-forest covers a considerable part of Jebel Ajlun and J. Kafkafka, the former being the highest part of the whole range south of Hermon. It is all of one species, P. carica, very closely allied to, if anything more than a variety of Pinus halepensis. It differs however from the ordinary form of that species in its habit of growth and general appearance, and is a very noble, sombre tree. We found many Bedouin women busily engaged in collecting the cones, which they scorch on a fire to open them, and then beat out the pips for food. We searched in vain for any trace of the cedar in these forests. Two distinct Hebrew words are translated pine-tree in our version, but only one of them, occurring in Is. lx. 13, can refer to this tree: "The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the fir tree, the pine tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary." The word translated "fir tree" refers probably to the cypress or the juniper.

Descending from the gloomy pine-forests to the region of the holm oak and arbutus, the undergrowth of shrubs becomes rapidly more varied, especially when the trees give place to open glades, and on the edge of old clearings. Here and there we noticed the walnut-tree, an elm, of what species I cannot pronounce, a few locust-trees, a beautiful white flowering hawthorn, having rather downy leaves (Cratægus azarolus) with several species of broom (Genista) wild roses, myrtles and bay-tree. The deciduous oak (Quercus ægilops) does not ascend so high as the prickly evergreen Q. pseudo-coccifera, and is generally more open in its growth and far more abundant in Bashan than in Gilead. Below this forest zone we descend to the rich belt of vegetation to which Gilead owes its ancient renown, the zone of the olive, the vine, and the various fruits. Here once grew the balsam. But now, I fear, there is no balm in Gilead. Carefully we searched for it wherever we were, but in vain. The Paliurus aculeatus, and Eleagnus angustifolius, or false balsam, were common enough, but no trace of the Amyris opobalsamum from which the balm of Mecca is derived. Probably it never was indigenous, but always cultivated, and held very precious. "I am come into my garden . . . I have gathered my myrrh with balsam" (Cant. v. 1). "His cheeks are as a bed of balsams" (v. 13). It is still grown near Mecca, and is said to be a stunted, prickly evergreen tree, about the size of an old hawthorn, from both the fruit and bark of which the balm is obtained, and considered by the Arabs the choicest of all odoriferous unguents.

Here and there a noble forest tree, sometimes called the lotus tree (Celtis australis), stood out alone, recalling the appearance of the English lime-tree. As we descend lower, the trees become more scattered, arranged in park-like clumps, with olive-yards here and there, and green corn in the glades. A beautiful ride down the valley of the Ezrak leads to Es Salt, the ancient Ramoth Gilead, and the only remaining town of Gilead. Here and here alone is seen the rich cultivation of ancient times; the hill sides are clad with vineyards, which gradually give place to olive-groves. The slopes below the town are thick with trees, which at the time of our visit were laden with green fruit, figs, apricots, medlars, plums, peaches, and walnuts, and under their shade were watered beds of onions, melons, and cucumbers. The season was too far advanced to enable us to notice the indigenous flora, and most of the plants were already in seed.

The lower botanical zone of Gilead presents no features differing from those of Jericho and the warmer Judean valleys, and we explored them at a less favourable season; while my botanical recollections of Bashan are chiefly marked by the predominance of the deciduous over the evergreen oak, the trees scattered instead of being in groups or masses, and by the noble size to which they attain. As we crossed again to the western side, the Upper Jordan valley, which three weeks before had been a brilliant garden of colour, was now a scorched and withered desert, where the tall brown stems of thistles and centaureas crackled under our horses' hoofs. "The grass withereth, the flower fadeth: because the spirit of the Lord bloweth upon it: surely the people is grass" (Is. xl. 7). In this passage the illustration of suddenness of destruction has a force which cannot be fully appreciated without bearing in mind the rapid transition from spring to the sere and withered leaf, unknown in our temperate clime.

The flora of Mount Carmel, which may be regarded as the last preserve of nature remaining in western Palestine, has close affinities with that of Gilead. Its very name—"Carmel" signifying a park or fruitful place, a mixture of cultivated ground and woodland, "the excellency of Carmel"—marks it as having been ever the boast of Israel for sylvan beauty. Not possessing many evergreen trees, it is in winter dreary enough, but in early spring the atmosphere is heavy with the perfume of its shrubs. When we first visited it in the rains of December, few of these were in blossom, the bright-red barked Arbutus andrachne alone was in fruit. The crest of the mount is clothed with a line of pine-trees (Pinus halepensis), much inferior in growth and beauty to the pines of Gilead. The most conspicuous shrub in early spring is the Judas-tree (Cercis siliquastrum), which before its leaves are in bud puts forth a mass of bunches of a brilliant red laburnum-shaped bloom, and, but for the contrast in colour, recals the effect of a fine clump of laburnum in an English pleasure-ground. It is particularly abundant on the north-eastern shoulder of the range.

The western end of the hill, near Caiffa, is bare and scrubby, having been entirely denuded for charcoal; but further inland are many fine forest trees scattered here and there. Oaks of both species (a noble Turkey oak overshadowing the well at the place of Elijah's sacrifice), chestnut-trees here and there, a very few Oriental plane-trees, an ash-tree (Fraxinus ornus), an elm, the locust tree, terebinth, and a few relics of probably all the native sylva of Palestine linger on its sides. Of smaller trees and shrubs the linden-tree (Phyllyræa) of more than one species, a kind of guelder-rose (Viburnum tinus), the wild olive, the lentisk-bush in profusion, a large tree-broom (Genista), with golden blossoms, the wild-olive, the hoary-leaved hawthorn (Cratægus azarolus), the service-apple (Sorbus aucuparia), and many others, bewildered our botanical ignorance. The bay-tree (Laurus nobilis), whether or no it be the "green bay-tree" of our version, flourishes plentifully on Carmel, as does the myrtle, about the identity of which no question has been raised. It is still a favourite with the people of the country, who gather and dry both the leaves and flowers, and twine its boughs with the oleander for their summer booths.

On Carmel we first found the almond-tree wild—the earliest of the trees to put forth its blossoms, diversifying the glades in January as the blackthorn does in England in the early spring. We may note that its Hebrew name signifies "haste," from its early blooming. Thus, in Jer. i. 11, 12, "I see a rod of an almond-tree. Then said the Lord unto me, Thou hast well seen: for I will hasten my word to perform it." In the neighbourhood of the many deserted villages of Carmel, among the olive-groves, which are still partially tended, were pomegranate-trees, just coming into flower in April, when we paid our last visit to Carmel. It must surely have been the beauty of its blossom which led to its being selected as a sacred ornament. "I went down into the garden of nuts to see the fruits of the valley, and to see whether the pomegranates budded" (Cant. vi. 11).

Another biblical plant, the rose-flowering cistus, or ladanum-tree (Cistus villosus and Cistus salvifolius), flourishes abundantly on Carmel. It produces the gum translated as myrrh in Gen. xliii. 11: "Carry down the man a present, a little balm, spices, and myrrh;" and is "the rose of Sharon" of Canticles. Its delicate and beautiful pink, or sometimes white flowers, cover the bare and rocky parts of Carmel for some days in March, and both species blossom there far more freely and luxuriantly than under cultivation with us. But the most abundant of all the perfume-yielding trees of Carmel is the storax (the stacte of Ex. xxx. 34), (Styrax officinalis), a shrubby tree from twelve to twenty feet high, one mass of pure white blossom, rivalling the orange in its beauty and its fragrance.
